There is no dispute that the Board agent who conducted the election failed to secure the challenged ballot envelopes, which already had been individually sealed, in accordance with Section 11344 of the NLRB Casehandling Manual. It is also undisputed that counsel for the Region, with the Regional Director's permission, inspected the challenged ballot envelopes for irregularities without affording the parties' representatives the opportunity to be present. Although the Casehandling Manual's guidelines for the handling of determinative challenged ballot envelopes do not expressly require counsel for the Region to notify the parties in these circumstances, I agree with the majority that it would have been better procedure for him to have done so. As to the challenged ballot envelopes themselves, there is no suggestion that anyone opened or tampered with them after they were sealed at the voting site. There is no reason to believe that the security of the determinative challenged ballot envelopes was breached or compromised in any way.

[6] Contrary to our colleague, we do not require evidence that only a "party to the election" have unsupervised access to the ballots before sustaining an objection alleging the mishandling of ballots. Rather, in striving to maintain the Board's strict election standards, we would set aside the election whenever there has been any unsupervised access to the ballots. Furthermore, we note that the dissent has chosen to ignore the fact that in the present case counsel for the Region certainly would be a party at least to the hearing on objections.

[7] Because we are directing a second election in this case, we find it unnecessary to pass on the hearing officer's other recommendations concerning the Employer's objections and the determinative challenged ballots.

In my colleagues' opinion, the election must be set aside because of the "appearance" the Regional Office's handling of the challenged ballot envelopes created, and the effect of this "appearance" on the election's validity. While they are careful not to impugn the integrity or neutrality of the Regional Office personnel involved, they find that by departing from "normal" procedures the Region made it impossible for the parties to monitor the determinative challenged ballot procedure and to assure themselves that the challenged ballot envelopes were secure, thereby raising reasonable grounds for concern about the Board's role in the election.

I am mindful that the absence of evidence that the challenged ballot envelopes were opened or tampered with is not in itself controlling because the conduct of Regional Office personnel is at issue. The Board has held that any act in the conduct of an election "which tends to destory confidence in the Board's election process, or which could reasonably be interpreted as impugning the election standards we seek to maintain, is a sufficient basis for setting aside that election.[1] Contrary to my colleagues, however, I do not believe that the manner in which Regional Office personnel handled the challenged ballot envelopes reasonably can be found either to have raised questions concerning the Board's neutrality or to have undermined the parties' confidence in the regularity of Board-conducted elections. Besides the Board agent's and counsel for the Region's departure from certain optimal procedures in their handling of the challenged ballot envelopes, there is no independent evidence that either of these individuals, or any other individual in the Regional Office, handled the envelopes in a manner even suggesting the appearance of an irregularity sufficient to affect the integrity of the Board's election process.

The "appearance" of impropriety in the handling of ballots has typically been found when a party to the election appeared to have the opportunity of unsupervised access to the ballots. See, e.g., Tidelands Marine Services, 116 NLRB 1222 (1956). In the instant case, however, from the time the Board agent placed the challenged ballot envelopes in the case file, there is no evidence whatsoever that the parties had access to them. Since the election, the challenged ballot envelopes have remained inside, and in the custody of, the Regional Office.

In N. Sumergrade & Sons, 123 NLRB 1951 (1959), the Board agents sealed the challenged ballot envelopes in a cardboard carton and had the parties initial the carton. The carton remained in the Regional Director's custody. While investigating the challenged ballots, Board agents, without notifying the parties, opened the sealed carton to check the names on the envelopes. The parties were present at the count, however, and at that time witnessed the opening of the sealed challenged ballot envelopes.

The union filed an objection raising issues similar to those which the objection raises in this case. The union contended that, by opening the sealed carton in private, the Board agents cast doubt on the integrity of the Board's election processes. The Board disagreed. It reviewed the agents' conduct, albeit without the benefit of Section 11344 of the Casehandling Manual, not yet in effect, and found that it would have been better practice not to have opened the carton without notifying the parties. The Board concluded, however, that the conduct, which essentially was the same as that of counsel for the Region in this case, did not warrant invalidating the election. The Board stated:

> The Regional Office at all times had custody of the sealed envelopes and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, we find that the sealed envelopes opened in the presence of the observers had not been previously opened or tampered with. We therefore overruled the Intervenor's objections.[2]

In Polymers, Inc., supra, the Board acknowledged that for various reasons the election procedures the General Counsel or a Regional Director prescribes may not always be followed to the letter. Thus, each case involving a challenge to the conduct of an election requires the Board to make a practical judgment after reviewing all the facts to determine whether the essential election standards were met.

Here, Regional Office personnel failed to follow the optimal procedures for handling determinative challenged ballots. There is no evidence, however, that the challenged ballot envelopes were opened or tampered with. The challenged ballot envelopes never left the custody of Regional Office personnel, and neither of the parties had access to the envelopes after the election. Further, there is no reason even to suspect that the envelopes were mishandled. On these facts, there is no basis for questioning the Board's neutrality in the election.[3] From a practical standpoint, therefore, the procedures in question did not raise a reasonable doubt as to the election's fairness and validity.

[1] Athbro Engineering Corp., 166 NLRB 966 (1967), vacated sub nom. Electrical Workers IUE v. NLRB, 67 LRRM 2361, 57 LC ¶ 12,440 (D.C. Cir. 1968), acquiesced in 171 NLRB 21 (1968), enfd. 423 F.2d 573 (1st Cir. 1970).

[2] 123 NLRB at 1952. Skyline Corp. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 1328 (5th Cir. 1980), on which the hearing officer relied, is very similar factually to this case. In Skyline Corp., although the Region failed to adhere rigidly to the Casehandling Manual's instructions, the evidence demonstrated that the ballots were secured, safeguarded, and untampered with. The same is true in this case.

New York Telephone Co., 109 NLRB 788 (1954), cited by the majority, involved far more suspicious circumstances. The Regional Office's inability to locate 729 mailed ballots during the count necessarily cast doubt as to who had access to them while they were missing. In this case, as in Skyline and Sumergrade, the Regional Office could account for the challenged ballots at all times.

A majority of the employees voted for the Petitioner, and it would be a serious disservice to deprive them of their chosen representative because of the Board agent's insignificant deviation from the Casehandling Manual's procedures. In Midland Life Insurance Co., 263 NLRB 127 (1982), we relaxed our standards for setting aside elections based on campaign misrepresentations. An important reason for the change was to "insure the certainty and finality of election results, and minimize unwarranted and dilatory claims attacking those results."[4] I continue to value these policy considerations. Accordingly, I would overrule the Employer's objections.

[3] The majority refers in fn. 5 to the parties' stipulation that, when the election was over, the Board agent handled the ballots in the manner prescribed by the Casehandling Manual. The Board agent later testified, however, that he had not complied with the Casehandling Manual's directive to place challenged ballots in a sealed envelope at the election site. Without further explanation, the majority asserts that "[t]his unexplained discrepancy on a critical matter creates uncertainty regarding the whole proceeding."

In my view, the majority seriously overstates the mattter's significance. The parties' erroneous stipulation was nothing more than an innocuous mistake. It does not support the majority's ill-advised decison to set aside the election.

8 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 16 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard A. Scully issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent's application for an award of attorneys fees and expenses is dismissed.

[1] In recommending that the Respondent's application for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982), be dismissed, the judge found it unnecessary to examine the adequacy of the General Counsel's investigation. While we emphasize that the General Counsel's investigation normally should include interviews with all important available witnesses, we agree with the judge's findings in the particular circumstances of this case. Thus, even assuming as true the Respondent's assertion that the General Counsel failed to interview Supervisors Blair and Stallman during the investigation, such circumstances would not affect the result here. In this regard, we conclude that, whether or not the General Counsel obtained during the investigation the testimony the supervisors later gave at the hearing, he would have been substantially justified in issuing the complaint.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

[Equal Access To Justice Act]

RICHARD A. SCULLY, Administrative Law Judge. Counsel for the Respondent Physicians Memorial Hospital filed an application for attorneys fees and expenses pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA)[1] following the entry of an Order by the National Labor Relations Board on May 24, 1983, adopting the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order of the administrative law judge in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding. The consolidated complaint alleged that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by requiring certain day-shift nurses to work night shifts on certain dates (in retaliation for union activities on the part of two of these nurses) and by the alleged resulting constructive discharge of one of the nurses who refused to work these night shifts for health reasons. It was also alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by implementing a wage increase to newly employed nurses without bargaining with the Physicians Memorial Hospital Staff Nurses' Association (the Union), the exclusive bargaining representative of the nurses employed by it. The decision of the administrative law judge found that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, as alleged, but recommended dismissal of all allegations concerning violations of Section 8(a)(3). No exceptions to the decision or recommended Order were filed by any party.

Having prevailed on significant, discrete portions of an adversary adjudication, the Respondent may be entitled to an award of compensation for certain fees and expenses pursuant to EAJA unless the General Counsel establishes that the Government's position in the underlying litigation was substantially justified, "by showing that its position in the proceeding was reasonable in law and fact," or unless "special circumstances make the award sought unjust."[2]

The General Counsel has filed a motion to dismiss the Respondent's application on the grounds that the Government's position in the litigation was substantially justified and that the application is otherwise defective. In its opposition to the General Counsel's motion to dismiss, the Respondent argues that the motion should be granted only if it could prove no set of facts which would entitle it to relief and that the motion should be denied and an answer to the application filed. The General Counsel's argument in support of its contention that its position in the underlying litigation was substantially justified is fully stated in the motion to dismiss and I find nothing would be served by requiring the filing of an answer restating that argument. The Board's Rules and Regulations contemplate that the determination on an application for an award of expenses under EAJA will ordinarily be made on the basis of the record in the underlying proceeding.[3] I find that no further proceedings are necessary in order to make a determination in this case, notwithstanding the Respondent's allegations that the Board's investigation which led to the filing of the consolidated complaint was deficient. I find that the record in the underlying case is sufficient to make the determination as to whether there was substantial justification for the position taken therein by the General Counsel.[4]

[3] 29 CFR § 102.144(a).

[4] In its application the Respondent alleges that the Board's investigation in this matter was deficient because of the failure to interview Supervisors Virginia Blair and Lois Stallman concerning the decision to require the day-shift nurses to work nights. The General Counsel responds that "the Region interviewed all witnesses presented by Respondent during the course of the investigation, and that it is Respondent's obligation to present all relevant evidence in response to the charge." At the trial, the General Counsel called both Blair and Stallman as witnesses and questioned them extensively about the decision to rotate the day-shift nurses to nights. Under the circumstances, the trial record is complete and provides the basis for determining whether there was substantial justification for the General Counsel's position. An inquiry into the mechan-

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The determination of whether or not the General Counsel's position is substantially justified is to be made on a case-by-case basis.[5] The fact that the General Counsel did not prevail in this litigation does not raise a presumption that its position was not substantially justified, nor must it be established that the decision to litigate was based on a substantial probability of prevailing.[6] Likewise, the fact that the General Counsel failed to establish a prima facie case is not determinative for purposes of an award pursuant to EAJA.[7]

After examining the record of the underlying case in its entirety, I conclude that the position of the General Counsel was reasonable in law and in fact. The record clearly established that Hospital Administrator William Meyer harbored animus toward the Union and towards its President Teresa Boone because of her union activities and that Meyer had disparaged and sought to undermine the Union's leadership through comments made at employee meetings and published in a series of memos, entitled "Arbitration Update," directed to the hospital staff. The declaration of the "staffing emergency" on October 14, 1981, which resulted in Mrs. Boone and two other day-shift nurses being required to work nights, came within five days of a particularly acrimonious confrontation concerning arbitration of unresolved collective-bargaining issues in which Meyer accused Boone of "lying," being "lazy," and delaying the arbitration process. The timing of an adverse action can be persuasive evidence of the employer's motivation.[8] Invocation of extraordinary and rarely used "staffing emergency" procedure, which caused Boone, a permanent day-shift nurse, to have to work some nights, coming as it did on the heels of the Meyer-Boone confrontation on October 9, could reasonably support the inference that the rotation of Boone and the other day-shift nurses was motivated by antiunion considerations. This was particularly true where one of the "staffing emergency" prerequisites, no nurses on vacation during the period in question, had not been met. My conclusion that the General Counsel had not made a prima facie case was based, in part, on the credited testimony of Supervisors Blair and Stallman which convinced me that Meyer was not involved in the decision to declare the "staffing emergency," that it was Blair's decision alone, that antiunion considerations were not involved, and that it was not a pretext. Absent that credited testimony, I would have necessarily found that the General Counsel had met the burden prescribed in Wright Line,[9] for establishing a prima facie case.[10]

I do not find the General Counsel's refusal to accept the Respondent's self-serving denials of unlawful motivation in declaring the "staffing emergency" to be unreasonable in law or in fact. Few principles are more established than, as stated in Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB,[11] that:

> Actual motive, a state of mind, being the question, it is seldom that direct evidence will be available that is not also self-serving. In such cases, the self-serving declaration is not conclusive; the trier of fact may infer motive from the total circumstances proved. Otherwise no person accused of unlawful motive who took the stand and testified to a lawful motive could be brought to book.

The fact that I found the testimony of Blair and Stallman to be convincing and, based on their demeanor and the totality of the evidence, accepted it as establishing that the Respondent's motivation was not unlawful does not mean that the General Counsel must agree or that not to have done so was unreasonable. Nor was it unreasonable to have inferred that union animus, as demonstrated by Meyer, was involved. Meyer's duties at the hospital were such that he could have had a role in the decision to declare the "staffing emergency," as evidenced by Blair's testimony that she informed Meyer that she was considering such action and he told her that she should make the decision. Also, the fact that Blair was present at the employee meetings at which Meyer disparaged the union leadership and at his confrontation with Boone on October 9 could reasonably support the inference that Blair was acting consistent with and in furtherance of her supervisor's antiunion posture and at his explicit or implicit direction. I find that the General Counsel's position that the rotation of the day-shift nurses to the night shift was discriminatory and a violation of Section 8(a)(3) had a reasonable basis in law and fact.

Insofar as this litigation also involved the allegation that Nurse Elaine Johns was constructively discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3), I also find that the General Counsel's position was substantially justified. Johns resigned rather than work the night shifts she was assigned when the "staffing emergency" was declared because she felt it would be injurious to her health to work nights. Johns had served as an officer of the Union and her position was listed on notices displayed on a bulletin board at the hospital. Inasmuch as Johns was rotated to the night shift in the course of the same "staffing emergency" discussed above, the justification for the General Counsel's position with respect to Johns was the same whether she be considered an innocent victim of the alleged discriminatory action directed against Union President Boone or as a target of discrimination herself. Johns' case might even be considered stronger since the Respondent failed to offer a compelling reason why it rejected Johns' request to be excused from night-shift duty which she claimed would be harmful to her health. As I noted in ics of the investigation in this matter is neither warranted nor necessary as there is no indication that the investigation could or should have developed any more information than is available in the trial record.

[10] While I do not agree with the General Counsel's argument that in determining whether a prima facie case had been established I should not have considered the testimony of Blair and Stallman, presented as a part of the General Counsel's case-in-chief, to the extent that it supported Respondent's defense, it is a moot point.

the underlying decision, Blair took what appeared to be a rather hard-line approach in refusing Johns' request. There was a substantial amount of conflicting testimony by Johns, her physician Dr. Burke, Stallman, and Blair as to what transpired after Johns was informed of the schedule changes occasioned by the "staffing emergency." Had the testimony of Johns and Burke been credited over that of Blair and Stallman, the result in this case may well have been different. In any event, it cannot be said that the General Counsel's position in attributing the Respondent's actions in this matter to union animus was unreasonable.

Considering all of the circumstances, I find that the General Counsel's position with respect to each of the 8(a)(3) allegations was substantially justified and that the Respondent's application pursuant to EAJA should be denied.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent's application for an award of attorneys fees and expenses is dismissed.

Texaco, Inc. and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, AFL–CIO. Case 14–CA–13419

8 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 8 December 1980 Administrative Law Judge Thomas R. Wilks issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

As stated in detail in his decision, the judge found that at the commencement of an economic strike on 8 January 1980[3] the Respondent withheld accident and sick benefit plan payments (A & S benefits) from 13 eligible employees based solely on the fact that the remaining work force of approximately 400 employees engaged in strike activity, and that it continued to withhold such A & S benefits for the duration of the strike. On 29 January the Union filed the instant unfair labor practice charge with Region 14 alleging that such actions were unlawful.

On 10 April the Respondent and the Union reached agreement on the issues covered by these negotiations and those created by the strike and executed a memorandum of agreement and a strike settlement agreement. According to the terms of the memorandum of agreement, all unit employees received increases in wages and benefits, including a lump sum payment of $150 plus medical coverage payments for the months of January and March. These documents also included express provisions requiring the Union to withdraw charges pending before the Board relating to the benefit plans including A & S benefits.[4]

Thereafter, in fulfillment of its obligations under these agreements, the Union on 14 April requested the Regional Director for Region 14 to approve its withdrawal request regarding the present unfair labor practice charge. The Regional Director denied the request on 30 April and issued a complaint on 15 May. The hearing was conducted on 24 and 25 June.

The Respondent contended before the judge that the Regional Director erred in not granting the Union's withdrawal request, and that in any event it had engaged in no unlawful conduct. The judge found no merit in either of the Respondent's arguments, relying on the Board's decision in Emerson Electric.[5] In that case, the Board adopted the administrative law judge's conclusion that a strike settlement agreement by which the union agreed to withdraw charges pending before the Board did not divest the Board of its statutory authority to resolve the issue before it. The rationale for not deferring to the terms of that settlement was as follows:

> The Board acts in the public interest to enforce public, not private, rights. National Licorice Company v. N.L.R.B., 309 U.S. 350 (1940); Amalgamated Utility Workers v. Consolidated Edison Company of New York, Inc., 309 U.S. 261 (1940); Agwilines, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 87 F.2d 146 (5th Cir. 1936). "Whenever private contracts conflict with its functions, they obviously must yield or the Act would be reduced to a futility." J. I. Case Company v. N.L.R.B., 321 U.S. 332 (1940).
> Section 10(a) of the Act explicitly provides that the Board's power to prevent unfair labor practices "shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, law, or otherwise . . . ." Accordingly, the "parties cannot by contractual agreement divest the Board's function to operate in the public interest." Boire v. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America [Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc.], 479 F.2d 778 (5th Cir. 1973). [Id. at 1149.]

---

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and brief adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] Although no exception was taken, we note that Judge Wilks inadvertently stated in his decision that employee Joles was medically released to report for work on 14 January. The date should have been 14 April.

The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] All dates are 1980.

[4] The strike settlement agreement stated in part:

> It is further understood that: (1) each party will dismiss any and all litigation now pending against the other or its agents, i.e., injunctions, damage suits, etc., (including arbitrations, unfair labor practice charges, lawsuits and grievances related to any of the benefit plans); . . . and (3) that it is agreed that no new litigation growing out of or related to the strike will be filed.

The memorandum agreement stated in part:

> Lump sum payment [is] in consideration of the Union's agreement to withdraw all contractual grievances and NLRB charges and court proceedings arising out of the Company's administration of the employee benefit plans during the strike and the Union's agreement not to institute any further actions arising out of said circumstances. . . .

[5] Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), enfd. as modified 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981).

The Board further held that, under the facts presented, the Respondent Employer had unlawfully withheld A & S benefits from eligible employees at the commencement of a strike.

In its exceptions before the Board, the Respondent again argues that the Regional Director should have approved the Union's withdrawal request and that the withholding of A & S benefits was lawful. For the reasons set forth below, we agree with the Respondent's first contention that the Regional Director erred when he refused to grant the Union's request to withdraw its unfair labor practice charge, and that on this basis the complaint should be dismissed.[6]

We agree fully with the general principles quoted above from the judge's decision in Emerson Electric that the Board's primary responsibility is to enforce the public rights which underlie the National Labor Relations Act. Missing from that general statement, however, is any analysis of how a lawful and voluntary strike settlement agreement such as that at issue here may impact, adversely or favorably, on such public rights. We are convinced that the public rights expressly stated in the Act are better served by upholding the integrity of this strike settlement agreement than by disregarding it.

Section 1 of the Act lists the various ways by which commerce is obstructed as a result of strikes and less severe manifestations of industrial strife. It further recognizes that the flow of commerce is promoted by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes and by protecting the rights of employees to bargain collectively. With this background, Section 1 then states:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining . . . . [Emphasis added.]

Both the Union and the Respondent recognized their joint responsibility to engage in collective bargaining. Notwithstanding these efforts, an economic strike ensued and for over 4 months essentially all unit employees who were capable of working withheld their services. The parties subsequently negotiated a strike settlement agreement and a memorandum agreement resolving the disputed bargaining issues and other differences arising during the strike. On this basis, the Union agreed to end the strike and withdraw all charges before the Board and the employees returned to work. This settlement has been deemed satisfactory by the parties to the agreement, and no employee has indicated disagreement with its terms, by which each employee received wage and benefit increases and at least $150 in settlement of outstanding contractual claims. Notwithstanding this voluntary resumption of labor peace between the parties, the Regional Director and the General Counsel rejected the withdrawal request herein,[7] apparently contending that litigation of a public right must in this instance take precedence over the parties' desire to settle their dispute by their own voluntarily negotiated agreement. We disagree. This resistance to "the practice and procedure of collective bargaining" is directly contrary to Section 1 of the Act. Given a setting of resumed labor relations peace with negotiated benefits provided for employees, a clear and unequivocal waiver of pending unfair labor practices claims by the Union, and no other unfair labor practice charges extant, we see no sufficient reason for the Board to disregard the withdrawal request and intrude on such a cooperative environment in order to determine whether 13 of 400 unit employees were unlawfully deprived of a particular contractual benefit during the duration of an economic strike.

The withheld A & S benefits were based solely on a contractual commitment negotiated between the Union and the Respondent. However, the withholding of this benefit did not interfere with the employees' basic employment rights, and the benefit itself appears to be no more than a contractual term or condition which subsequently was negotiated away in good faith by the Union and the Respondent under the overall terms of the strike settlement agreement.[8] Under the above facts, it appears that the primary interest served by continued litigation would be the private contractual rights of these few employees, rather than public rights under the Act.

Were we to give paramount concern to these private contractual rights which no employee has sought to litigate, the resulting irony would be that the Board would interfere with the peaceful resolution of labor disputes. Such interference would be most disruptive where the strike settlement agreement is conditioned on the withdrawal of the unfair labor practice charge, and the Board's refusal to approve the withdrawal request voids the strike settlement.[9] However, even where there is no such condition, the parties may be reluctant to settle a strike absent resolution of all issues in dispute. In order to promote the parties' desire to resolve their dispute voluntarily, we should provide every reasonable encouragement that their disputes be resolved on as comprehensive a basis as their strike settlement agreement would indicate.

[6] Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to consider the Respondent's second defense that the withholding of A & S benefits was lawful.

[7] We are administratively advised that the Union's requests to withdraw similar charges arising in connection with the same nationwide strike were granted by other Regional Directors.

[8] In passing, we note that such a reduction in contractual benefits is not essentially different from midcontract negotiations which generally serve to freeze, increase, or reduce previously negotiated wage or benefit levels. In either case the parties, on negotiation and agreement, should be allowed to alter existing contractual terms.

Under all the circumstances, we are of the opinion that it will best effectuate the policies of the Act to honor the terms of the strike settlement agreement, by which the Union has requested the withdrawal of the unfair labor practice charge, and not involve the Board in further proceedings in this matter.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS R. WILKS, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to an unfair labor practice charged filed by Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union) against Texaco, Inc. (the Respondent) and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 14, a hearing was held in St. Louis, Missouri, on June 24 and 25, 1980. The issue litigated was whether the Respondent violated the Act by announcing to employees its intention to discontinue accident and sick benefits then being paid to medically excused employees upon the commencement of a strike by the Union and by in fact discontinuing such benefits to employees upon the commencement of a strike by the Union.

On and shortly before September 10, 1980, the parties submitted briefs. On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor and in consideration of the oral argument made at the hearing and the briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, an Illinois corporation with an office and place of business in Lawrenceville, Illinois (the Lawrenceville refinery), is engaged in the processing, nonretail sale and distribution of petroleum and related products. During an annual period of time representative of its operations, the Respondent sold and distributed at its Lawrenceville refinery products valued in excess of $50,000 which were shipped to points outside the State of Illinois.

It is admitted and I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

It is admitted and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Facts

The Respondent and the Charging Party have maintained a bargaining relationship for many years. There are 406 employees in the bargaining unit. In November 1979, pursuant to its terms, the current collective-bargaining agreement was reopened for negotiations regarding wages, vacations, and health care benefits. Negotiations occurred on various dates in December 1979. At the negotiation meeting of January 7, 1980, the Union announced that if no agreement were reached by 4 p.m. on January 8, a strike of all unit members would be called. During the afternoon session of the January 8 negotiation meeting the Respondent distributed a printed statement to the Union's bargaining committee including the employee members thereof. That statement entitled "Employee Benefits Procedures in Case of a Strike" provided, inter alia, for the suspension of employer contributions or payments to certain employee benefit plans including payment of accident and sick benefits (A&S benefits). Only the reference to and conduct regarding A&S benefits is at issue in this proceeding. That reference stated as follows:

> Accident and Sick (A&S) Benefit Plan
> Upon commencement of a strike, all A&S benefits will be discontinued, except in those cases involving industrial accident or injury. A&S benefits will be continued to those employes [sic] who are disabled due to industrial injury until medically released by their doctors or until expiration of such benefits in accordance with the Plan's benefit schedule, whichever occurs first.
> Decision will be reserved regarding the payment of A&S benefits upon termination of the strike for employes [sic] who become disabled during the strike and whose disability continues beyond the termination of the strike.
> Decision will also be reserved regarding the resumption of A&S benefits which were discontinued at the beginning of the strike for those employes [sic] who are still disabled after the termination of the strike.
> Under no circumstances will A&S benefits by payable if they would not have been payable in the absence of a strike.

The afternoon bargaining session proved to be unfruitful and at 3 p.m. official strike notice was served by the Union, and at 4 p.m. a strike commenced and picket lines were established at the several entrances to the Lawrenceville refinery. All but two employees actively employed on January 8 ceased work and joined the strike which lasted for 4 months. Only one of those was a union member. The plant, however, continued to operate 24 hours a day with supervisory personnel. Work was available for any union member who desired to work. Only one member did so.

On January 8 there were 13 employees, members of the Union, who were absent from work on such leave and who had been receiving A&S benefits. The Respondent immediately discontinued payment of these benefits for the duration of the strike. The Respondent did so because it assumed that those employees would have withheld their services in support of the strike had they been physically able to do so. The Respondent contends that such assumption was justified in view of the Union's strike notice which in effect warned that all unit employees and members would "leave the plant at 4:00 p.m." on January 8 and because the unit employees and union members had historically given near unanimous support to past strike activity.

Having assumed that the 13 sick or disabled employees would not work even if they had been able, the Respondent therefore concluded that the absence of these employees on and after January 8 was due not only to their physical incapacity but also was due to their support of the Union. Accordingly, the Respondent decided that they did not qualify for A&S benefits inasmuch as such benefits consisted of a continuation of wages, in whole or in part depending upon length of absence and years of service, and were conditioned on an absence from service solely because of sickness or illness.

At the commencement of the January 8 strike the Respondent had not been aware of any statement or overt action by any of the 13 recipients of A&S benefits which indicated that they supported the strike. However, none of the 13 employees disavowed the strike. Furthermore, the Union did not advise the Respondent that the incapacitated employees were not on strike. Nor did it immediately demand that the A&S benefits be continued. However, on January 17, at one of the negotiation meetings, in a written statement of position, the Union objected to a cessation of all benefit plan contributions and payments including A&S benefits.

At a meeting of about 50 members conducted by the Union on January 7, the employees were advised of the procedures to be followed in picketing. They were also told that sick persons were not expected to engage in any picketing. No explicit reference was made to A&S benefits. Commencing on February 1, and continuing on each Saturday thereafter, the Union disbursed "grocery money" to any member who appeared at the Union's downtown office to receive these strike benefits. The money was tendered without any questions asked or conditions expressed. The sick and disabled employees, or their representatives, received payment of weekly grocery money from the Union.

During the course of the strike, at varying points in time, all but 2 of the 13 sick and disabled employees joined the strike and engaged in picketing. Those that joined the strike testified that they did so at the point in time when they were recovered from their illness or disability. Most of them testified that they did not report to work when able because they supported the Union. Some testified that because of their illness or disability they gave little or no thought to the strike and had made no decision nor had taken any overt action to support the strike prior to their full physical recovery, although many of them characterized themselves as loyal union members who do not cross picket lines. The only area of factual dispute in this case relates to whether some of these employees engaged in conduct which indicated their support of the strike prior to their physical recovery and ability to work. This will be discussed at length following an analysis of the basic legal issue.

Agreement was finally reached on the issues of the strike, and on April 10, 1980, a "strike settlement agreement" was executed. Simultaneously, the Respondent and the Union executed a memorandum of agreement under which, in effect, the Union agreed to withdraw all unfair labor practice charges. The Respondent, inter alia, agreed to and subsequently did pay each unit employee approximately $150 as reimbursement for certain hospitalization and dental plan premiums for the months of January and March. The strike ended April 11, 1980. By letter dated April 14, 1980, pursuant to the "strike settlement agreement" the Union requested the Regional Director to approve the withdrawal of the underlying unfair labor practice charge. The employees who were deprived of A&S benefits during the strike were not compensated for the loss of those benefits. On Arpil 30, 1980, the Regional Director denied the withdrawal request.

The Respondent contends that it acted lawfully in announcing and in actually terminating the A&S benefits inasmuch as it was not required to finance a strike against itself. It argues that the A&S benefits amounted to a wage continuation plan and it was not required to continue the payment of wages to strikers including those employees who, although incapacitated for work, were assumed to have supported the strike. Secondly, it argues that the 13 pre-January 8 A&S recipients affirmatively allied themselves with the strike after the strike commenced and should accordingly be disqualified from receipt of A&S benefits not only at the point when they joined or affirmatively supported the strike but also ab initio when the strike started. As indicated, there is a factual issue as to precisely when each of the 13 A&S recipients affirmatively joined or supported the strike.

In Southwestern Electric Power Co., 216 NLRB [illegible] (1975), the majority decision of the Board held that where a strike was effective an employer could reasonably assume that union members on sick leave supported the strike. Furthermore, subsequent ratification of the strike by those persons was recognized as evidence of the reasonableness of that assumption as was the failure of employees to protest nonpayment and their testimony that they would have supported the strike had they not been disabled. Accordingly, the Board concluded that the employer was not required to subsidize a strike by continued disability payments.

The rationale of that decision was explicitly rejected by the Board in Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143

(1979), wherein the Board held that an employer may not rely on speculative grounds in concluding that medically excused employees support a strike; that such employees have a right under Section 7 of the Act to refrain from declaring their position on a strike while they are medically excused; and that an employer may no longer require its disabled employees to disavow the strike in order to receive disability benefits which would be due them had it not been for the strike of fellow employees. The cessation of such benefits to incapacitated employees because of the strike activities of other employees, the Board observed, served as a punishment of employees who had "not yet acted in support of the strike." Accordingly the inconsistent holdings of the Southwestern Electric Power Co. decision were overruled as the Board stated:

> Accordingly, we now hold for an employer to be justified in terminating any disability benefits to employees who are unable to work at the start of a strike it must show that it has acquired information which indicates that the employees whose benefits are to be terminated has affirmatively acted to show public support for the strike. [Id. at 1144.]

The Board also held:

> For all practical purposes, any employee, disabled or sound, who affirmatively demonstrates his support of the strike by picketing or otherwise showing public support for the strike, has enmeshed himself in the ongoing strike activity to such an extent as to terminate his right to continued disability benefits. [Id. at 1144.]

However, the Board observed that a showing of participation in the strike by medically excused workers subsequent to the inception of the strike "does not justify post hoc Respondent's initial termination of benefits to these employees," and "The employee's action in support of this strike, however, may not be used to deprive them of any benefits for the time away from work prior to their supportive action." [Id.]

The Respondent disagrees with the Board's holding in the Emerson case, but the Board's language is clear, and I find dispositive of the basic issues in this case. I do not agree that the facts of this case are distinguishable from the Emerson case as is ultimately argued by the Respondent. The facts of the Emerson case are similar if not identical with those found herein. In the Emerson case the Board concluded that the Respondent had not sufficient bases to assume that medically excused employees supported the strike from its inception. Unlike this case the Employer in the Emerson case terminated the benefits in the face of a protest from the Union that the beneficiaries were not participants in the strike. Furthermore, in this case no beneficiary protested the cancellation of benefits. However, like the Emerson case, the Respondent herein announced its decision to terminate A&S benefits prior to the onset of the strike and before it had any objective basis to conclude that the A&S beneficiaries would join or support the strike.

Respondent's reliance upon history is not justified. During a very lengthy history of a bargaining relationship only one prior strike had occurred in 1969. Although that strike was supported by all of the unit employees, it forms an insufficient premise for a conclusion that in 1980 all unit employees also would join the strike. The Union's strike notice amounted to no more than an announcement that all unit employees and members would be called upon to strike. Certainly every strike notice constitutes either an explicit or implicit warning that all unit employees will loyally support the Union. However, without a more definitive historical context, such a call for support is not evidence that unanimous support would ensue. Although a majority of employees voted for a strike, that vote occurred in the fall of 1978, there is no evidence that the vote was unanimous, or that the A&S beneficiaries had voted.

Accordingly, I conclude that on January 8 the Respondent's assumption that A&S beneficiaries would join and support the strike was no less speculative than that of the employer's assumption in the Emerson case.

The evidence of the subsequent action of employees in joining or supporting the strike and testimony revealing the subsisting union loyalty of many of the A&S recipients I find to be of no relevance in light of the Board's clear pronouncement that it will look to whether the beneficiaries had "affirmatively acted to show public support" and whether the Respondent "acquired information" of such affirmative acts prior to the initial termination of benefits. Furthermore, subsequent enmeshment in the strike will disqualify an employee only prospectively from the point of enmeshment. Therefore, inquiry as to the employee's state of mind at the time of the onset of the strike is irrelevant except perhaps for the purpose of evaluating the nature of his subsequent ambiguous conduct.[1]

With respect to the nature of the A&S benefits, Respondent herein argues, as was similarly argued by the Employer in the Emerson case, that such benefits constitute nothing more than a wage continuation solely conditioned upon medical excuse from work. Evidence was adduced as to the nonfunded, nonvested nature of the A&S benefits which were paid "out of pocket" to duplicate in whole or in part the employees' normal wages. However, as in the Emerson case, the A&S benefits herein and the scope of such benefits were in direct ratio to the employee's past services and tenure, and were thus earned by the employee by his past services. Physical illness or disability was a condition for receipt of the A&S benefits, but employees were not paid because they stayed home and recuperated. Rather, they were paid because of their past services. The continued payment of A&S benefits cannot be construed to be payment of services rendered during the strike, nor as payment for a willful refusal to render services.

As to the Respondent's argument that A&S benefits are conditioned on absence for the sole reason of physical impairment whereas a subsisting sympathy for the strike adds a second disqualifying reason for absence from work, the evidence fails to demonstrate that at the time of the termination of benefits that the Respondent was aware of any affirmative support of the strike by the A&S recipients, nor was it aware of any subjective decision that the disabled employee would join or aid the strike if he could. Moreover, even if the disabled employee had made a decision to support the strike, that decision, like a decision to refuse to support the strike and to return to work, could not be executed because of medical reasons. Such a subjective decision by the employee would be at most a potential or inchoate reason for absence but it could not be an active cause of absence because it was incapable of realization. Clearly then, until the A&S beneficiary regained his physical abilities, he was absent solely because of disability, never mind that he might have longed to have been absent for other reasons. He can only withhold services when able to do so, and he can only enmesh himself in the strike when he is able to engage in some act which constitutes enmeshment.

I conclude therefore that, like the sick and accident benefits in the Emerson case, the A&S benefits herein were benefits due the recipients for past services, but which were denied because of the strike activity of other employees. I conclude that the announcement of the suspension of such benefits by the Respondent interfered with employees' rights to engage in protected strike activity and thus violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I conclude that the Respondent's termination of A&S benefits for the 13 recipients on January 8, 1980, tended to punish them because of the strike activity of other employees and constituted discriminatory conduct violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

The Respondent contends that the complaint in this case ought to be dismissed inasmuch as the parties, i.e., the Respondent and the Union, had entered into a strike settlement agreement and the Union had accordingly requested withdrawal of the unfair labor practice charges. The Respondent raises a variety of arguments in support of this contention, e.g., failure to honor the withdrawal request constitutes a rewriting of the collective-bargaining agreement; the Respondent ought not be denied the benefit of its bargain; the Union is obliged to honor its collective-bargaining agreement including the strike settlement agreement upon which the contract was conditioned; the Board is not empowered to amend the strike settlement agreement; the General Counsel is estopped from prosecuting the complaint because the Respondent had fulfilled its obligations under the settlement agreement; and finally, the General Counsel/Regional Director ought to be estopped from prosecuting this case because similar complaints in numerous other Regions of the Board were withdrawn with approval by the respective Regional Directors of those Regions.

The strike settlement agreement issue, with the exception of the last contention of Respondent enumerated above, is identical to the strike settlement issue resolved in the Emerson case which I find to be dispositive. In that case Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci denied the motion to dismiss and stated:

> The Board acts in the public interest to enforce public, not private, rights. National Licorice Co. v. N.L.R.B., 309 U.S. 250 (1940); Amalgamated Utility Workers v. Consolidated Edison Company of New York, Inc., 309 U.S. 261 (1940); Agwilines, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 87 F.2d 146 (5th Cir. 1936). "Whenever private contracts conflict with its functions, they obviously must yield or the Act would be reduced to a futility." J.I. Case v. N.L.R.B., 321 U.S. 332 (1940).
> Section 10(a) of the Act explicitly provides that the Board's power to prevent unfair labor practices "shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, law, or otherwise . . . ." Accordingly, the "parties cannot by contractual agreement divest the Board's function to operate in the public interest." Boire v. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America (Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc.), 479 F.2d 778 (5th Cir. 1973) supra, at 1149.

The Board adopted his ruling without further elaboration.

With respect to Respondent's allusion to the conduct of other Regional Directors with respect to similar settlement agreements, at the hearing I ruled that evidence of such conduct was irrelevant to the issues before me and therefore inadmissible. I remain convinced of the propriety of that ruling. It is well settled that the issuance of a complaint is within the purview of the General Counsel. For a variety of reasons, a Regional Director, acting on behalf of the General Counsel, may acquiesce in a private adjustment of an unfair labor practice charge. The ultimate objective of course is the achievement of the basic policies of the Act. That goal may very well be achieved through the application of pragmatism and prudence. However, in this particular case the issuance of a complaint was premised upon the breach of the Act by the Respondent. Although the Respondent and the Charging Party Union adjusted what they considered to be the fundamental and overriding dispute between them, their settlement provided no meaningful remedy for those employees whose rights were violated and who were adversely affected by the loss of benefits to which they were entitled. Under such circumstances and in light of the Board's decision on the Emerson case, I conclude that the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint, or in the alternative to withhold any remedial order, is without merit and is hereby denied.

B. A&S Recipients' Subsequent Strike Involvement

For the foregoing reasons I conclude that those 13 recipients of A&S benefits who had received A&S benefits on and before January 8, 1980, were entitled to continued A&S benefits until such time as they became enmeshed in the strike by actively participating in the strike or by otherwise affirmatively demonstrating support of the strike to such an extent as to terminate their right to continued A&S benefits.

1. Mary A. Brashear

From October 29 to January 8, Brashear received A&S benefits. Although Brashear was a union steward and had been "Recording Secretary" of the Union she was opposed to the strike prior to its inception and she did not appear at the picket line, nor did she engage in any conduct in support of the strike until after her physician medically released her on Friday, January 18. She engaged in picketing at her first opportunity thereafter, Monday, January 21. Accordingly, she is entitled to all A&S benefits which she would have received from January 8 through 18, had it not been for the strike activity of other employees.

2. Harold N. Chansler

Chansler, a union member, received A&S benefits from December 6 to January 8. On Monday, January 21, he was given a medical release by his physician. Chansler did not return to work but rather he joined the strike and engaged in picketing on at least 15 occasions thereafter. Between January 8 and 21, he engaged in no conduct supportive of the strike. Accordingly, Chansler is entitled to all A&S benefits he would otherwise have received from January 8 to 21.

3. John Dickerson

Dickerson, a union member, had reinjured his back in a nonjob-related incident on January 4. On January 21 he was able to return to work and perform some of his duties but instead he joined the strike and commenced picketing activities, i.e., he admittedly joined the picketing by sitting in his truck at the picket line. He considered himself to be a picket. It was common for the pickets to sit around a temporary picket's shack near the plant entrance rather than to engage in ambulatory to and from picketing. Another picket joined Dickerson in the cab of his truck. Later, when Dickerson was fully recuperated, he engaged in picketing by standing with the other pickets. He engaged in no other overt conduct supportive of the strike. I agree with the General Counsel that he is entitled to A&S benefits he otherwise would have received from January 8 to 21.

4. John R. Hixon

Hixon, a union member, received chemical burns on his hands in a domestic accident on January 4. He was released to work on January 28. Hixon admitted that he actively picketed sometime in January before the end of the month and picketed with regularity thereafter. I credit the somewhat more certain testimony of Foreman Carl Jarrell that Hixon picketed as early as January 13. Hixon testified that on Monday, January 7, he visited the plant and was examined by the plant physician who stated that he should not report to work but that he should report to the plant on January 10 presumably to be examined again. Hixon appeared at the plant entrance on January 10, but he observed the picketing and decided that he would honor the picket line. Accordingly, he departed without making any attempt to visit the plant physician. I conclude that by publicly appearing at the picket line and refusing to cross the picket line on January 10, Hixon manifested sufficient overt support of the strike to disqualify himself from any A&S benefits otherwise due him thereafter. I conclude that he is only entitled to whatever benefits he would have received up to January 10, had it not been for the strike activities of other employees.

5. George Grigsby

Grigsby, a union member, suffered a heart ailment on November 7, 1979. He was not medically released until February 28, 1980. He received the union strike benefits but until March 3 he engaged in no overt conduct supportive of the strike. On and after March 3, he admittedly picketed by sitting in his parked truck near the pickets with a picket sign placed adjacent to his truck. He did not report for work on February 29, because he decided to honor the picket line and to support the strike.

I conclude that Grigsby is entitled to A&S benefits he would otherwise have received from January 8 to February 29, had it not been for the strike activities of his fellow workers.

I do not conclude that Grigsby's receipt of strike benefits before February 29, i.e., the "grocery money," disqualified him for A&S benefits as I do not view the receipt of such subsistence as enmeshment in the strike or as a public avowal of support for the strike. The disbursement of "grocery money," i.e., $30–$35 commenced on February 1 and 9 and continued weekly thereafter. To obtain "grocery money" a member was merely required to appear at the downtown union hall, which is distant from the remotely situated plant, and stand in line until the money was disbursed. No questions were asked of the person who sought these funds. No conditions were attached and no expressions of strike support were asked or offered. Having been denied A&S benefits, Grigsby, like the other A&S recipients, with the exception of Zehner, was deprived of his only income source. The money was tendered without condition. It was there for the asking. Because this pittance was received from the Union rather than from a public institution or a private charitable organization does not render receipt as an expression of support of the strike.

6. Joe D. Johnson

On January 4, Johnson, a union member, had undergone minor nonwork-related surgery. He was medically released for work on January 28. Shortly thereafter, he engaged in regular picket duty. He did not report for work on January 29, because he chose to honor the strike. He engaged in no overt actions supportive of the strike prior to January 29, and he is therefore entitled to A&S benefits that he would have otherwise received from January 8 to January 29.

7. Joseph L. Joles

Joles, a union member, was hospitalized for a nonwork related illness on January 6. He spent 14 days in the hospital and another 20 days in domestic confinement. On Thursday, February 10, he was medically released to report for work on Monday, February 14. During the strike he received "grocery money" from the Union.

In-Mid February Joles was driven to the temporary union storefront headquarters across the roadway from the pickets' shanty. He did so because he was told by an unidentified person that he ought to read a posting on the union bulletin board. That posting consisted of a newspaper article which described the Board's Emerson decision. Joles read that notice and departed. He engaged in no other conduct arguably supportive of the strike. While hospitalized he was visited by his foreman. During conversation with his foreman he voiced no opinion with respect to the ongoing strike.

I do not conclude that Joles' brief visitation to read a posting on the union bulletin board at strike headquarters was sufficient enmeshment in strike activities such as to disqualify him from the receipt of A&S benefits. Accordingly he is entitled to A&S benefits that he would otherwise have received from January 8 to April 10, had it not been for the strike activities of his coworkers.

8. Allen W. Morris

Morris, a union member, sustained an ankle injury on December 13 and immediately took sick leave. He was medically released on February 11 and on the next day, instead of reporting to work, he joined the strike and picketed regularly thereafter according to a schedule of picketing devised by the Union. Prior to his medical release, he received strike benefits, i.e., "grocery money," but took no action which evidenced his support of the strike. I conclude that he is entitled to A&S benefits which he would have received from January 8 to February 11, had it not been for the strike.

9. Charles R. Rogers

Rogers was hospitalized on December 7, 1979, and afterward released from the hospital as an outpatient but thereafter readmitted for surgery on his neck on January 8. He was subequently medically released on May 12, 1980. During the strike he also received strike benefits from the Union. Additionally, he admittedly appeared at the picket line. He testified that on occasions he was driven to the picket line by a striking employee who went there to obtain a picketing assignment. Rogers testified that he merely went "to get out . . . a little bit," pursuant to his doctor's suggestion. He testified that he sat in the car at the picket line while his friend obtained a picketing assignment; and that "a couple of times" he got out of the vehicle to display to the pickets the scar on the back of his neck. He testified that he walked with the pickets "not in the activity part" but "just across back on the road there."

Rogers also testified that he was driven down to the picket line "a couple of times" by his neighbor so that Rogers could locate "a guy to build me a porch." During one of these visits, according to Rogers, one or more of the pickets shouted out to him that he ought not picket because he was sick and that he was not "allowed" to picket. Rogers testified that on one of his picket line visitations he was handed a newspaper clipping account of the Emerson decision, by an unidentified person who stated, "This pertains to you. I wouldn't show my face down here."

K.D. Wood, a staff assistant to the supervisor of employee relations, and Louis Butcher, an engineering assistant, were responsible for monitoring and supervising the maintenance of a record of picket line conduct during the strike. I credit their certain, responsive, and convincing testimony. Wood observed Rogers walking with picket Preston at the pickets' shanty near the main plant entrance on January 27. One of Preston's duties was to ascertain whether the Union was in compliance with a court order limiting the Union to two pickets at each gate. He recorded in a log maintained by the Respondent only the names of Preston and Rogers as pickets at that gate. Butcher observed Rogers on February 20 walking back and forth on the picket line, in the company of other pickets, for a substantial period of time.

It is my conclusion that Rogers' presence at the picket line on January 27 and thereafter in the manner described above constituted a manifestation of public support for the strike sufficient to disqualify him from the receipt of A&S benefits. I conclude that Rogers is only entitled to the receipt of A&S benefits he would have otherwise received from January 8 through January 26, had it not been for the strike activities of other unit employees.

10. Kenneth L. Shaffer

Shaffer, a union member, was on medical leave from December 14 until he was medically released on April 15, 1980. He received strike benefits from the Union as did other A&S recipients, by appearing in person or by representative at the downtown union hall. On one or more occasions when he collected strike benefits he conversed with union officers and inquired as to the course of the strike and how long it was expected to endure. He engaged in no other conduct which could arguably be characterized as supportive of the strike. I concluded that Shaffer's mere inquiries fall short of a public expression of support for the strike. I therefore find that Shaffer is entitled to A&S benefits which he would have otherwise received had it not been for his coworkers' strike activities for the period of time from January 8 to April 11, 1980, i.e., the end of the strike.

11. Donald B. Waggoner

Waggoner, a union member and welder, became ill after breathing sulphuric fumes on the January 2 night shift. He was on sick leave thereafter and received A&S benefits on January 7 and 8. On January 7 he was examined by the plant physician and told to report back on January 14. Waggoner testified that he did not report back to the plant physician on January 14 because he still felt ill. However, Waggoner admitted that on some occasion prior to January 16 he appeared at the temporary union strike headquarters near the picket shanty to read the posted picket schedule so that he could determine when to commence picketing. He testified that his posted assigned date for picketing was January 10, but that he was still ill on January 10 and therefore did not report for picket duty on that date. Waggoner testified that he commenced regular picketing duties on January 16.

It is apparent from Waggoner's testimony that he had decided to support the strike as soon as he felt able to be present on the picket line. Inasmuch as he admittedly appeared on the picket line to ascertain that his prospective picketing duty was scheduled for January 10, he must have presented himself at the strike headquarters on January 9. Furthermore, since he presented himself at the temporary strike headquarters, i.e., 15–20 feet from the actual picket line, and for the purpose of reading the posted picket schedule to ascertain his tour of picket duty, I conclude that he enmeshed himself in the strike to an extent that he is disqualified from the receipt of any A&S benefits after January 8.

12. Joe Weger

Weger, an employee of 15 years' tenure, had experienced reoccurring medical problems with respect to his inner ear over a period of 10 years. From January 7 through January 8 he received A&S benefits while on sick leave. He testified that he joined the strike on January 13 and commenced picketing duties. Weger engaged in no conduct supportive of the strike prior to January 13.

It appears that there is a factual dispute as to whether Weger was so ill as to have precluded him from working between January 8 and January 13. The examining physician executed a report dated January 4 which suggests that it was not recommended that Weger refrain from working. The Respondent takes the position that Weger was erroneously paid A&S benefits on January 7. His benefits were terminated, however, because of the strike activities of other employees. The Respondent at no time made a determination that Weger was not able to perform his work duties from January 7 through January 13, and refrained from making such determination because of the pendency of this unfair labor practice charge. Inasmuch as the evidence is insufficient to make any such determination herein, I conclude only that Weger was entitled to A&S benefits that he would have received from January 8 to January 13 had it not been for the strike activities of his fellow workers. I leave to the compliance stage of these proceedings the resolution of whether he would have been precluded from A&S benefits for any other reason.

13. Clarence Zehner

Zehner, a union member, suffered what appeared to be the symptoms of a heart ailment on January 2, 1980. He went on sick leave and received A&S benefits. After taking a "treadmill" test on January 11, he was medically released to work as of January 14. Instead of reporting to work on January 14 he joined the strike and commenced picketing on a regular basis. Prior to January 14 he was physically unable to picket. He engaged in no conduct supportive of the strike prior to January 14. I conclude that he is entitled to A&S benefits that he would have otherwise received from January 8 to January 14 had it not been for the strike action of other employees.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. On January 8, 1980, the Respondent notified employees that accident and sickness benefits for union members would be discontinued upon the commencement of a lawful strike and thereby interfered with its employees' rights under the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. On January 8, 1980, the Respondent discontinued accident and sickness benefits for employees who were members of the Union and who had been receiving said benefits prior to a lawful strike engaged in by other employees represented by the Union, and of whom the Respondent had no information that they had shown public support for the strike; and by such conduct the Respondent interfered with its employees' rights to engage in protected concerted and union activities thereby violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

The Remedy

It having been found that the Respondent unlawfully withheld accident and sickness benefits to employees referred to in this decision, it is recommended that the Respondent be ordered to pay each of them whatever accident and sickness benefits were due to them from January 8, 1980, to the date of their recovery or the date they actively participated in strike activity or publicly supported the strike, whichever was sooner, with interest, had their fellow employees not engaged in a strike.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 26 August 1983 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs[2] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, City Cab Company of Orlando, Inc., Yellow Cab Company of Orlando, Inc. d/b/a Yellow Cab Company and Dixie Cab Company, Orlando, Florida, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We note that the Respondent does not attempt to relitigate in this proceeding the status of its drivers as employees within the scope of Sec. 2(3) of the Act.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] In the penultimate paragraph of sec. III,A,3(b) of his decision, the judge states that Union Secretary Angelo Spedale testified that there were two other cab companies in Orlando. The record establishes that this evidence was introduced through the testimony of Respondent's night manager Duane Johnson. Also, in the first paragraph of sec. III,B,4 of his decision, the judge states that the Respondent's argument that the complaint is defective because not based on timely filed charges is "expressly linked" by the Respondent to its argument that the settlement agreement was improperly set aside by the Regional Director. However, in its posthearing brief to the judge, and again in its brief in support of its exceptions, the Respondent did assert, as an alternative argument, that even if the settlement agreement had been properly set aside, the complaint would still be barred by Sec. 10(b). We reject the Respondent's arguments in this regard. In affirming the judge's finding that the settlement agreement was properly set aside, we find it unnecessary to address the issue of whether the complaint would have been barred by Sec. 10(b) if the settlement agreement had not been properly set aside.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The charges in this proceeding were filed on dates described hereinafter by Yellow, City, Dixie Independent Cab Drivers Association (the Charging Party or the Union). A consolidated complaint issued on September 1, 1982, alleging that City Cab Company of Orlando, Inc., Yellow Cab Company of Orlando, Inc. d/b/a Yellow Cab Company and Dixie Cab Company (collectively Respondent) changed the cab rental fees paid by, or the working conditions of, its drivers, in 29 separate instances: 6 on May 1, 1979, 9 in the last 4 months of 1979, 10 in 1980, and 4 in 1981. The complaint alleges that these acts were engaged in without giving the Union prior notice and an opportunity to bargain, and were therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

A hearing was held before me on these matters in Orlando, Florida, on November 15 and 16, 1982. On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and consideration of briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The various companies collectively designated as Respondent are affiliated business enterprises with common officers, ownership, directors, management, supervision, a common labor policy, and shared common premises and facilities. They have provided services for each other, have interchanged personnel with each other, and have held themselves out to the public as a single integrated enterprise. Because of these factors, Respondent constitutes a single employer within the meaning of the Act. During the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased and received at its Orlando, Florida facility parts and supplies valued in excess of $10,000, which were shipped directly to it from points located outside the State of Florida. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges and the answer denies that the Union is a labor organization. However, on October 26, 1977, the Union was certified by the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) as the exclusive representative of Respondent's drivers (G.C. Exh. 14). Thereafter, the Board found with judicial approval that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. City Cab Co. of Orlando, 242 NLRB 94 (1979), enfd. 628 F.2d 261 (D.C. Cir. 1980). I reaffirm these prior findings.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Factual Summary

1. The allegations of unilateral changes in Case 12–CA–8705 and the settlement agreement

After the Union's certification in 1977 as described above, the parties bargained, and entered into an interim collective-bargaining agreement in March 1978. Thereafter, based on a judicial decision in another case finding certain taxi drivers to be independent contractors, Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union in November 1978. The Union filed a charge in December 1978 (Case 12–CA–8436) and, following the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, the Board's Decision and Order issued in May 1979, finding that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to bargain with the Union. City Cab Co. of Orlando, supra. Respondent thereafter filed a petition for review of that decision, and the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement. The Union made a written request that Respondent bargain with it, and the Company answered with a written refusal (G.C. Exhs. 4 and 5).

On July 3, 1979, 2 months after issuance of the Board's decision in the first case, the Union filed the charge in Case 12–CA–8705, and complaint issued on July 25, 1979, alleging six instances of unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of the drivers' employment on May 1, 1979, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1). In general, these constituted increases in the Company's charges to the drivers for leasing a cab, or as the Company put it, "selling services" to the drivers.[1]

The following month, August 1979, the parties entered into an informal settlement agreement with the approval of the Regional Director for Region 12. The agreement itself is on one of the Board's standard forms for such purposes, which include a provision that the charged party will "make whole the employees named below by payment to each of them of the amount set opposite his or her names." No employees are so named in the agreement, but the parties included a clause in the backpay section that "[b]ackpay will be computed in accordance with established agency policy" (G.C. Exh. 3(a)). Union President Cruz testified that he understood that the agreement required the Company to compensate the drivers for all monetary losses from 1979 until the date of an agreement on rental rates.

The agreement also requires the charged party to post a notice, and to comply with its terms and provisions. In the notice Respondent states that it will if necessary make whole any employees who have incurred monetary loss as a result of "any" unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment (G.C. Exh. 3(c)). A further clause in the agreement specifies that execution of the agreement does not constitute an admission that the charged party has violated the Act (G.C. Exh. 3(a)).

At the same time, the parties and the Regional Director for Region 12 entered into a stipulation providing that the settlement agreement would be null and void if the reviewing court in the first case rejected the Board's position that the drivers were employees as defined in the Act. On the other hand, if the court rejected Respondent's position that the drivers were independent contractors, then Respondent agreed "to remedy the violations alleged in the instant case by immediately abiding by and giving full force and effect to the Attached Informal Settlement agreement" (G.C. Exh. 3(e)).

During the remainder of 1979 and the first part of 1980, Respondent pursued its appeal from the Board's decision in the first case. The decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, enforcing the Board's Order, issued on July 30, 1980 (id.). Respondent filed a petition for rehearing in August 1980, and this was denied in September 1980.

2. The bargaining history, and Respondent's objections to Union President Cruz

William Cruz,[2] the Union's president, had worked for and had been discharged by Respondent. Cruz filed an unfair labor practice charge and then withdrew it. He thereafter drove a cab, and was active in the organization of an "Independent Taxi Owners Association" (IATO). In July 1980 he issued a notice to members of the association, in which he referred to the members as "we (Independent Owners)" (R. Exh. 3). Cruz drove a cab for another company, but was not an owner of the company according to the credible testimony of Angel Santiago. Nor was he a member of IATO since his wife owned the cab which he drove.

Following denial of Respondent's request for rehearing in September 1980, the Union's attorney sent a letter to Respondent's attorney in November 1980 requesting bargaining "after three years of litigation" (G.C. Exh. 9). On the same day, Respondent's attorney wrote a letter to Cruz asserting that the Company was not obligated to bargain with a committee of which Cruz was a member, because of his "past conduct" as a driver for the Company and his "present position with another competitive taxicab company" (G.C. Exh. 8). Nonetheless, Cruz was present as a member of the union negotiating team when the parties commenced bargaining in January 1981.

The court's decision in the first case shows that Respondent had 115 out of a total of 127 taxicab permits issued by the city of Orlando (City Cab Co. of Orlando, 628 F.2d 261 (D.C. Cir. 1980)). Cruz spoke with the city's mayor in favor of "deregulation," the issuance of additional permits, and what he called the "free enterprise" system. The principal proponent of deregulation was the city attorney, according to Company President Mears. In February 1981, Cruz testified at a meeting of the Orlando city council, and opposed the system of rental fees charged to drivers by Respondent (R. Exh. 4). In March the city increased the allowable number of permits to 220, which posed a threat to Respondent according to Mears. He protested Cruz' actions, and, in April 1981, filed a charge against the Union alleging violation of Section 8(b)(3) (R. Exh. 5). Cruz then voluntarily withdrew from the contract negotiations pending disposition of the charge.

On June 12, 1981, the Regional Director for Region 12 dismissed the 8(b)(3) charge. His letter of dismissal indicates that Respondent had made a number of allegations.

[1] The Company also employs "commission drivers," who are paid a commission on all fares. They are not involved in this proceeding. As indicated in the prior record, the Company attempted to change from commission drivers to contract drivers, whom it called independent contractors. Company President Mears testified in the instant proceeding that this was not entirely successful, because the contract drivers would refuse to accept a call if they considered it unprofitable. The Company was therefore unable to provide complete service. Accordingly, it now retains a limited number of commission drivers, whom it may order to take calls, according to Mears.

In response, the Regional Director stated that "there is no evidence that Cruz has operated a business in competition with the Employer or has been affiliated with any competitor of the Employer." As for the evidence that Cruz supported deregulation which would hurt Respondent economically, the dismissal letter observes that "the union represents commissioned drivers of the Employer whom deregulation would help, as well as salaried drivers. Cruz' pursuit of the interests of those bargaining unit employees whose interests do not totally coincide with the Employer's is deemed insufficient to bar him from bargaining with the Employer on behalf of all unit employees" (R. Exh. 6).

Cruz thereafter returned to the negotiations, and was present on July 21, 1981, when the parties reached agreement on cab rental rates, including a $42 daily rate. This was incorporated in a collective-bargaining agreement which the parties executed on February 2, 1982 (G.C. Exh. 7).

3. The Region's efforts to secure compliance with the settlement agreement

As these events were taking place, the compliance officer for Region 12 was attempting to obtain compliance with the settlement agreement in Case 12–CA–8705, following the court's denial of Respondent's petition for rehearing in September 1980. Respondent did post the notice set forth in the agreement. However, the Region was unsuccessful in getting Respondent to undertake the additional action which, the Region believed, was required by the settlement agreement.

a. The backpay issue

Robert R. Morley, an experienced compliance officer, testified that Respondent owed "substantial backpay" under the settlement agreement. He computed the amount due under existing Board policy, utilizing three different time periods. The amounts under these three alternative calculations were $200,000, $400,000, and $800,000, respectively. In making these computations, Morley used the drivers' records of their trips, since the Company contended that it did not keep such records beyond 90 days.

Morley was unable to obtain agreement on backpay from Respondent and, following a conference with the Regional Director in September 1981, Respondent delivered a letter to the Regional Director setting forth the conclusion that it did not owe any backpay, with the following arguments.

1. The Company has not increased the rental rates charged to drivers since the date of the court's decision, and therefore owes no backpay. (This argument implies that the settlement agreement requires compliance only from the date of the court's decision.)

2. There could have been no bargaining with the Union from August 1979 until September 1980 because the Union was "defunct," and its president Cruz was attempting to destroy Respondent's business.

3. The settlement agreement only contemplated backpay as a result of "monetary loss" sustained by the drivers. Even if there had been "improper 'unilateral changes,'" there was no such loss for reasons which are "a bit complex." The taxicab business is "volatile," and is related to seasonal changes. "When the rates are increased some drivers leave, thus leaving more business for the remaining drivers." Respondent supplied data purporting to show an increase in rental rates from 1978 through 1980, and an increase in drivers' net income. Accordingly, it argued in its letter, additional backpay to the drivers would provide them with a "windfall" (G.C. Exh. 15).

On the other hand, compliance officer Morley, who examined the tax records of some the drivers, testified that most of them asserted their income had declined after the rental changes. Union Vice President Robert Harris gave similar testimony. As for any causal relationship between the rental changes and what the Company contended were increases in net driver income, Mears agreed that there was one minor fare increase allowed by the city during the period covered by his figures. He also stated that his computations did not include the price of gasoline purchased by the drivers.

In July 1982, Respondent delivered a letter to Regional compliance officer Morley offering to pay "50% of the amount computed per driver for period involved" (G.C. Exh. 16).[3] The Region considered this offer to be unacceptable.

b. Respondent's rationale for rental increases

Mears provided a rationale for higher rental fees charged to the drivers. Thus, he contended that the higher fees reduce the number of drivers willing to pay it, and thus increases the amount of business available to the remaining drivers. He was asked whether these remaining drivers had to work harder in order to make the same income they had earned at the lower rental fees. Although Mears contended that they did not have to work any "longer," he agreed that they had to make "more trips." In general, Mears argued that the Company had to "walk a fine line" in providing needed revenue for the Company, a fair living for the drivers, and adequate taxicab service for the city. Accordingly, he asserted that the rate changes were in accordance with past practice and were economically justifiable.

Mears stated that the "history of rates has generally been higher not lower." He said there were "seasonal adjustments" and "technical adjustments." As an example of the latter, the company president testified that it is difficult to get drivers to work on holidays. Accordingly, he reduces the rates during these periods to induce more drivers to take out cabs. Other factors taken into account are consumer demand, and changes in the rates which the city allows the drivers to charge the customer. If that rate goes up, then, as Mears frankly conceded, the Company wants a share of the increase. He defended an "airport surcharge" added to the fares of airport customers. In general, according to Mears, the Company seeks to meet the demand for taxicab services with the least possible number of cabs on the street. It also tries to limit the mileage driven by the cabs, by use of any daily mileage surcharge.

Mears noted that, although there were rental changes subsequent to the date that the court denied Respondent's request for a rehearing (September 1980), none of these changes went above the rate then in effect, $36, until the date the parties agreed on a $42 rate in July 1981.

Other witnesses gave different versions of the rate changes. Angelo Spedale, a union official, said that Mears changed the rates so often that the drivers could not keep up with them. Duane Johnson was a former union president who was replaced by Cruz. Called as a witness by Respondent, he affirmed on cross-examination that the Union was formed because Respondent was changing the rates "unpredictably," that the drivers did not know what to expect, and that a few of them were forced out of business by the changes. Although there were two other small cab companies according to Spedale, they had only about 12 cabs, and Respondent was the only employer who, as a practical matter, was available to an individual who wanted to drive a cab.

Robert Harris, vice president of the Union, denied that the Union's agreement to the $42 rate in July 1981 was occasioned by agreement that a higher rate would result in larger earnings for drivers. Although there were seasonal fluctuations, the drivers lost money during a 2-year period. The Union agreed to the $42 rate in July 1981 because they were already being charged a mileage charge which brought the previous $36 rate up to about $40, and because the city had just granted a fare increase to which the drivers were "held hostage" (because the Company wanted a share of the higher fare). Harris opposed the airport surcharge as coming out of the tip which the driver could expect. If the surcharge is not collected from the customer, the driver has to pay it.

The parties stipulated that Respondent engaged in five of the six changes on May 1, 1979, alleged in the complaint in Case 12–CA–8705. They also stipulated to 10 additional such changes in 1979, 5 in 1980 (including 3 after September 1980, the date of the court's denial of Respondent's petition for rehearing), and 4 in 1981. One of the latter, reinstatement of a daily mileage surcharge on July 13, 1981, was the subject of a new unfair labor practice charge in Case 12–CA–9788. Fifteen of the changes increased the charges, surcharges, or late penalties which the drivers were required to pay, while one altered the bidding procedure, and another increased the minimum number of shift assignments to warrant issuance of a cab to a driver. Seven of the changes reduced the charges to the drivers.

Cruz testified that Respondent did not give the Union notice of these changes or an opportunity to bargain over them. Mears contended that the changes were posted on the bulletin board, that Cruz must have known of them, and that the Union never requested bargaining concerning the changes. Mears agreed that he had about two meetings with drivers to discuss changes and that he did not invite union officials.

d. Setting aside the settlement agreement, and issuance of the consolidated complaint

By letter to the parties dated August 26, 1982, the Regional Director for Region 12 set aside the settlement agreement because it had "failed in its purpose and because of allegations of post-settlement violations of the Act" (G.C. Exh. 3(f)). Thereafter, as indicated above, the consolidated complaint issued on September 1, 1982.

B. Legal Conclusions

1. Interpretation of the settlement agreement

Respondent contends that the settlement agreement requires it to remedy only the violations alleged in the complaint in Case 12–CA–8705, i.e., the unilateral changes on May 1, 1979. "[T]here was no promise to refrain from making future changes except one that by the terms of the settlement would not take effect until the appellate court had issued its ruling."

I conclude that this argument is erroneous. The settlement agreement requires Respondent to comply with the terms of the notice, and the latter requires the Company to make employees whole for monetary loss suffered as a result of "any" unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment. When Respondent executed the stipulation, it agreed to "give full force and effect" to the settlement agreement upon losing its appeal, and thereby undertook to make whole employees suffering monetary loss as a result of "any" unilateral changes.

As a corollary argument, Respondent seizes on the requirement in the stipulation that it give full force and effect to the settlement agreement "immediately" (on loss of its appeal), and argues that this shows that prior violations—other than those allege in the complaint—were not included. This is not a reasonable interpretation of the language in the stipulation. The word "immediately" describes when it is that Respondent shall comply with the settlement agreement, i.e., without delay on loss of its appeal. It does not specify the actions required to constitute compliance with the settlement agreement. Having been charged with unfair labor practices, and having conditionally agreed in August 1979 to remedy "any" such practice upon rejection of its position by the court, Respondent committed additional such practices at its peril.

This dispute has limited relevance in any event, since it pertains only to the unilateral changes taking place after May 1, 1979, and before July 30, 1980, when the court issued its "rulings" in September (in the language of Respondent's brief). Respondent admits that the agreement covers the May 1, 1979 changes, and all those taking place after the court's "ruling." As the record shows, Respondent committed further violations after the court issued its ruling, and, indeed, committed seven of them after September 1980, when Respondent's petition for rehearing was denied.

2. Setting aside the settlement agreement

a. The continuing unilateral changes

Respondent's continued unilateral changes, which I conclude hereinafter were unfair labor practices, are sufficient to justify setting aside the settlement agreement. Respondent argues to the contrary, citing Radio Station KHMO, 102 NLRB 26 (1962); Deister Concentrator Co., 253 NLRB 358 (1980); and Utrad Corp., 185 NLRB 434 (1970). Respondent apparently relies on KHMO because of its asserted belief that the unilateral changes herein did not violate the settlement agreement. This is clearly incorrect, and KHMO actually supports the General Counsel's position. Deister is not on point, because the postsettlement violations therein were unrelated to the presettlement violations, whereas they are closely related in the case at bar. Indeed, they are identical in nature. Utrad is also inapposite, because the postsettlement violations were remote in time and did not affect the remedial order, whereas the unilateral changes herein continued in an unbroken sequence and directly affect the remedial order. Authority for the Regional Director's withdrawal of the settlement agreement herein may be found in Sheet Metal Workers Local 80 (Sise Heating Co.), 236 NLRB 41 (1978); and Laborers (Joseph's Landscaping Service), 154 NLRB 1384 (1965).

b. The absence of agreement on backpay

The language of the settlement on backpay appears to indicate that Respondent agreed to pay backpay to its employees "in accordance with established agency policy." It is also clear from Cruz' testimony that the Union expected the Company to pay backpay to its employees. As an additional undoubted fact, Respondent and Region 12 could not agree on an appropriate backpay formula or amount. Indeed, at one point in the negotiations, the Company contended that it did not owe any backpay, because the drivers had not suffered any "monetary loss." Respondent continues this argument in its brief herein. Respondent's only offer—"50% of the amount computed per driver for period involved"—is so vague as to be meaningless. In similar circumstances the Board has concluded as follows:

> It appears obvious . . . that there was no meeting of the minds when the settlement agreements were executed. . . Respondent expected a liability substantially less than . . . the amount ultimately computed by the Regional Director. And the Regional Director was apparently faced with uncertainty as to the choice of formula for making his determination. In such circumstances, we believe that it would be inequitable to hold the parties to the commitments contained in the settlement agreements, and we find that the Regional Director did not commit reversible error in withdrawing approval of the settlement and reopening the case for further proceedings. While settlement agreements are entitled to be treated with sanctity and should not be lightly set aside, we recognize that circumstances can exist which warrant permitting withdrawal from a settlement agreement. Such is the case here. [Motion Picture Photographers (MPO-TV of California), 197 NLRB 1187 (1972).]

I conclude that the same principle is applicable in this case, and constituted further warrant for the Regional Director's setting aside the settlement agreement.

3. Respondent's unilateral changes of its drivers' working conditions

"Initially, it is well settled that unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment, as admitted herein, without bargaining with a union certified as exclusive representative of the unit employees, violates Section 8(a)(5)." Amsterdam Printing Corp., 223 NLRB 370, 372 (1976).

Respondent, however, argues that "changes which are continuations of past and established practices do not violate Section 8(a)(5) even in the absence of bargaining . . . . Quite simply, the law is that where changes are a normal and established fact of life for the employer and its employees, then the existence of an obligation to bargain does not require a change in that pattern." Respondent relies on two decisions by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, NLRB v. Phil-Modes, 406 F.2d 556 (5th Cir. 1969), enfg. in part 162 NLRB 1435 (1967), and NLRB v. Southern Coach & Body Co., 336 F.2d 214 (5th Cir. 1964), denying enf. of 141 NLRB 80 (1963). In Phil-Modes, where the employer shifted from a piecework to an hourly rate of compensation during sample-making periods, the court's decision reads in relevant part as follows:

> We cannot agree from the record before us that a unilateral change in the wages of employees was shown. The evidence shows that the shift to hourly pay during the sample-making period had been effected every year that the respondents had been in operation. While the sample-making period lasted for different lengths of time each year, the beginning, duration, and end of the period were "triggered" each year by the demands of customers, which in turn depended on whether the season for the coats manufactured by the respondents was early or late. There has been no finding that the hourly rate paid during the sample-making period of the year in question was different from that paid in the sample-making period of any other year or even that the total compensation during the sample-making period had varied. [Id. 406 F.2d at 557.]

In Southern Coach & Body, where the employer followed past practice in giving automatic wages to new employees 3 and 6 months after they began work, and in paying employees according to the operation they performed, the court states:

> [T]he Supreme Court clearly indicated in both the Crompton-Highland[4] and Katz[5] cases that a mere continuation of the status quo during the bargaining period cannot constitute a disparagement of the bargaining process; there must be an actual change in working conditions. Therefore, as to the three-month and six-month automatic increases, there is no evidence on which to base a conclusion that section 8(a)(5) was violated.
> An additional number of wage increases resulted from the company's established policy of paying an employee the wage rate applicable to a new operation when it was necessary that he perform that operation. . . . There is no indication in the record that the promotions deviated from past company policy, or that there was any motive other than economic necessity. None of the rates themselves were altered in any fashion[.] [T]he Board argues that the company was required to consult the union about each of these changes because each involved an element of discretion which precluded the union from ascertaining whether there had been a deviation from past company policy. In support of this contention, the Board relies on NLRB v. Katz, supra, which held, inter alia, that the granting of individual merit increases without consultation with the bargaining agent constituted an 8(a)(5) violation. We feel that there is a distinction between individual merit increases and the promotions which were made in the instant case. Individual merit increases are discretionary increases in pay based upon management's assessment of the performance of an individual employee. They are not motivated by economic necessity, but are a means of rewarding favored employees. The promotions involved here, on the other hand, were necessitated by the strike, and did not involve discretionary raises in pay. Hence, we do not feel that section 8(a)(5) precludes an employer from making the necessary adjustments in his work force which were made here in the absence of some evidence that he has deviated from established company policy or has refused to bargain with respect to the standards to be used for promotion. [Id. 236 F.2d at 217–218.]

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit addressed the same problem as follows:

> In Katz the Supreme Court held that an employer cannot unilaterally change conditions of employment during the course of negotiations with a union; if the company desires to alter a preexisting practice, it must give the union an opportunity to bargain over the change. The Court applied this principle to distinguish between automatic wage increases to which the employer has already committed itself and wage increases that are "in no sense automatic, but [are] informed by a large measure of discretion." 369 U.S. at 746, 82 S.Ct. at 1113. The employer would be required to grant the automatic wage increase unless it notified the union that it wished to make a change in the existing conditions of employment and gave the union an opportunity to bargain over the change. However, the employer could not unilaterally grant a nonautomatic, discretionary wage increase since "[t]here simply is no way in such a case for a union to know whether or not there has been a substantial departure from past practice." Id. Thus, the union could "insist that the company negotiate as to the procedures and criteria for determining such increases." [NLRB v. Blevins Popcorn Co., 659 F.2d 1173 (D.C. Cir. 1981)].

I conclude that the record in this case does not justify Respondent in making unilateral changes in its employees' working conditions under the criteria set forth by the Supreme Court in Katz and explicated by the courts cited above. Respondent had not committed itself to any fixed practice, such as shifting employees from piecework to hourly compensation during sample-making periods, giving new employees automatic increases after specific periods of employment, or changing employees' pay in accordance with the operation they were performing.

If Respondent had any practice, it was simply one of constant change, caused by a multiplicity of factors. Some of these, such as the totality of consumer demand and the amount of fares allowed by the city, were beyond Respondent's control. Others, particularly the number of drivers willing to work for Respondent, were directly controlled by Respondent's rental rates. The evidence shows that this factor was one of the most if not the most significant of the factors which Respondent considered. To argue, as does Respondent, that its changes in rental rates were merely an impersonal response to the market, i.e., the supply of drivers available at specific rates, overlooks the fact that it is this market, found in the employer-employee relationship and the terms and conditions of employment, which Federal labor policy seeks to control, and in which an employer is subject to legal restraints.

Mears agreed that he had to walk "a fine line" in juggling the demands of the city, the financial needs of his company, and the demands of his employees. He thus exercised a high degree of discretion in changing the rental rates. He did so without giving notice to the Union, and held meetings with employees on the increases without inviting the Union.

Respondent argues that the Union failed to protest the changes for an inordinate period of time. This argument turns the entire settlement procedure upside down. The Union had alleged unlawful unilateral action in the first charge, and the Region was attempting to get Respondent to comply with its promise not to engage in any further changes. It would have been useless for the Union to have protested each additional change under these circumstances. As to each change, the Union "was presented with a fait accompli, making a request to bargain about it a futile and unnecessary gesture." Peat Mfg. Co., 261 NLRB 240 fn. 2 (1982).

[5] NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962).

I therefore find that, by engaging in the above-described unilateral changes in its employees' terms and conditions of employment, Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. Respondent's additional arguments

Respondent presents an elaborate argument to the effect that the complaint is defective because it is not based on a charge filed within 6 months of the alleged unfair labor practices, and is therefore contrary to the mandate of Section 10(b) of the Act. However, this argument is expressly linked by Respondent to its contention that the settlement agreement was improperly set aside—an argument I have rejected. The complaint herein was clearly warranted on the basis of the two charges which were filed, under applicable law.

Respondent also argues that the receipt into evidence of details of the settlement discussions prejudiced its case because "the Judge has heard that the companies were willing to pay some money to settle the case." Accordingly, Respondent argues, a new trial is required.

This argument has no merit. Testimony with respect to Respondent's willingness to pay backpay was directly related to its undertaking to do so in the settlement agreement, and to the issue of whether that agreement had properly been set aside. The evidence of Respondent's negotiations with the compliance officer showed that it denied that it had any obligation to pay backpay. The only evidence of its willingness to do so is its letter of July 1982—a document submitted by the General Counsel on redirect examination of compliance officer Morley after Respondent initially raised the subject on cross-examination. As noted above, the letter was received with the express provision that it was not to be considered evidence of any unfair labor practice.

Respondent also presents an argument based on the conduct of Union President Cruz, which requires no comment in light of the facts set forth above.

In accordance with my findings above, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. City Cab Company of Orlando, Inc., Yellow Cab Company of Orlando, Inc. d/b/a Yellow Cab Company and Dixie Cab Company together constitute a single employer engaged in commerce with the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Yellow, City, Dixie Independent Cab Drivers Association is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following unit is now and has been at all times material herein an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(c) of the Act:

> All regular and part-time taxi drivers at Respondent's West Gore Street, Orlando, Florida, facility, including contract drivers and Winter Garden drivers; excluding all other employees, dispatchers, starters, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. On October 14, 1977, a majority of the employees in the unit described above, by secret-ballot election conducted by the Board, selected the above-named Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent, and, on October 26, 1977, the Board certified the Union as such exclusive representative.

5. At all times since October 26, 1977, and continuing to date, the Union has been and is the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit described above for the purpose of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

6. By engaging in unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of its employees' employment on 24 separate occasions from 1979 through 1981, without notice to the Union or an opportunity for it to bargain concerning those changes, Respondent thereby committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. On August 30, 1979, a settlement agreement entered into by Respondent and the Union, intended to remedy some of the practices described above, was approved by the Regional Director for Region 12.

8. On August 26, 1982, the Regional Director for Region 12 appropriately set aside the aforesaid settlement agreement, because it had failed in its purpose and because of postsettlement violations of the Act.

9. The foregoing unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

10. Respondent has not violated the Act except as specified.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. Thus, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist from engaging in unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of its employees' employment, that it notify the Union in advance of any contemplated changes and give it an opportunity to bargain concerning them.

It is also appropriate that Respondent be required to make whole, with interest, all employees who may have suffered losses in earnings as a result of said unilateral changes in their terms and conditions of employment. El Centro Mental Health Center, 266 NLRB 1 fn. 1 (1982). Accordingly, I shall include such a provision in my recommended Order.[6]

The General Counsel also appears to request issuance of a general bargaining order. It should be noted that the violations herein took place prior to the parties' execution of a collective-bargaining agreement. There is no allegation that Respondent is failing to abide by the terms of this agreement and, accordingly, I consider issuance of a general bargaining order to be inappropriate.

I shall also recommend that Respondent be required to post appropriate notices.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The Respondent, City Cab Company of Orlando, Inc., Yellow Cab Company of Orlando, Inc. d/b/a Yellow Cab Company and Dixie Cab Company, Orlando, Florida, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Unilaterally changing the rental rates or other terms and conditions of employment of their drivers, without giving advance notice thereof to Yellow, City, Dixie Independent Cab Drivers Association, and affording it an opportunity to bargain concerning any such changes.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole its drivers for any loss of earnings they may have suffered, with interest thereon, as a result of Respondent's unilateral changes in the rental rates and other terms and conditions of employment of its drivers.[8]

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Orlando, Florida facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 12, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found herein.[10]

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[8] Interest on amounts due under this paragraph shall be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[9] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[10] The General Counsel's unopposed motion to correct transcript, attached as "Appendix B," is granted. [Appendix B has been omitted from publication.]

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change the rental rates or other terms and conditions of employment of our drivers, without giving advance notice thereof to Yellow, City, Dixie Independent Cab Drivers Association and affording it an opportunity to bargain concerning any such changes.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole our drivers for any loss of earnings they may have suffered, with interest, as a result of our unilateral changes in their rental rates and other terms and conditions of employment.

9 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 20 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Lawrence W. Cullen issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Robins Federal Credit Union, Warner Robins, Georgia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

LAWRENCE W. CULLEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me on February 14 and 15, 1984, in Warner Robins, Georgia, pursuant to a complaint filed by the Acting Regional Director for Region 10 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on January 13, 1984. The complaint, as amended at the hearing, alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by the unlawful interrogation of an employee by Respondent Robins Federal Credit Union (Respondent) and a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by the unlawful discharge of an employee because of her engagement in protected concerted activities. The original charge was filed on December 5, 1983, by the Retail Clerks Union Local No. 1063 (the Union). Respondent by its answer filed on January 20, 1984, as amended at the hearing, has denied that it has committed any violations of the Act.

After due consideration of the evidence presented at the hearing and the briefs filed by the General Counsel and counsel for the Respondent, I hereby make the following recommended:[1]

[1] The following includes a composite of the testimony of the witnesses at the hearing.

I. JURISDICTION

The Business of Respondent

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and that Respondent is and has been at all times mate private nonprofit corporation chartered by the Na Credit Union Administration, with an office and pl business located in Warner Robins, Georgia, wher engaged in the extension of consumer credit to m civilian and military personnel of the United States ernment; that during the past calendar year (prior filing of the complaint), a representative period spondent purchased and received at its office in W Robins goods and services valued in excess of $50,0 rectly from suppliers located outside the State of gia; and that Respondent is, and has been at all time terial, an employer engaged in commerce withi meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and that the Union is, and has been at all times mate labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[2]

A. Background

This case involves the discharge of Debra Montf loan officer of Respondent, who had been employ Respondent for 10-1/2 years prior to her dischar October 19. The General Counsel contends that ford was discharged because of her engagement i tected concerted activities in organizing on behalf Union and that Respondent thereby violated S 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The Respondent while ting knowledge of Montford's union activities co that the General Counsel has failed to prove a facie case as it has failed to prove union animus part of the Respondent or that the reason given f discharge was pretextual. Specifically, Respondent tends that Montford was discharged for cause beca her violation of a written policy of Respondent pr ing the issuance of loans to relatives by loan office engaging in "self dealing." Also alleged as a violat Section 8(a)(1) of the Act is the interrogation of a ployee concerning the union campaign by a supervi Respondent on November 19 following the dischar Montford.

B. The Discharge of Debra Montford

Montford initially became a loan officer wit spondent in 1981, having previously filled several positions in her employment with Respondent incl that of loan clerk. A loan officer has the responsibi interviewing applicants for loans of various type signature loans, automobile loans), taking the loan ground and information required to determine if should be made, and either making a decision to issue the loan or referring the loan decision to the credit committee of Respondent which then passes on the loan decision. Respondent's written loan policy provided to loan officers and to credit committee members states in part that

> Credit Committee and Loan Officers will not [emphasis in original] process or act on applications submitted by their relatives or members of their families, and
> Credit union officials and employees have an obligation to the members to avoid all self-dealing and self-serving.

After a loan has been approved by a loan officer, the file is put on a stack to be processed by the loan clerks who prepare the documentation, check the application, and issue the check to the borrower and/or to the seller of the item being financed (i.e., an automobile). The loan clerk also has the responsibility for calling the sellers of the motor vehicles and verbally informing them of Respondent's lien and arranging for the title to be processed through the State reflecting the purchase and the lien of Respondent.

On April 19 Michael Driggers, who is married to a cousin of Montford, applied for a loan of $6000 with Respondent to buy a 1983 truck for $7500 from Dixie Truck & Parts Co. The truck had been damaged shortly after it had been sold as a new vehicle by Youman Chevrolet to a Jim W. Renters. The truck had been "totaled" for insurance purposes and repurchased by Youman Chevrolet as a trade-in from Renters who ordered another new truck from Youman to replace the damaged vehicle. The amount of the damage to the truck paid by the insurer was $2900. The original suggested retail purchase price of the truck at the time of its purchase from Youman Chevrolet by Renters was $10,500. Youman Used-Car Manager William Durban testified that he called several wholesale used car dealers and agreed to sell the damaged vehicle to Dixie Truck & Parts Co. (a/k/a Dixie Motors), the highest bidder. Dixie Motors contacted Jimmy Sims of H & S Wholesale Motors, who purchases damaged vehicles for repair and resale. Sims is an uncle of Debra Montford and the father-in-law of Driggers. Sims and Driggers testified that Sims told Driggers of the truck, and Driggers agreed to purchase it for his own use. When Driggers applied for the automobile loan, he was interviewed by Debra Montford and the loan was issued that date by Montford. Montford also called Dixie Motors to secure Respondent's lien, although this is normally done by the loan clerk rather than by the loan officer. The truck was (according to the testimony of Sims and Driggers) repurchased by Sims from Driggers as Driggers decided he could not make the payments and the truck was resold by Sims to C. E. Edwards in May 1983. However, Respondent was not informed of this transaction, nor was the loan repaid until July when it was paid off by Sims rather than Driggers. During this period, Respondent did not have a secured lien as title had never been applied for by Dixie Motors or conveyed to Driggers by Dixie Motors. Nor had notice been sent to the Georgia State Department of Revenue Motor Vehicle Division to register the title in Driggers' name with a lien on behalf of Respondent.

It was not until September 20, 1983, when Barbara Marcu, a title clerk employed by Respondent, began a routine telephone followup on titles which had not been received by Respondent with Dixie Motors to ascertain the reason for the delay in receiving the title that Respondent was apprised that the vehicle had been sold. Marcu and Edward Levins, Respondent's assistant manager in charge of administration, testified that following the issuance of a loan by the loan officer (such as Debra Montford), the loan clerk has the responsibility for calling the seller (in this case Dixie Motors) and obtaining the title number of the vehicle and informing the seller of Respondent's lien. In this case, Montford (the loan officer) made the call although normally (but not in every case) the loan clerk makes the call which is her responsiblity. The seller is then responsible for sending the title to the State of Georgia Motor Vehicle Unit to have the title changed to show the new ownership by the purchaser and Respondent's lien thereon. As a result of delayed processing by the State of Georgia Motor Vehicle Unit and, as the result of the failure of certain sellers to send the application for title changes and information to the state office, titles are often delayed and Respondent may not receive them for a period of 3 to 6 months. Respondent maintains a list of sellers with whom it has had trouble in the past in this regard. Neither Youman Chevrolet, Dixie Motors, nor H & S Sales was on this list of sellers. Marcu maintains a late title file and routinely follows up with sellers and the State on titles which have not been received for 90 days or more after the issuance of the loan. She follows up on these late titles by the issuance of form letters and by telephone inquiries to the seller.

On September 20 she contacted the title clerk of Dixie Motors concerning the title of the vehicle on which the loan had been made to Driggers. The title clerk told her she would have to call her back concerning the title. Marcu then received a telephone call from Debra Montford, who told her that the truck had been wrecked and repaired and resold and that the loan had been repaid and that Respondent would not receive a title. When Marcu inquired as to the need of Driggers for a title, she was told not to worry about the title as Driggers was a part owner of H & S Motors according to the testimony of Marcu. Marcu testified that when she put down the phone, she exclaimed aloud, "That's not right," whereupon Pat Parkerson, who is employed as an in-house auditor, and who reports directly to Respondent's board of governors, was walking by and asked Marcu what was not right, whereupon Marcu advised her of the conversation. Parkerson advised Marcu to inform the management. Marcu then reported it to Assistant Manager Edward Levins. Levins told Marcu to do nothing but to reduce what had occurred to writing. At Levins' request Marcu called Dixie Motors the following day. Marcu did so and spoke to Phillip Sullivan who told her he thought the truck had been "wrecked" and told her to speak with an employee of H & S Wholesalers who was with him at the time. Sullivan then put J. S. Sims on the telephone and Sims told Marcu that the credit union (Respondent) knew that the truck had been wrecked and that Montford was to have called her concerning the title and Respondent should not worry about it. He also told her that the truck had been sold to C. E. Edwards. Levins launched an investigation into the matter, asked Marcu to write the State concerning the transfer of the title to the vehicle, and Levins contacted the used-car sales manager of Youman Chevrolet, the original purchaser of the vehicle, Renters, and the then-current owner of the automobile, Edwards, who had ultimately purchased the vehicle from Sims in May. During the course of this investigation, Parkerson checked the loans made by Montford and also those in which Dixie Motors and H & S Sales had been the seller. She discovered that on at least one other occasion Montford had made a loan to Driggers who was a frequent borrower. Sims was not a member of the credit union and was thus ineligible to make a loan from Respondent. In response to a letter request for a vehicle title search of September 21 by Marcu to the Georgia State Motor Vehicle Unit, Respondent received a response approximately October 6 or 7 that showed an application for a title on the vehicle had been made and then canceled on behalf of Renters and that an application for title had been made on behalf of Edwards reflecting no lien or security holders.

During the period of his investigation, Levins informed Respondent's manager C. S. Moore of its ongoing status. On October 12 Levins advised Moore that he was ready to meet and discuss the matter. Levins, Moore, and Henry Johnson, the assistant manager who is in charge of the loan department, met on that date in the afternoon and reviewed the above and at that time Levins recommended that Montford be terminated for having made a loan to a relative in violation of Respondent's loan policy and that it had been made on a wrecked vehicle and that the loan had never been secured. According to the testimony of Levins, he and Moore and Johnson agreed but delayed the termination of Montford as she was gone for the day at the time of the meeting. Johnson also testified that as Montford was a long-term employee, Manager Moore wanted to discuss the matter with Respondent's attorney. Moore, Johnson, and Levins had been scheduled to attend a state credit union meeting at Jekyll Island, Georgia, the next day, October 13, and ending on Sunday, October 16.According to the testimony of Levins, on the morning of October 13 prior to his leaving for work, he was informed by Manager Moore of the advent of union activities by some of the employees of Respondent. Moore instructed Levins to meet with the management employees and inform them to do nothing concerning the union activities but to continue their work and insure that the operations of the credit union were carried on. Levins went to the office, met individually with the management employees in small groups, conveyed this information to them, and left for Jekyll Island that afternoon. No discussion of the Montford matter took place during the weekend. Levins testified that he and Manager Moore discussed the matter with Respondent's attorney who recommended that a labor law practitioner in Atlanta be consulted. This was done by Moore and Levins. On the afternoon of October 19, Montford was called to a meeting by Johnson. In attendance were Moore, Johnson, and Levins. Manager Moore told Montford he had something unpleasant to discuss with her to which Montford replied, "It usually is." He then reviewed the Driggers' loan situation with her. According to her testimony, she denied knowledge that the prohibition against making loans to relatives applied to other than members of the immediate family and contended she was unaware of the other transactions concerning the vehicle. At that time Manager Moore signed her termination notice, which had already been filled out, and directed Johnson to go with her to clean out her desk and leave. Prior to her departure, she turned to Levins and Johnson and asked, "After ten and a half years, do you think this is fair?"

Montford testified she was unaware that the prohibition against loans to relatives applied to relatives as distant as the husband of her cousin, denied knowledge of the damaged status of the automobile or any of the other transactions involving it until she received a telephone call from Sims on September 20 who informed her that the vehicle had been damaged, the loan repaid, the vehicle resold, and that Respondent would not get a title. She testified she verified that the loan had been repaid in July and then called Marcu and informed her of the above and that Marcu acted curious. She denied having told Marcu that Driggers was part owner of H & S Sales. Montford testified further that she had initially contacted the Union in 1981, but had done nothing further in this regard until August 1983 when, at the request of another employee, she again contacted the Union, met with union officials, signed a union card, and solicited several union authorization cards of other employees and set up a meeting between the employees and the Union which was scheduled for October 20. Employee Susan Curtis testified she was initially informed of the union campaign by Montford in October 1983.

Analysis

I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove a prima facie case of a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by Respondent's discharge of Montford. In making this determination, I have considered all of the facts and circumstances leading up to the termination in this case including the timing of the discharge of Montford after the advent of the union campaign and on the eve of the scheduled union meeting with Respondent's employees. I find that the testimony of Respondent's witnesses Levins, Marcu, Johnson, and Parkerson should be credited concerning the events that led up to the termination of Montford as set out above. I find their version of the sequence of events that led up to the termination of Montford to be credible, logical, and supported in part by documentary evidence of their research into the matter. I find the transactions engaged in by Sims and Driggers in the absence of Respondent's knowledge appear to have been highly irregular. The sale of the vehicle by Driggers to Sims and then by Sims to Edwards at a time when the vehicle was to be titled in the name of Driggers with a security interest to be filed on behalf of Respondent placed Respondent in a vulnerable position with an unprotected security interest. The careful investigation by Levins of this matter after it was called to his attention by Marcu, which included writing to the State for the required information and contacting the original and ultimate owners of the vehicle, as well as the used-car manager, but not contacting Dixie Motors, H & S Sales, and Driggers, does not appear an unreasonable course to pursue. I cannot accept the arguments of the General Counsel that the length of time to investigate this case by Respondent was unreasonable or indicated Respondent's lack of concern with the matter. This is a far different case than one in which a seller has been delinquent in conveying the title information to the State or in which the State has not processed the title and sent it to a respondent. Under these circumstances I find that Respondent was legitimately concerned about Montford's part in this transaction and the violation of its stated policy prohibiting its loan officers from making loans to relatives and engaging in self-dealing. Montford's telephone call to Marcu informing her that no title would be forthcoming would understandably have given rise to a suspicion by Respondent as to her involvement in the matter.

I further find, as contended by Respondent, that the General Counsel has failed to prove animus on the part of Respondent against the Union in this case. Rather, I credit the testimony of Levins that Montford's union activities were not known by Respondent prior to his recommendation of her termination on October 12 and that he was only initially informed of union activities of the employees on the morning of October 13 and was told to and did instruct the supervisors to carry out the business of Respondent and not to become involved with these activities. I do not find the interrogation of employee Curtis by Supervisor Brand[3] following the discharge of Montford sufficient to prove animus toward the Union by Respondent as this was an isolated act of interrogation by a single supervisor which was unaccompanied by threats. I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that Respondent's discharge of Montford was motivated by her union activities rather than by its concern for her alleged violation of its policy against making loans to relatives, and self-dealing and the irregularities of the transactions following the issuance of the loan to Driggers. Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 fn. 23 (1984).

Although the sequence of events in this case, particularly the timing of the discharge of Montford and the method by which she was summarily dismissed when she was called into the termination meeting and presented with a typed termination notice, give rise to a suspicion as to whether Respondent terminated her because of her union activities, mere suspicion is not sufficent to support a violation of the Act. See Spearin, Preston & Burrows Inc., 248 NLRB 1384 (1980), and Royal Coach Sprinklers, 268 NLRB 1019 (1984).

I have also considered Respondent's termination of a long term supervisor which occurred after the discharge of Montford for a violation of its loan policy to relatives and Respondent's actions in permitting her to resign at her request rather than be discharged as was Montford. When the General Counsel sought to introduce this evidence, Respondent initially objected and then withdrew its objection and the testimony in this regard was received. I find the evidence to be of questionable relevance as it occurred substantially after the discharge of Montford. However, assuming its relevance hereto, I would find it supportive of Respondent's position that it regarded the violation of this policy as a dischargeable offense rather than evidence of disparate treatment, as I regard the distinction between Respondent's discharge of Montford and its allowance of its supervisor to resign upon her request rather than be discharged to be of little moment insofar as Respondent was concerned although I recognize that the difference can be substantial to the employee involved. I credit the testimony of Levins that the supervisor requested permission to resign and was permitted to do so whereas Montford made no such request.

Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove a prima facie case of a violation by Respondent of the Act by its termination of Montford. Assuming that a prima facie case was established, I find that Respondent has rebutted that case by the preponderance of the evidence. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989; NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). In making the determinations set out above, I have not found that Montford was engaged in any wrongful activity nor that Respondent's interpretation of the loan to Driggers by Montford as a violation of its policy against loans to relatives and self-dealing was necessarily correct or the only interpretation as to whether "relative" included the husband of a cousin. Rather, I have found that Respondent's concern about the perceived violation of its policy by Montford and the irregularities of the transactions involved following the loan to Driggers were the motivating factors in its discharge of Montford. It is a sad matter to see an employee of over 10 years' experience, who has progressed to a substantial position, be terminated under these circumstances, but I do not find a violation of the Act was committed by the Employer by reason of her termination. Nor have I found that Montford did in fact violate Respondent's policy or that she was engaged in any irregular or fraudulent transactions as contended by Respondent in its brief.

C. The Interrogation of Employee Susan Curtis by Supervisor Brand

Susan Curtis, a loan clerk employed by Respondent, testified that the union campaign began in October, that she signed an authorization card and solicited other cards from Respondent's employees on behalf of the Union, that she had initially been informed of the union campaign by Montford and was informed of the union meeting scheduled for October 20 "a couple of days" before Montford's discharge. Curtis testified that "a few Saturdays after Debra (Montford) was fired," Supervisor Ronnie Brand asked her "how we were coming along on that." She inquired, "What? Do you mean the Union?" and Brand "kind of laughed" and she told him, "Well, if you mean the Union, we're coming along, but these things take time." She testified further that he asked how many cards had been signed, and she replied she did not know as the cards were given to the Union and that the Union kept track. Brand then asked her how many cards were required, and she told him it "depended on who would vote in the election."

Analysis

I credit the testimony of Curtis which is unrebutted as Brand did not testify. I find the interrogation of Curtis by Brand was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and went beyond a casual question but was a pointed effort to discover the Union's progress in its campaign. I find this type of questioning to have been inherently coercive.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

The unfair labor practice of Respondent as found in section III, in connection with Respondent's operations as found in section I, has a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tends to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing the flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Robins Federal Credit Union is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by its discharge of Debra Montford.
4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the interrogation of its employee Susan Curtis by its supervisor Ronnie Brand.
5. The aforesaid unfair labor practice has a close, intimate, and substantial effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and post the appropriate notice.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended:[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Robins Federal Credit Union, Warner Robins, Georgia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from unlawfully interrogating its employees concerning their union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
2. Take te following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facilities in Warner Robins, Georgia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed with respect to the allegations of a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by Respondent's discharge of Debra Montford.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all parties participated, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act. We have been ordered to post this notice and abide by its terms.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully interrogate our employees concerning their union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

ROBINS FEDERAL CREDIT UNION

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union #46, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO (PAC, Inc.) and Robert Witty. Case 19–CB–4917

10 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 26 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Roger B. Holmes issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Charging Party filed an answering brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union #46, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's discipline of PAC President Robert Witty, then a member of the Union, violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act because it had the foreseeable effect of interfering with Witty's duties as PAC's representative, and thereby tended to coerce PAC in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances. We also agree with the judge's ruling excluding evidence of an alleged alter ego relationship between PAC, Inc. and CEC, Inc. and we deny the Respondent's request for a remand.

The Respondent, inter alia, contends the excluded evidence is relevant to its argument that Witty is an "employer" at PAC rather than an "employer representative" within the meaning of Sec. 8(b)(1)(B). By asserting Witty did not deny owning an interest in CEC, the Respondent implies that Witty may hold a financial interest in CEC, and consequently may be the "employer" at PAC if PAC is CEC's alter ego. The Respondent, however, never sought to lay this foundation for the excluded evidence at trial. Having failed to make an offer of proof that Witty held a financial interest in CEC, the Respondent cannot now claim prejudicial error if it is asserting evidence of such an interest exists. We further observe that the Respondent does not on brief claim there is any such evidence, newly discovered or in the record.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROGER B. HOLMES, Administrative Law Judge. The original unfair labor practice charge in this case was filed on September 16, 1983, by Robert Witty. The amended unfair labor practice charge in this case was filed on October 4, 1983, by Witty.

The General Counsel's complaint was issued on October 11, 1983. The General Counsel amended the complaint at the trial. The General Counsel's complaint alleges that International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union #46, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. As amended at the trial, the General Counsel's complaint alleges in paragraph six the following:

> (a) On or about July 20, 1983, Respondent, acting through its Executive Board and Michael L. Dilworth, at Seattle, Washington, voted to process internal union charges against Witty because Witty was and is employed by PAC, which does not have a collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent.
> (b) On or about August 2, 1983, Respondent, acting through its Executive Board and Michael L. Dilworth, at Seattle, Washington, had a trial in Seattle, Washington regarding the charges referred to above in paragraph 6(a).
> (c) On or about August 3, 1983, Respondent, acting through its Executive Board and Michael L. Dilworth, at its Seattle, Washington location, fined Witty because he performed supervisory functions for PAC, which operates without a collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent.

In the answer to the General Counsel's complaint, the Respondent denies that it had committed the alleged unfair labor practices.

The trial in this proceeding was held on March 29 and 30, 1984, at Seattle, Washington. The time for the filing of posttrial briefs was extended to May 11, 1984. A motion to Stay, or in the alternative, a motion to reopen hearing, was received on May 10, 1984, from the Respondent. An order to show cause was issued on that same date whereby the other parties to the proceeding were given the opportunity to show cause, if any, by May 24, 1984, why the Respondent's motions should not be granted. Furthermore, the Respondent was afforded an opportunity to file a response to those oppositions by June 1, 1984. The positions of the parties have been considered and will be discussed in sections 3 and 10 of this decision.

1. JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of the Board over the business operations of the employer is an issue in this proceeding. PAC, Inc. is an electrical contractor incorporated in the State of Washington. Its place of business is located in Seattle, Washington. PAC provides services for general contractors, but PAC does not provide services for individual members of the public. During the period from May 1983 to the date of the trial in this proceeding on May 29 and 30, 1984, PAC's gross revenue was approximately $1.3 million.

At the trial, the General Counsel made a request that judicial notice be taken that certain entities were engaged in interstate commerce. (Tr. 79–90.)

Under Rule 201 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, judicial notice has been taken of the fact that the operations of the State of Washington annually have exceeded the Board's $50,000 direct inflow and direct outflow jurisdictional standards. That fact, in my view, comes within the requirement of Rule 201(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence that, "A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court. . . ." While the State of Washington is exempt from the Board's jurisdiction under Section 2(2) of the Act, the value of PAC's services performed for the State of Washington may be considered for jurisdictional purposes. In its decision in Southern Alleghenies Disposals Services, 256 NLRB 852 (1981), the Board held:

> It is well established that the Board will assert jurisdiction over a nonretail enterprise which has an annual outflow or inflow, direct or indirect, across state lines of at least $50,000. Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81, 85 (1958). As enunciated by the Board in Siemons, indirect outflow refers to sales of goods or services within the State to "users" meeting any standard except solely an indirect inflow or indirect outflow standard. Further, the Board stated that it would continue to define as "users" enterprises which themselves were exempted from the Board's jurisdiction but whose operations were of a magnitude that the Board would assert jurisdiction if they were nonexempt.
> Here, although the city of Johnstown is exempt from the Board's jurisdiction under Section 2(2) of the Act, the magnitude of its operations would clearly warrant our assertion of jurisdiction over it if it were nonexempt. Accordingly, because Respondent's sales of services to the city of Johnstown are in excess of $50,000, the indirect outflow standard has been met.[4] We therefore find that it will effectuate the purpose of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.[5]

[4] We thus find it unnecessary to address the General Counsel's alternative argument for assertion of jurisdiction over Respondent based on Respondent's services to other enterprises which are directly engaged in interstate commerce.

[5] We expressly disavow the Administrative Law Judge's characterization of Respondent's operation as a purely local function which does not affect interstate commerce. See Carroll–Naslund Disposal, Inc., 152 NLRB 861 (1965); Nichols Sanitation, Inc., 230 NLRB 834 (1977).

During the period of time from May 1983 to the time of the trial on March 29 and 30, 1984, PAC performed services for the Department of General Administration of the State of Washington in the amounts of $228,000 for a relighting project and $17,000 for an underground conduit. Based on the value of the services performed for the State of Washington by PAC, I conclude that PAC's business operations meet the Board's indirect outflow jurisdictional standard. Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81 (1958). Accordingly, I further conclude that the Board has jurisdiction in this proceeding.

In addition to the foregoing, PAC also has performed services during the period from May 1983 to the time of the trial for the following entities in the amounts indicated: Berkley Structures, $60,000 for the renovation of the Eddy Power Building, which was a time and material contract, and an unspecified amount for the renovation of the Old Western Farmer Building, which was another time and material contract and it was still in progress at the time of the trial; Bourgault Construction, $126,000 for an urban and planning building; Leo Finnegan Construction, $400,000 for the Rainier School, and $148,000 for the Graham Safeway; Jones & Roberts, $509,000 for the Lewis County Jail; Keta Construction, $113,000 for a Safeway Store; Lease–Crutcher, $286,000 for the Boeing Space Center, Building 1841; Pease & Sons, $88,000 for the Kenmore Pump Station; Puget Power and Kitsap Regional Library, $72,000 for relighting the library; and Turnkey Construction, $738,000 for the Leavenworth High School.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The status of the Respondent as being a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act is not an issue. Such status was admitted in the pleadings.

III. THE WITNESSES AND CREDIBILITY RESOLUTIONS

Only two persons appeared as witnesses during the trial of this proceeding. They are: Robert Witty, who is the Charging Party in this case, and Michael L. Dilworth. Compared to the testimony given by Witty, the testimony of Dilworth was relatively brief. (Tr. 294–299.)

In considering the credibility of Witty's testimony, I have read the Respondent's motion to stay, or in the alternative, motion to reopen hearing, and the supporting documents, as well as the oppositions filed by the General Counsel and the Charging Party to the Respondent's motions and the Respondent's reply. In support of its posttrial motions, the Respondent submitted a copy of a letter dated April 24, 1984, from the Respondent's attorney to the Regional Director for Region 19 of the Board, and a copy of an unfair labor practice charge filed by the Respondent against Commercial Electrical Contractors, Inc. (CEC) and Power Authority Construction, Inc. (PAC). The Respondent alleges in the letter to the Regional Director that there are contradictions between certain matters related by Witty in his testimony at the trial in this proceeding and certain matters previously represented in December 1983 by CEC's attorney, which had led to a settlement of an earlier unfair labor practice charge filed by the Union in Case 19–CA–15831.

The matters on which a settlement of the earlier unfair labor practice charge allegedly were based, and which are alleged by the Respondent to be in contradiction of Witty's testimony, were not made a part of the record during the trial in this proceeding. Those earlier matters cannot be considered at this stage of this proceeding to be newly discovered evidence or evidence which was previously unavailable to the Respondent at the time of the trial on March 29 and 30, 1984. Accordingly, I conclude that a basis has not been shown for reopening the record in this proceeding to consider matters which were within the knowledge of the Respondent at the time of the trial, but which were not offered into evidence at that time. Respondent had the opportunity at the trial to introduce matters affecting the credibility of Witty and to cross-examine Witty with regard to the testimony given by Witty at the trial, which the Respondent urges is inconsistent with the earlier matters. While the Respondent's affirmative defense of an alter ego relationship between CEC and PAC was found at the trial not to be a defense to the General Counsel's complaint allegations, the Respondent had the opportunity to cross-examine Witty with regard to the other matters covered during the direct examination of Witty and matters which affected the credibility of the witness. For convenience at the trial, matters regarding the credibility of Witty were referred by the shorthand reference of being issue number one, while the alter ego affirmative defense was referred to as issue number two.

Both the General Counsel and the attorney for the Charging Party made objections to questions posed by the attorney for the Respondent during his cross-examination of Witty. Both at the trial and in his posttrial brief, the attorney for the Respondent urges that the objections made by his opponents and their arguments with regard to those objections to questions during his cross-examination of Witty prevented him from effectively cross-examining Witty, and therefore, denied due process to the Respondent. In considering the argument raised by the Respondent, I note initially that the General Counsel and the attorney for the Charging Party differed with the attorney for the Respondent with regard to the legal issues in this case, and in particular the Respondent's affirmative defense that CEC and PAC are alter egos. Understandably, all of the parties wanted to preserve on the record their legal positions and arguments in support of their legal positions, not only on the alter ego issue, but with regard to other matters as well. In some forums, the failure of an attorney to raise a timely objection at the point in time at which evidence is offered at the trial may be deemed to be a waiver of the party's right to object to such evidence at a later point in time. (Fed. R. Evid. 103.) Witty was asked on five different occasions during the course of his testimony to step down from the witness stand and leave the hearing room so that the attorneys could argue more freely outside of his presence. (Tr. 105–111; 118–126; 133–149; 196–213; and 241–247.)

After reviewing the record, I conclude that the Respondent did have an opportunity to cross-examine Witty with regard to the subject matters of his direct examination and with regard to matters affecting the credibility of the witness. (See Fed. R. Evid. 611(b).)

At the trial, Witty acknowledged that certain portions of his pretrial affidavit had been deleted from his statement at the time he gave that statement to the General Counsel. For example, a portion of his statement which had read, "Sabey is the majority stockholder of PAC, Inc.," had been lined out of his pretrial statement. (Tr. 247.) Witty explained at the trial that the reason for the deletion of that sentence was, "Because I don't know that for a fact." Witty also said that it "didn't seem relevant, and I wasn't . . . an authority on it. I mean, I didn't . . . see the paper, or the documents, or anything like that." (Tr. 248.) However, Witty stated at the trial that Sabey had told him that Sabey was the owner of PAC, and Witty had no reasonable basis at the time that he gave his statement to the NLRB agent for disbelieving Sabey's claim. When Witty was questioned at the trial as to whether anyone had told him anything differently, Witty said that he had heard rumors. (Tr. 248.)

Witty also acknowledged at the trial that the following portion of his pretrial statement had been lined out at Witty's direction at the time he gave his pretrial statement: "I felt the problem arose out of employment with him. He said to collect all the relevant papers. . . ." (Tr. 238–239 and see sec. 7 herein regarding the intraunion charges against Witty.) Witty explained at the trial: "At the time, I was trying to recall what exactly happened and it had been some months before, and I was going through my papers, anyway, as I had recalled it, and as she had written it down, and I went back over it again, that was not exactly what—that was not what had happened." (Tr. 239.) In contrast, Witty explained at the trial the reason why another part of his pretrial statement had been left in his statement and not lined out. The sentence was, "I knew he had attorneys who were knowledgeable concerning labor disputes." (Tr. 252.) Witty explained that the statement was true based on conversations Witty had with other persons, but not with Sabey himself. Witty said that while he was working as an electrician for CEC, he got that information from CEC's operations manager and from Berkley's general superintendent Danny Recard.

Another portion of his pretrial statement, which had been lined out at the time he gave his statement, was "I gathered my papers (the copy of the withdrawal and union correspondence) and took it to George Sigalas, the President of Commercial Electric on August 9th at about 10 a.m." (Tr. 249.) At the trial Witty explained that the reason for lining out that sentence in his pretrial statement was, "I had gotten that confused with another situation." (Tr. 249.) Witty said the earlier situation had occurred while Witty was working for CEC and that matter pertained to a lien problem.

At the trial, Witty also explained a sentence in his pretrial statement which he had given in September 1983, and which reads, "I am presently a member of IBEW Local 46." (Tr. 263.) Witty stated at the trial that he did not consider himself to be a member of the union at that in time, because he had submitted a resignation, but Witty made that statement in his pretrial affidavit, "Because I had received a letter from the Union saying that I couldn't resign." (Tr. 263.) Witty further explained at the trial, "I believe the Local 46 considers me a member, even though I've tried to resign." (Tr. 265.) Witty acknowledged at the trial, "I would say, recalling right now, the word 'presently' would have been inaccurate in my own mind." (Tr. 269.)

Finally, with regard to his pretrial statement, Witty acknowledged the following during his cross-examination at transcript 270:

> By Mr. Hafer:
> Q. Were you confused about anything when you gave your statement?
> A. Yes.
> Q. What were you confused about when you gave your statement?
> A. This is the first time I had ever been through anything of this nature.
> Q. First time you had ever had any dealings with lawyers and legal affairs and so on?
> A. No. It's the first time I had ever had anything to do with the NLRB and the first time that I had ever been personally involved with it.
> Q. Okay. But, in terms of the particulars of this statement, you reviewed it three times in the last 30 days, I believe you told us. You have looked at portions of it today, certainly when you gave the statement. Was there anything you were confused about insofar as the points—
> A. Not that I recall.
> Q. You don't feel now, looking back on that, that—that there was any confusion in your mind about what you were telling Miss Cottrell and what she was writing; correct?
> A. Correct.

It was disclosed at the trial that Witty was in error during his direct examination when he referred to PAC employee Gene Pullen as being an apprentice. During his cross-examination, Witty corrected himself to state that Pullen was an electrical trainee. I consider the foregoing to be merely a minor inaccuracy in his testimony on direct examination.

I have reviewed Witty's testimony regarding a telephone conversation about 2 weeks before the trial between Witty and a person who identified himself to Witty as being an IBEW local union business agent in Wenatchee, Washington. However, Witty had not spoken previously with that person; did not recognize the person's voice; and had no other contact with the person who telephoned him on that occasion. Under these circumstances, I find that Witty's account of the telephone conversation lacks genuine probative value for the purpose for which the testimony was offered. The testimony was not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted by the out-of-court declarant, yet the true identity of the caller in these circumstances depends upon accepting as truthful the caller's assertions regarding his name and union position. As discussed at the trial, this is unlike a situation where a witness describes on the stand a telephone call the witness made to a certain number. (Tr. 284–293 and Fed.R.Evid. 901.)

After considering all of the foregoing—the demeanor of the witnesses, established facts, inherent probabilities, and documentary evidence—I have decided to credit the testimony given by Witty, as well as the testimony given by Dilworth. Accordingly, I will rely on portions of the testimony from both witnesses in making the findings of fact to be set forth herein.

IV. THE EVENTS IN APRIL 1983

Witty had become a member of the Respondent Union in 1980. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 2 was a copy of a request by Witty for a "participating" withdrawal of his membership in the Respondent Union. The document shows that his request was made on April 15, 1983, and it appears that the request was approved by the executive board on April 17 or 19, 1983. In his request, Witty indicated that he would be employed as office operations manager by Commercial Electrical Contractors. Witty also indicated on his withdrawal request that he would not be working with tools.

Also on April 15, 1983, Witty informed George Sigalas that Witty intended to resign from CEC effective May 14, 1983.

V. THE EVENTS IN MAY 1983

As far as Witty knew, Dave Sabey owned PAC. (Tr. 235.) According to Witty, Sabey also owned CEC and Berkley Structures. It was Witty's understanding that George Sigalas ran CEC for Sabey. (Tr. 163.) According to Witty, Mike Dunn runs Berkley Structures in its day-to-day operations.

Witty discussed with Dave Sabey his going to work for PAC. It was Witty's idea to go to work for PAC, rather than Sabey's idea. Witty stated: "I simply offered to work at PAC for him." (Tr. 167.)

Witty began his employment with PAC on May 15, 1983. Witty is the president of PAC, and he also holds the title of operations manager/administrator. Witty does not own any portion of PAC, and Witty does not share in any of PAC's profits. With regard to his duties, Witty testified at transcript 24:

> Q. What are your duties as President and operations manager?
> A. I oversee the office, or operations, the project managers. I'm also a project manager myself. I handle the majority of the hiring and firing and employment transferring. If there is any problems in the field, adjusting wages, or if there's complaints, things like that, I generally handle that.
> Q. Complaints from who and concerning what?
> A. Oh, for example, if there's differences between a foreman and an electrician, or foreman and an apprentice, they can't handle it themselves, then I'm usually the one that has to take care of it.

Witty receives a salary from PAC. Witty stated, "I told Dave Sabey how much I wanted to make." (Tr. 256.) Sabey told Witty that was fine. Witty's salary has remained the same during the entire time of his employment by PAC. Witty stated, "Essentially, I was to run the company for him." (Tr. 168.)

During the time of his employment by PAC, Witty has possessed the authority to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of PAC with a labor organization. Witty has also possessed the authority to sign such a collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of PAC.

Since Witty has been the president of PAC, Witty: (1) has established the labor relations at PAC; (2) has set the wage rates paid by PAC; (3) has determined the hours of employment of employees of PAC; (4) has determined the benefits to be given to employees of PAC; and (5) has addressed problems on behalf of PAC concerning wage claims or discrimination claims.

With regard to the hiring of employees at PAC, Witty makes that decision. Witty explained: "In part, it's on referral. Electricians know other electricians, and we'll interview them. Usually, I'll interview the electricians. Also we'll receive resumes, we'll solicit resumes." (Tr. 281.)

With regard to determining which employees are to be laid off from work at PAC, Witty said, "It pretty much comes as a consensus among the three of us, my two project managers and myself, but if there—I generally have the last word." (Tr. 280–281.)

Witty gave the following description of PAC's grievance procedure at transcript 28:

> A. If any employee on the job has a problem or a complaint, he directs that to the immediate foreman. If he is dissatisfied with that, then each job has an assigned project manager, and he can direct his complaint to the project manager. If he is unsatisfied with that, then he can direct his complaint to me, and I'd be the final.

At the time of the trial, PAC had three project managers and one field superintendent.

With regard to his weekly staff meetings, Witty testified at transcript 279 and 280:

> A. The Monday morning staff meetings, my two project managers, George Rutherford and Don Robertson, are present; and Tony Pena, my estimator; and then, usually we leave the door open so that the receptionist can hear what's going on, or we can get ahold of her pretty easily. And, essentially what we do is we review the—the job progress on each job. We determine what the financial status is, whether it's making money, or losing money, whether we can readjust our budget, our projected budget for the job. Also, we determine what direction we want to take with the company.
> For example, last week we decided that we wanted to go into—pursue more service work that would involve the purchase of another truck. And also, we discuss manpower requirements. At this time, it gives us a chance to brainstorm and see if there is any way that there can be some overlap of material, transfers, and we also look for suggestions as to ways the jobs can be better run. Sometimes one manager from one area has a good idea that might apply to another job. So, that's the reason for the meeting.

Witty is in charge of the day-to-day operations of PAC. Witty is listed as the administrator for PAC. He stated at transcript 281:

> It's—in the State of Washington, every contractor has to have a State-recognized administrator who is legally responsible for the installations on that job. So, I am legally responsible, or held accountable for the proper installation on every job that's performed by PAC.

Witty's name also is listed on PAC's business licenses to operate in the city of Seattle.

After Witty was employed by PAC, Witty set up PAC's lines of credit with PAC's suppliers. Dave Sabey's name appears on the credit applications as the principal owner of PAC. However, Witty's signature appears on the credit applications. With regard to an arrangement whereby PAC could borrow money from a bank for business purposes, Witty acknowledged at the trial, "I don't know all of the details of that particular aspect of the business." (Tr. 187.)

When Witty began working for PAC, he did not know what the dollar value of the assets of PAC was. At that time, an accountant was putting information regarding that into a computer. Witty testified at transcript 216, "I worked with him as far as setting up what went into the computer and what I wanted out." It was about 2 months before Witty first saw the computer printouts. He acknowledged at the trial that during those first 2 months he had no idea of what PAC was worth or what its assets were because Witty did not have access to the company's books. According to Witty, "the computer was located in Redmond with the bookkeeping pool that also handled Berkley Structure's books." (Tr. 214.)

Bills were received at Witty's office at PAC. Witty "vouchered them" and then sent the vouchers "to accounts payable, which is part of the bookkeeping pool." (Tr. 217.) PAC pays for the services performed by the bookkeepers. Witty had talked with Sabey with regard to using Berkley Structures bookkeeping pool to perform bookkeeping work for PAC. Witty explained at transcript 220, ". . . I checked with a couple other accounting, bookkeeping firms who would do the same thing and Berkely's price was quite a bit cheaper. So, that was one of the big determining factors." In addition, Witty previously had met the accountant at Berkley structures while Witty was working for CEC, which was doing work for Berkley at that time. The other reason given by Witty for selecting Berkley Structures was, "[I]t was more a matter of convenience. That was the most convenient." (Tr. 220.) While Witty said that Sabey owned Berkley Structures, and that Sabey did have the authority to fire Witty from PAC, Witty said at the trial that he did not feel pressured to use Berkley's bookkeeping pool to perform the computer work for PAC. (Tr. 221–223.)

Witty performed the task of preparing bids for contracts on behalf of PAC. Sabey did not establish any guidelines or limitations for Witty to follow in bidding work for PAC. Prior to making a bid, Witty did not consult with Sabey with regard to the price to be used on the bid for the work to be performed. However, Witty did discuss the price for time and materials work that PAC was going to perform for Berkley Structures. Witty suggested the price to Sabey. Witty testified, "[H]e was hesitant, but he accepted." (Tr. 186.) In addition, Witty talked with Sabey about every 2 or 3 weeks after Witty began working for PAC. Sometimes their conversations were on the telephone, and sometimes they met in person at Sabey's office at Berkley Structures. At his meetings with Sabey, Witty said that the topics discussed were: "essentially the financial situation of the company and the progress of the jobs, our billing, job status, whether they're making a profit or losing money, and overhead." (Tr. 223.) Sometimes Sabey has asked Witty how much manpower Witty had on a job. Witty testified, "[H]e relies on my judgment for what we need to do, to get a job done." (Tr. 225.)

On May 20, 1983, Witty had a conversation with Respondent's business agent, Leonard Chernoff. An electrician, who was identified only by his first name of Alex, also was present. Witty testified at transcript 35 and 37:

> A. Leonard—Leonard had arrived at the site. At the time, I had just started working for PAC and had previously been working for CEC, and I was still—I had a library and a few personal effects that I had, so I was there, taking them out and that's when Leonard and Alex arrived, and Leonard said that he had heard that I had been working for PAC, and he just wanted to come by and see what was going on. So, I took him over to the PAC offices, which were in the building adjacent, across the parking lot, showed him where we were at, and I explained to him that I was working for PAC and that I had taken a withdrawal so that I could work—well, at the time, it wasn't to work for PAC, but I had taken a withdrawal and when I had spoken to the—to the secretary, her stipulation was that the terms of the withdrawal were that I—

> A. Anyway, this was all in the conversation with Leonard, that I had understood that as long as I had made the withdrawal and that I was not working with tools, that there was no problem, and he nodded affirmatively. At that time, the conversation kind of lightened up. We went back over to where his car was parked and there was a discussion about the pros and cons of Union workers and things like that, and then one of his pass—one of his parting remarks was that he just kind of stared off; he says, "Yeah, I just might leave the Union myself and start my own business and avoid all the hassles." So, that's essentially how the conversation went.

VI. THE EVENTS IN JULY 1983

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 3 was a copy of a letter dated July 20, 1983, from the Respondent to Witty. There were two attachments to the Respondent's letter. In part, the letter states:

> You are hereby notified to appear before the Trial Board of Local Union No. 46, I.B.E.W., meeting at 2700 First Avenue, Seattle, Washington on Tuesday, August 2, 1983 at 7:30 P.M., to answer charges filed against you by Brother Leonard Chernoff Card #D382544, for alleged violation of the Local Union by-laws Article XI, Section 1 and Article XVII, Sections 7 and 8; the International Constitution Article XXII, Section 4; Article XXVI, Sections 2 and 5; Article XXVII, Section 1, Subsections 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 10 and 17.
> Enclosed is a copy of the original charges filed against you. You may, if you desire, have an I.B.E.W. member act as your counsel. You may bring witnesses to give evidence in your behalf. You will be afforded the opportunity at the hearing to present any relevant evidence and to cross-examine any witnesses you may desire.

One of the attachments to that letter is a copy of an intraunion charge dated June 9, 1983, by Respondent's member, Leonard Chernoff, against Witty. The intraunion charge alleges that certain sections of the Respondent's bylaws and the Respondent's constitution were violated on Friday, May 20, 1983, at approximately 1 p.m. at the offices of Commercial Electrical Contractors, Inc. The intraunion charge further alleges that:

> Bro. Witty admitted to being employed by P.A.C. Inc., as well as being the registered administrator for this electrical company. P.A.C. Inc. is not signatory to an agreement with Local 46, I.B.E.W. Bro. Witty has H. & W. hours reported for April/83 for C.E.C. Inc., has not been terminated, and apparently works for both companies. Witty took a participating withdrawal dated Apr. 15/83.

The other attachment to General Counsel's Exhibit 3 was a copy of the withdrawal request which was introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 2.

As a result of the letter and the attachments which were received into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 3, Witty obtained copies of the Respondent's bylaws and the IBEW constitution in order to study them. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 4(a) and 4(b) are copies of those documents.

About 2 days before the Respondent Union's trial board hearing was scheduled to take place, Witty telephoned Chernoff. Witty testified at transcript 45:

> A. I told him about the charges. He said that since he was involved, there was nothing he could say, or—say about them to me. He said I would have to get hold of Harry Meyers. I told him that Harry Meyers was out of town, who else could I talk to? And he said he didn't know, and that was pretty much what happened.

VII. THE EVENTS IN AUGUST 1983

On August 1, 1983, Witty hand delivered a "speed message" to the Union. Although the document is dated August 2, 1983, Witty said he delivered the document on the day before the hearing, which was held on August 2, 1983. (Tr. 45–46.) Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 5 was a copy of that document. It states:

> In preparing my case, I have been unable to contact anyone who is prepared to discuss it with me. Harry Meyers is on vacation, and I am unable to contact anyone else. When I started working for PAC, Inc. on May 16 I was under the impression that I was violating no rules of the agreement. I only recently learned that was not the case. In that case I apparently am guilty as charged on that issue. However, I have decided not to appear at the hearing tonight because I do not feel it will be impartial. This based on prior experiences with the executive board. Plus I was deceived into believing that my meeting of May 20 was friendly and informational, and not with the express intent to file charges. I am confident that you will inform me of your decision.

Witty did not attend the Trial Board hearing on August 2, 1983. Witty testified at transcript 55:

> A. Since I was unable to conduct anybody from the Hall that could give me any information regarding the nature of the hearing, the consequences, or just any information at all, and since I had met with the same individuals, not in a similar circumstance, but I had met with the "E" Board before, I just did not feel that I would get an impartial hearing.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 6 was a copy of a letter dated August 3, 1983, from the Respondent to Witty. It states:

> The Executive Board sitting as Trial Board of Local Union No. 46, I.B.E.W. on August 2, 1983, after due consideration of the evidence produced, has acted upon the charges filed against you by Brother Leonard Chernoff. The trial was held in absentia.
> The charges alleged you violated the Local Union By-laws, Article XI, Section 1, Article XVII, Section 7 and 8; the International Constitution, Article XXII, Section 4, Article XXVI, Section 2 and 5 and Article XXVII, Section 1, Subsections 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 10 and 17.

The decision of the Trial Board is as follows:

> M/S/C that Brother Witty be found not guilty of violating the Local Union by-laws Article XVII, Section 8 and the International Constitution Article XXVII, Section 1, Subsections 2, 10 and 17.
> MSC that Brother Witty be found guilty of violating the Local Union By-laws Article XI, Section 1, Article XVII, Section 7; the International Constitution Article XXII, Section 4, Article XXVI, Section 2 and 5, Article XXVII, Section 1, Subsections 1, 4, 5, and 6. M/S/C that Brother Witty be fined $2,000 per charge (8) with $1,000 per charge (8) suspended provided that he sign a contract with Local 46 within 30 days and his withdrawal be annulled in accordance with the International Constitution Article XXVII, Section 5.
> Any member who claims an injustice has been done him by the Trial Board may appeal. (See Article XXVII of the I.B.E.W. Constitution.) Appeals from the decision of this Trial Board must be directed to International Vice President S. R. McCann, Twin Oaks South Office Complex, 150 No. Wiget Lane, Suite 100, Walnut Creek, CA 94598.
> Appeals to the Vice President must state in writing:
> 1. Your reasons for claiming an injustice has been done you by the Trial Board.
> 2. When assessment exceeds $25.00, $20.00 must be paid directly to this Local Union or mailed with a postmark date within fifteen (15) days from the date of the decision rendered. The Local Union receipt or a copy thereof must accompany the appeal to the International Vice President.
> 3. In order to keep the appeal active, additional payments to the Local Union of not less than $20.00 must be paid within each succeeding thirty (30) days period from date of first payment until the decision is rendered by the International Vice President.
> 4. Appeals to the International Vice President must be postmarked within forty-five (45) days after our next regular Local Union Meeting which is on the 10th day of August, 1983.
> 5. A copy of the appeal sent the Vice President shall be furnished this Local Union office.
> 6. For further details, see appropriate sections of the enclosed I.B.E.W. Constitution.

According to Dilworth, Witty was fined, "Because he was operating an apparent double-breasted, non-union shop." (Tr. 297.)

At the trial, Witty acknowledged that he had obtained the legal services of Attorney Judd H. Lees following a conversation between Witty and Sabey. Witty went to see Sabey because Witty felt that he needed an attorney as a result of the Union's charges being filed against him. Witty said, "I knew he knew of good attorneys." (Tr. 229.) Witty further said, "I went to him to find an attorney." (Tr. 231.) Witty testified with regard to his conversation with Sabey on that occasion, "I explained about the union charges and I felt needed legal counsel. This had been the first opportunity to—that I had needed an attorney, either as a representative of PAC or personally, and I asked him who was a good attorney to deal with something like this." (Tr. 232.) Sabey told Witty that Sabey was going to contact Attorney Lees. As a result, Attorney Lees telephoned Witty. According to Witty, PAC is paying the legal fees owed to Attorney Lees.

In response to General Counsel's Exhibit 6, Witty stated at the trial that he had not annulled his withdrawal request nor had he signed a contract with the Respondent Union.

VIII. SUBSEQUENT EVENTS

Around September 1983, a dispute arose between PAC Foreman Charles Nelson and PAC electrical trainee Gene Pullen. The dispute pertained to how a piece of conduit should be installed. Nelson felt it should be installed one way, and Pullen felt it should be installed a different way. As a result, Nelson told Pullen that he did not want him on the job any more. Both Nelson and Pullen called Witty regarding this, and the next morning Witty met with them and PAC Field Superintendent Don Robertson. After a discussion, Witty spoke to Pullen in the presence of the other two persons. Witty testified at transcript 26: "I told him that it was really his responsibility to do what the foreman told him to do, even if he felt that wasn't the best way to do it. The foreman is the one responsible for the job and that's what should be done."

Witty then told Pullen to leave for the moment, and Witty spoke to Nelson. Witty told Nelson that he should watch his temper, and be more flexible in the way he handles things. Witty said that Pullen's way of installing the conduit was probably the best way to do it, but Nelson was too proud to accept that.

Witty gave reprimands to both Nelson and Pullen. Witty transferred Pullen to another job, and Witty assigned another apprentice to Nelson.

Another PAC apprentice named Michael Pullen asked Witty for a raise in pay. Witty told Michael Pullen that he could get a raise when he passed the State of Washington examination to become a journeyman. Subsequently, Michael Pullen took the state exam and he told Witty that he was almost certain that he had passed the examination. As a result, Witty gave Micahel Pullen a $1.50-an-hour increase in pay. However, it later developed that Michael Pullen had failed the examination, and Pullen became concerned about losing his wage increase. Witty decided to let Michael Pullen keep his raise because Witty felt that he was a good worker; he was supposed to take the exam again in another month or so; it would not be in Michael Pullen's best interest or the Employer's best interest to reduce Michael Pullen's wage rate because Witty felt it would be demoralizing.

At the time of the trial, PAC had approximately 35 employees. Witty had hired about 30 of those 35 employees. With regard to the other five employees, Witty stated, "I had told my project managers I was in a hurry. I told them the criteria that I wanted for electricians and to hire somebody." (Tr. 282.) The employees of PAC were not represented by any labor organization at the time of the trial, and PAC was not signatory to any collective-bargaining agreements at the time of the trial.

IX. CONCLUSIONS

Based on the foregoing findings of fact, I conclude that the evidence establishes that PAC is an employer as defined in Section 2(2) of the Act. In addition, I conclude that PAC is an employer in the ordinary sense of the word, that is, PAC is engaged in a business which employs persons to work for wages.

I further conclude that the findings of facts set forth above show that Witty, as the president, operations manager and administrator of PAC, has possessed the authority to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of PAC with a labor organization. I further conclude that the evidence shows that Witty has had the authority to sign such a collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of PAC with a labor organization. The evidence also shows that Witty has established PAC's labor relations policy, including the wage to be paid to employees of PAC; the employees' hours of work; and the employees benefits to be given by PAC. Witty has made the ultimate decisions with regard to the hiring and layoff of the substantial number of persons employed by PAC. Witty also has the authority to adjust employee grievances on behalf of PAC.

I also conclude that the findings of fact establish that Witty does not own any portion of PAC. According to Witty's understanding, Dave Sabey owned PAC, CEC, and Berkley Structures. Thus, Witty is not the "employer himself" as described by the Board in its decision in Painters Local 1621 (Glass Management Assn.), 221 NLRB 509 (1975). In that case the Board held at 512:

> The Board has previously interpreted Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act as not protecting a supervisor-member from sanctions against him by his union under circumstances where he is also the sole owner of the employer.[14] The legislative history behind Section 8(b)(1)(B) makes it clear that Congress was only concerned with protecting employers in the selection of their representatives for the two purposes provided therein; there is no indication that Congress intended to protect the employer himself against such fines and sanctions.[15] There is no restraint or coercion against the employer in the selection of his representatives for the prohibited objects where the employer himself is acting as the representative for these purposes. This dichotomy in treatment of union sanctions imposed on an employer's supervisors as opposed to those levied directly against the employer himself may also be explained by the fact that it is difficult to envision circumstances where the employer would be greatly influenced in the performance of his grievance-adjustment or collective-bargaining functions where any decision he makes in those respects directly works to his benefit or detriment depending on how he decides it.

[14] See Local 146, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO, et al. (Robert Dale Jones d/b/a Aarctic Heating and Cooling Company), 203 NLRB 1090 (1973); Bricklayers, Masons and Plasterers' Union, Local No. 1 (Barr Floors, Inc.), 209 NLRB 820 (1974).

[15] This interpretation is also consistent with the Supreme Court's analysis of the legislative history behind Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) in Florida Power, supra.

As pointed out by Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro in his decision in Operating Engineers Local 501 (Peterson Mfg. Co.), 269 NLRB 685 (1984), a union's motivation or "good faith" in imposing discipline is immaterial in these circumstances. At 668 footnote 5, Administrative Law Judge Shapiro stated, in part:

> [I]n determining whether a union violates Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act, the union's good faith or motivation in imposing discipline is immaterial. See NLRB v. Sheet Metal Workers, 477 F.2d 675, 677 (5th Cir. 1973). (In finding that the union violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(B), the court held that the union's "good faith" in imposing discipline was immaterial) and Carpenters (Skippy Enterprises), 211 NLRB 222, 227 (1974) ("Respondent's good faith is not involved, for the test of restraint and coercion under Section 8(b)(1)(B) turns not on the union's motive, but on whether the union engaged in conduct which . . . tends to restrain or coerce employers within the intent of that section").

The United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit has held that placing the emphasis on the effect of the union's actions, rather than the union's intent, is more consistent with the purpose of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. In its opinion in NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 323, 703 F.2d 501 (11th Cir. 1983), the court held at 507:

> Placing the emphasis on the effect caused by the union's actions, rather than its intent, is more consistent with the fundamental purpose of the statute. Congress' overriding concern in enacting § 8(b)(1)(B) was to insulate an employer's section of his collective bargaining or grievance adjustment representative from union influence or interference. See, e.g., Florida Power & Light, 417 U.S. at 803, 94 S.Ct. at 2744, 41 L.Ed.2d at 487. An attempt to force a member-supervisor to cease working for a nonunion company demonstrably infringes on the employer's right to choose that person as its representative. See A.S. Horner, 177 NLRB at 502. In view of that inevitable result, even a union endeavoring only to enforce an internal regulation, and not primarily motivated to influence an employer's selection, can deprive the employer of the protection afforded by the statute.

The Board's decision in Typographical Union Local 6 (Clark & Fritts, Inc.), 236 NLRB 317 (1978), involved different issues and different facts than are present in the instant proceeding. Administrative Law Judge Julius Cohn stated the issue at 319 as follows:

> The issue is whether Respondent, by engaging in work stoppages in January 1976 and February 1977, forced and coerced the Company to comply with a collective-bargaining agreement it did not execute and further coerced the Company to designate a representative other than of its own choosing for the purposes of collective bargaining. Determinative of these issues is the response to the question whether the Company is bound to the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the League dated October 4, 1975. In the circumstances described above, I find the Company to be so bound.

The judge in that case found at 320:

> I find that the Company was bound by its agreement of 1964 to all modifications, extensions, or renewals of the then existing contract; that since that time it has adopted and abided by the successive collective-bargaining agreements between the League and Respondent; that it failed to respond to the letter of Respondent advising it of the negotiations to be conducted with the League; that despite the protestations of the Company that it is being forced to adhere to the terms of League contracts with Respondent in perpetuity, it could have withdrawn from its arrangement with the Union by timely notice either before or after receipt of the June 20, 1975 letter and by request that the Union bargain separately with it; that, during the course of the 1975 negotiations, the Company's only communication which might barely be considered a protest was made to the League rather than to the Union.

Accordingly, the judge in that case recommended dismissal of the 8(b)(1)(B) and (3) allegations of the General Counsel's complaint. There were also some other 8(b)(1)(A) allegations in that case, but those are not pertinent here.

In adopting the judge's dismissal of the 8(b)(1)(B) and (3) allegations, the Board held at page 317, footnote 1:

> In affirming the Administrative Law Judge's dismissal of those allegations of the complaint alleging that Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) and (3) of the Act, we rely on, in addition to Resilient Floor and Decorative Covering Local Union No. 1247 of Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO (Linoleum Studio, Inc.), 233 NLRB 980 (1977), cited by the Administrative Law Judge, our Decisions in Phoenix Air Conditioning, Inc., 231 NLRB 341 (1977), and Ted Hicks and Associates, Inc., 232 NLRB 717 (1977). In each of the latter two cases, as in this case, the Board found that an employer, who was not a member of a multiemployer bargaining unit, had signed a memorandum agreement which bound it, absent timely notice to the contrary, to future contracts negotiated by the union and the multiemployer association. We find the rationales set forth in Phoenix Air Conditioning and Ted Hicks and Associates, Inc., to be controlling in the case before us.

The Resilient Floor case cited above in New York Typographical Union involves different facts and issues than are present in the instant proceeding. That case pertained to a strike by the respondent union therein allegedly to compel various employers to sign contracts whereby those employers agreed to abide by the terms of the master labor agreement to be negotiated by the union and four multiemployer associations. In that case the Board stated at page 981:

> The question presented for our consideration herein is whether Respondent engaged in conduct proscribed by Section 8(b)(1)(B) and (3) of the Act by (1) directing a strike against the Employers > herein notwithstanding their request to bargain on an association or individual basis and/or (2) by its continuing offer to execute interim contracts whereby the Employers agreed to abide by the terms of the master contract negotiated by Respondent and four multiemployer Associations to which none of the Employers belonged.

In that case, the Board held at pages 982 and 983:

> In sum, we find that Respondent's August 2 strike action against the Employers herein was lawfully instituted following timely offers to bargain with all Employers and negotiation to impasse with the Associations. We further find that the Employers' sole bargaining proposal was lawfully rejected by Respondent and, in the absence of any further request to bargain, Respondent's continuing offer to execute interim contracts constituted neither a refusal to bargain within the meaning of Section 8(b)(3) nor an attempt to unlawfully coerce the Employers in the selection of their bargaining representative in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B). Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

The Phoenix Air Conditioning case refered to above in New York Typographical Union involved allegations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) issues, which are different than the issues and facts in the instant proceeding. The Board held in that case at page 342:

> As mentioned above, Respondent attempted to terminate its agreements with the Union by letter sent on July 24. The Union's business agent, William Miller, received the letter on July 28 and called Bob Brooks, an officer of Respondent, on the same day. Miller stated to Brooks that his notice was untimely and that the Union and Respondent still had a valid agreement between them. Brooks replied that the notice was effective and, therefore, all agreements were terminated. In these circumstances, where the notice was clearly untimely, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by its conduct of attempting to terminate the memorandum and collective-bargaining agreements and thereafter repudiating and refusing to honor said agreement following the Union's demand for continued compliance therewith.
> Respondent asserted as a defense its inability to secure the performance bond required by the contract. However, the Board has consistently held that financial hardship is no justification for repudiation or modification of a collective-bargaining agreement or a term thereof. [Footnotes omitted.]

The Ted Hicks case referred to above in New York Typographical Union also involved allegations of 8(a)(1) and (5) issues, which are different than the issues and facts in the instant proceeding. The Board held in that case at page 714:

> Here, as we found earlier, Respondent, in its memorandum agreement, agreed to be bound by the results of a continuing collective-bargaining relationship between the Union and the AGC. The Union's notice to the AGC did not constitute an end to this relationship. Rather, it merely signaled the termination of the terms set forth in the 1974 contract and the desire to negotiate new terms for the next 2-year period. In these circumstances, Respondent either continued to be bound by the results of the negotiations between the Union and the AGC, or was obligated to give proper notice to the Union that it no longer intended to be so bound. Having falied to give any notice to the Union that it desired to cease giving effect to the memorandum agreement, Respondent is estopped from now asserting that it is not bound by the 1976 agreement.
> Accordingly, we find that by unilaterally failing and refusing to implement the existing collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the AGC, Respondent refused to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. [Footnotes omitted.]

The ruling that the Respondent's alter ego theory did not constitute a valid affirmative defense to the General Counsel's complaint in this case was not predicated on the fact that an earlier unfair labor practice charge alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act on an alter ego theory had been filed and withdrawn by the union. (See the discussion at Tr. 133–149 and especially my comments at Tr. 141 and 142.) Thus, the Respondent's alter ego theory as an affirmative defense was not rejected because of administrative action by the Regional Director for Region 19 of the Board in some other case. Therefore, in my view, the ruling at the trial in this case was consistent with the Board's decision in Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 274 (Warwick Caterers), 269 NLRB 482 (1984), because the alter ego affirmative defense was not rejected because of the administrative action in an earlier unfair labor practice case. However, the unfair labor practice allegations in the Hotel & Restaurant Employees case involved Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act, and, thus, a remand was necessary in that case in view of the holding that, if the defense had been considered and found to have merit, ". . . all elements of the 8(b)(7)(C) violation would not have been satisfied." Here the General Counsel's allegations involve Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act, and, as indicated at the trial and herein, the alter ego theory would not establish an affirmative defense in these circumstances where PAC itself is an employer and Witty possesses authority for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances on behalf of PAC.

General Counsel's Exhibit 3 and the testimony of Dilworth at the trial revealed that the intraunion charge against Witty, and the fine levied on Witty, was done because Witty was employed by a nonunion employer. General Counsel's Exhibit 6 shows the link, or connection, between the Respondent Union's fine and the collective-bargaining authority of Witty. General Counsel's Exhibit 6 shows that the $16,000 fine levied by the Union against Witty would be reduced to $8000—"provided that he sign a contract with Local 46 within the 30 days and his withdrawal be annulled in accordance with the International Constitution Article XXVII, Section 5." Considering the link between the substantial reduction in the amount of the fine against Witty, and Witty's exercising his collective-bargaining authority to sign a contract with the Union, I conclude that the evidence establishes that the Respondent Union has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

With regard to the Respondent's posttrial motion to stay, or in the alternative, motion to reopen hearing, I conclude that those motions lack merit because the Respondent has not shown a basis for staying this proceeding, nor has the Respondent shown that there is newly discovered evidence, or evidence previously unavailable to the Respondent which would be admissible in this proceeding and which would warrant the reopening of the trial.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. PAC, Inc. is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Robert Witty is, and has been at all times material herein, a representative of an employer, PAC, Inc., for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances.

4. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act by restraining and coercing an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances by processing internal union charges against Robert Witty; by holding a trial before the Union's executive board on such charges against Robert Witty; and levying a fine against Robert Witty.

5. The unfair labor practices described above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Since I have found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practices. I shall also recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[1]

ORDER

The Respondent, International Brother of Electrical Workers Local Union No. 46, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Restraining and coercing an employer, PAC, Inc. in the selection of PAC, Inc.'s representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances by processing internal union charges against Robert Witty; by holding a trial before the Union's executive board on such charges against Robert Witty; and by levying a fine against Robert Witty.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing PAC, Inc. in the selection of representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the fine levied against Robert Witty and expunge from the Union's records all the documents relating to the internal union charge, trial, and fine of Robert Witty.

(b) Notify in writing both PAC, Inc. and Robert Witty that the Union has taken the foregoing action.

(c) Post at its office in Seattle, Washington, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT restrain and coerce an employer, PAC, Inc. in the selection of PAC, Inc.'s representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances by processing internal union charges against Robert Witty; by holding a trial before the Union's executive board on such charges against Robert Witty; and by levying a fine against Robert Witty.

[1] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[2] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce PAC, Inc. in the selection of representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

WE WILL rescind the fine levied against Robert Witty, and WE WILL expunge from the Union's records all documents relating to the internal union charge, trial, and fine of Robert Witty.

WE WILL notify in writing both PAC, Inc. and Robert Witty that we have taken the foregoing action.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS LOCAL UNION NO. 46, AFFILIATED WITH THE INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS, AFL-CIO

Holyoke Water Power Company and Local 455, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 1–CA–20618

11 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 31 August 1983 Administrative Law Judge Martin J. Linsky issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the Charging Party,[1] and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent and the Union filed answering briefs.[2]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions for the reasons set forth below and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The record shows that the Respondent operates a power plant which includes a Forced Draft Fan Room (fan room). The fan room contains two fans which force air into the Respondent's burners as a part of the combustion process. No one disputes that the fan room is very noisy, and Respondent's Station Superintendent Robert Dwyer acknowledged that there is a noise problem there. The Respondent provides earmuffs for those who must enter this room and has posted notices that the fan room is a "High Noise Area. Hearing Protection Must be Worn." Although no employees work full time in the fan room, the Respondent's mechanics and operators enter the room periodically to perform maintenance and repair work.[4]

The Respondent and the Union have had a collective-bargaining relationship since 1971. On 11 January 1983 the Union requested that the Respondent permit the Union's industrial hygienist to have access to the fan room to survey potential health and safety hazards. The Respondent denied the Union's request but gave the Union a summary of an overall noise survey performed in August 1982 by a hygienist engaged by the Respondent. This survey did not specifically cover the noise level of the fan room, but rather showed the weighted average of noise level exposures of certain employees. The Respondent later directed its test coordinator, Richard Ward, to take a noise level reading in the fan room and supplied the Union with a copy of Ward's report. Ward, who is not an industrial hygienist, testified that he was unaware of whether conditions in the fan room at the time of his reading were representative of its usual conditions.

The judge found that the Respondent was obligated to grant access to the fan room to an industrial hygienist of the Union's choice and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by denying the Union's request for such access. In so doing, the judge noted the obligation of an employer to provide a union with information relevant and necessary to the union's performance of its representation duties. He noted also that an employer is obligated to bargain on request about health and safety conditions since they are terms and conditions of employment. Then, relying on Winona Industries, 257 NLRB 695 (1981), the judge noted that requests for access to survey for safety hazards are in the nature of requests for information and that access cannot be denied. He found that granting access would not cause the Respondent any undue hardship, and he noted the testimony of the Union's hygienist that its testing would take, at most, 1 day to complete.

In finding a violation, the judge rejected the Respondent's contentions that (a) access is irrelevant and unnecessary to the Union's representation duties, and (b) the Respondent did supply the information sought, albeit in the form of the test results then in the Respondent's possession. The judge noted that the many hazards inherent in exposure to high noise levels certainly make this matter relevant to the Union's representation duties. He further found the test results given the Union were inadequate for the Union's purposes. He noted that the first test merely gauged the average noise level to determine if it fell within OSHA standards, and he noted the undisputed testimony of the Union's hygienist that hearing can be damaged even where the average noise level falls within OSHA standards. Finally, he noted that there was some dispute as to the method and results of these tests.

In its exceptions the Respondent argues, inter alia, that the Union's request for access must be balanced against the Employer's property rights and that, here, its property rights must prevail because the Respondent has provided the Union with studies and has allowed the Union's business agent

[1] Hereafter the Union.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[4] In sec. III,B of his decision, the judge stated that mechanics are usually there for an 8-hour day when they go into the fan room. However, Respondent's mechanic William O'Rourke testified that the amount of time spent in the fan room varies. He said that routine preventative maintenance entails about 15 minutes while work on the pump is usually an 8-hour job.

access to the fan room. Accordingly, the Respondent contends, it has provided the Union with an alternate means of obtaining the needed information, thus obviating the need for access to its premises.

We agree with the Respondent's contention that an employer's right to control its property is a factor that must be weighed in analyzing whether an outside union representative should be afforded access to an employer's property. NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956). Thus, we disagree with the judge's analysis insofar as it finds that a request for access is tantamount to a request for information; that is, the union is entitled to access if it is shown that the information sought is relevant to the union's proper performance of its representation duties. While the presence of a union representative on the employer's premises may be relevant to the union's performance of its representative duties, we disagree that that alone, ipso facto, obligates an employer to open its doors. Rather, each of two conflicting rights must be accommodated. Fafnir Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1966). First, there is the right of employees to be responsibly represented by the labor organization of their choice and, second, there is the right of the employer to control its property and ensure that its operations are not interfered with. As noted by the Supreme Court in Babcock & Wilcox, supra, 351 U.S. at 112, the Government protects employee rights as well as property rights, and "[a]ccommodation between the two must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other."

Thus, we are constrained to balance the employer's property rights against the employees' right to proper representation. Where it is found that responsible representation of employees can be achieved only by the union's having access to the employer's premises, the employer's property rights must yield to the extent necessary to achieve this end. However, the access ordered must be limited to reasonable periods so that the union can fulfill its representation duties without unwarranted interruption of the employer's operations. On the other hand, where it is found that a union can effectively represent employees through some alternate means other than by entering on the employer's premises, the employer's property rights will predominate, and the union may properly be denied access.

In sum, the circumstances presented in each case involving a request for access must be carefully weighed, and each of the conflicting rights must be carefully balanced and accommodated in reaching a decision. We shall in the future analyze such cases in this fashion, and we overrule those prior Board cases such as Winona Industries, supra, to the extent that they set forth an inconsistent analysis.

Applying this analysis to the instant case, we find that the Respondent's property rights, on balance, are outweighed and that the Respondent must afford the union hygienist reasonable access to its fan room to conduct noise level studies.

First, we agree with the judge that health and safety conditions are a term and condition of employment about which an employer is obligated to bargain on request. Clearly, health and safety data is relevant to the Union's representation obligation. Minnesota Mining Co., 261 NLRB 27 (1982). It is a matter of common knowledge that exposure to excessive noise presents potential health hazards, and in this case no one disputes that the Respondent's fan room is very noisy. The Respondent's safety superintendent acknowledged that there is a noise problem there. In these circumstances, the employees' right to responsible representation entails the Union's obtaining accurate noise level readings for the fan room to ascertain the extent of the hazard and to suggest means of ensuring that employees are properly protected. Balancing this right against the Respondent's asserted property rights, we find that, here, the property rights must yield to the extent necessary to enable the union hygienist to independently conduct his noise level tests.

We note that the Respondent says that access would entail interference with production; however, we also note that the fan room is not a production area and no employees work there full time. Rather, only mechanics and operators enter periodically to maintain and repair the equipment. In these circumstances, it appears that the presence of a union hygienist in the fan room would occasion little if any interference with the production process. Moreover, for the reasons relied on by the judge, we agree that the test results which the Respondent supplied are insufficient to meet the Union's purposes. Nor is the Respondent's willingness to permit the Union's business agent to enter the fan room sufficient absent evidence that the business agent is qualified to perform the tests and evaluate the results.

Accordingly, we agree with the judge that the Respondent must permit a union hygienist to enter its fan room to test for noise hazards. However, since the judge did not in his recommended Order place any restrictions on the access ordered, we shall modify the recommended order to provide that the access be for a reasonable period sufficient to allow the union hygienist to fully observe and survey noise level hazards. This limitation is in line with our resolve to accommodate the conflicting rights with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other.[5]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Holyoke Water Power Company, Holyoke, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) On request, grant access, by an industrial hygienist designated by the Union, to the FD fan room for a reasonable period sufficient to permit the hygienist to fully observe and survey noise level hazards."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[5] For this reason, and because such access has not even been shown necessary in the first place, we reject the contention of the General Counsel and the Union that the recommended Order should be modified to provide for plantwide access.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Local 455, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, by denying the Union's request for access to the Forced Draft Fan Room at our Mt. Tom facility by an industrial hygienist designated by the Union to observe and survey noise level hazards which are relevant to the Union's discharge of its bargaining obligation.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, grant access by an industrial hygienist designated by the Union to the Forced Draft Fan Room for a reasonable period sufficient to permit the hygienist to fully observe and survey noise level hazards.

HOLYOKE WATER POWER COMPANY

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARTIN J. LINSKY, Administrative Law Judge. This case arose upon a charge filed by Local 455, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) on January 14, 1983. The complaint, which issued on February 25, 1983, alleges that Holyoke Water Power Company (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by refusing to give the Union's industrial hygienist access to the forced draft fan room (FD fan room) at Respondent's Mt. Tom location to observe and survey safety hazards regarding noise levels since the Union's request on January 11, 1983.

Respondent, in its answer, denies the commission of any unfair labor practices. Although Respondent admitted it denied access it claims that access is not necessarily for, or relevant to, the Union's function as the exclusive bargaining representative of unit employees.

A hearing was held on April 11 and 12, 1983, in Boston, Massachusetts. All parties filed briefs. Based on the entire record in the case, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following[1]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, Holyoke Water Power Company, is, and has been at all times material herein, a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. At all times mentioned, Respondent has maintained its principal office and place of business at One Canal Street in Holyoke, Massachusetts, and is now and continuously has been engaged at said plant and others generating and supplying electric power to residential and commercial customers.

In the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent annually derives gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and purchases and receives at its Holyoke, Massachusetts location products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The Respondent admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is admitted and I find that the Union, Local 455, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] The General Counsel's motion to correct the transcript is granted.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Issue Presented

The only issue is whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to give an industrial hygienist designated by the Union access to the FD fan room, at Respondent's Mt. Tom facility to observe and survey safety hazards regarding noise levels.

B. Background and Facts

Since 1971 the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees of Respondent employed in its production and operations department at its Mt. Tom station, Riverdale station, Hadley Falls station, and Holyoke Hydro station in Holyoke, Massachusetts. The Union has been recognized as such representative by Respondent and they have executed successive collective-bargaining agreements.

Before 1981 Respondent generated power using oil. In 1981, however, the Mt. Tom facility began converting to coal as its power source. This change was subject to a contract reopener under the parties' 1980–1982 collective bargaining agreement.

In the fall of 1981, Respondent and the Union began negotiations on the effect of this conversion on the bargaining unit employees. Health and safety matters were among the issues discussed in the reopener. During the negotiations on the coal reopener, Respondent retained an acoustical engineering firm, Goodfriend Associates, to make a presentation to the Union concerning noise exposure in the plant. The Union retained an industrial hygienist, Richard Youngstrom, to help it interpret the report presented by Respondent and to help the Union identify safety hazards and make recommendations for controlling such hazards.

The coal reopener negotiations concluded in November 1981, with various points of agreements between the parties. The contract containing the coal reopener was due to expire on July 1, 1982, and the parties negotiated toward a new contract from May 1982 until June 1982. The Union raised several health and safety matters in those negotiations. A new collective-bargaining agreement was reached, and is currently in effect.

After the coal conversion was finalized, the Union requested that its industrial hygienist be given access to Respondent's premises to survey safety hazards. This request was denied and led to an unfair labor practice charge, which was settled under the terms of a settlement agreement permitting access by the Union's industrial hygienist to survey hazards associated with the conversation to coal. The FD fan room was not mentioned in the settlement agreement.

Edward Collins, the Union's business manager and financial secretary, and Youngstrom met with representatives of the Respondent on January 11, 1983, to discuss compliance with the settlement agreement. At this meeting, access was granted to those parts of the plant covered in the settlement agreement but access was denied to the FD fan room. Access was denied by Respondent's plant superintendent Robert Dwyer and Regional Personnel Manager Donald Riga. The only reason given for this denial was that the FD fan room was not covered in the settlement agreement.

Youngstrom conducted a survey of potential health and safety hazards on January 11, 1983. The results of this survey and his recommendations were included in a report submitted to the Union and used by the Union in collective bargaining with respect to health and safety matters.

Respondent provided the Union with a summary of a noise survey done by industrial hygienist designated by Respondent, i.e., Oneil Banks. The survey was taken in August 1982, but did not include the FD fan room.

The FD fan room is a room containing two forced-draft fans which force air into the station's burners. The fans, driven by motors, are part of the combustion process of Respondent. The FD fan room is approximately 20 feet by 40 feet and 30 feet high. In addition to the two fans the room contains two limitex sump pumps, various piping, four ash hoppers that collect ash, and louvers which are built into the walls and vary the amount of air pulled into the room.

The construction and operation of the FD fan room has been the same since it was built in 1960, however, the conversion to coal has increased the percentage of time the fans are required to operate at full speed from 60 percent to about 95 percent of the time.

While no employees are assigned to work in the FD fan room full time, employees must enter the room in the course of their jobs for various purposes and at various times. Mechanics must enter the FD fan room to repair pumps, repair leaks, and do preventive maintenance and other duties to ensure proper functioning of the fans and meters. Mechanics are usually in the room for an 8-hour day when they go into the FD fan room. On several occasions mechanics have spent 2 or 3 straight days working in the room, depending on the job. Preventive maintenance done by mechanics requires about 15 or 20 minutes in the FD fan room once every month. Utility operators go into the FD fan room every 2 hours during an 8-hour shift and remain in the room between 5 and 10 minutes each time as part of their "rounds." Those "rounds" include checking bearings, checking oil levels, opening and closing valves, and checking that nothing is out of order with either sump pump. Occasionally utility operators have to spend up to an hour in the room.

There is no dispute about the fact that the FD fan room is extremely noisy. Witnesses testifying for both the General Counsel and Respondent testified that the room was so noisy that a conversation was impossible and you had to read lips to communicate. Respondent has signs posted outside the FD fan room which warn, "High Noise Area Hearing Protection Must Be Worn." Employees testified as to the effects on them of exposure to noise in the FD fan room. These effects included ringing in the ears, temporary decrease in hearing ability and excessive fatigue. A year or so prior to the hearing in this case an employee named James Parnicky, a utility operator, had complained to the Union about the noise in the FD fan room. In addition, during the reopener talks in November 1982, Norman Racine, a mechanic, had likewise complained about the noise in the FD fan room.

Respondent provides earmuffs or earphones for employees and others who must go into the FD fan room. Employees credibly testified that they were less than satisfied with this protection, explaining that the earmuffs or earphones often fell off in the course of their work and were difficult to adjust over other required equipment such as hard hats.

After denying the Union's request for access to the FD fan room, Respondent discovered that it had never measured the noise level in the room. On February 8, 1983, Respondent directed Test Technician Supervisor Richard Ward to conduct readings on the noise level in the FD fan room. Ward testified that since he was not an industrial hygienist, he could not make any recommendations about what to do with his readings. He also testified that he had no experience designing controls and had no way of knowing if he took his readings under representative conditions. Respondent sent a copy of Ward's report to the Union on March 18, 1983.

C. Analysis

It is well established that an employer has a duty to provide a union with information which is reasonably necessary and relevant to the Union's duty to represent its members. Equally settled is that safety and health conditions are terms and conditions of employment about which an employer is obligated to bargain on request. Gulf Power Co., 156 NLRB 622 (1966), enfd. 384 F.2d 822 (5th Cir. 1967); Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 261 NLRB 27 (1982). Respondent contends that the access requested here by the Union is not reasonably necessary and relevant to the Union's duty to represent employees because the Union has not "demonstrated a safety concern among employees." The essence of this contention is that no employee on the union-management safety committee raised the issue at those meetings and no grievance has been filed, therefore, the information is not relevant. Respondent argues further that it has demonstrated an awareness of the high noise levels and has taken steps to remedy the situation.

Employee requests for union action is not determinative of a union's obligation to bargain regarding the matter. It is noted, however, that the reopener talks raised the issue of noise levels in parts of the plant and reasonably and legitimately raised the issue of noise generally as an issue the Union should concern itself with. As noted earlier utility operator James Parnicky and mechanic Norman Racine had complained about noise in the FD fan room and Racine had brought this to the attention of Respondent 2 months before access to the FD fan room was requested.

Respondent also contends that because no employees work full time in the FD fan room, the information about noise there is relevant. Testimony from industrial hygienists retained by the Respondent and the Union explained the hazard of exposure to noise at certain levels. The hazards include damage to the ear, loss of hearing, nervousness, hypertension, and psychological problems. The probability of such problems certainly are relevant to the Union's duty to represent its members.

The Board held recently that an employer's refusal to give access to a union industrial hygienist for inspection and survey of safety hazards, violates Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Winona Industries, 257 NLRB 695 (1981). Such access is treated as in the nature of information and access cannot be denied. The facts here put this case squarely within the principles of Winona, supra. In Winona, as here, Respondent argued that it was not obligated to give access to the Union's industrial hygienist because even if relevant, the information sought had been given or was available through other means. The results of a noise dosimeter study taken at Respondent's Mt. Tom facility in August 1982, by Respondent's industrial hygienist, Oneil Banks, were given to the Union. The results of a later sound level test performed in the FD fan room by Richard Ward, a test coordinator for Northeast Utilities Service Company, Respondent's parent company, were also provided. These results do not change the Union's need for access by its industrial hygienist. The study from Banks did not focus specifically on several items which the Union needed to test. There was also some dispute as to the method and results of those tests. Respondent's study was not sufficient to give the Union information which it needed to recommend and design controls, but rather checked an average noise level to see if it was within OSHA compliance. It is informative to note that in preparing for trial in this case Respondent's lead counsel, Jason Berger, physically inspected the FD fan room and had one of his witnesses testify as to what happened when the witness and Berger tried to have a conversation inside the FD fan room.

There was unrebutted testimony by the Union's industrial hygienist that hearing damage can take place even when weighted average noise levels are within OSHA compliance. This information was not supplied. Banks admitted that his study could not tell for what period of time an employee had been exposed to peak noise levels, for how long, or how many times. He also admitted that factors such as the presence or absence of windows and doors and whether or not they were opened would affect noise level exposure perhaps significantly, but such things were not in his reports. All of these omissions make the offered studies inadequate for the Union's purposes and no adequate substitute for permitting access to the FD fan room by the Union's industrial hygienist.

Furthermore, granting access to the Union's industrial hygienist would not cause any undue hardship or inconvenience to Respondent or interfere with its business operations. Nothing in the FD fan room was confidential in nature. The Union-designated industrial hygienist Richard Youngstrom testified the test would take probably less than half a day or at most 1 day. After the Union's January 11, 1983 request for access was denied, Respondent had tests run and turned the results over to the Union. It could have just as easily granted the Union that same access to run its own test and should have.

I find that Respondent had an obligation to grant access to the FD fan room to the Union's industrial hygienist. By denying such request, Respondent refused to bargain in good faith and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[2]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Holyoke Water Power Company, is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 455, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By denying the Union's request for access by an industrial hygienist chosen by the Union to the FD fan room at Respondent's Mt. Tom facility to observe and survey noise level hazards, which were relevant to the Union's discharge of its bargaining obligation, Respondent refused to bargain in good faith and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act. I also recommend that Respondent be ordered to take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. I will not recommend a broader remedial order than the posting of a notice and the granting of access to the FD fan room. However, future requests for access to parts of the plant by the Union should be treated by Respondent consistent with the principles underlying Winona, supra.

[2] An analysis of the rationale underlying the "time study cases" cited by the General Counsel also support the General Counsel's position that the denial of access violated the Act. The "time study cases" concluded that to deny the Union's time study expert access to conduct his own tests even though Respondent turned over the results of its time study tests violated the Act. Fafnir Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 146 NLRB 1582 (1964), enfd. 362 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1966), Kendall Co., 196 NLRB 588 (1972), Wilson Athletic Goods, 160 NLRB 621 (1968).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, Holyoke Water Power Company, Holyoke, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with Local 455, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO by denying the Union's request for access to the FD fan room at Respondent's Mt. Tom facility by an industrial hygienist chosen by the Union to observe and survey noise level hazards which are relevant to the Union's discharge of its bargaining obligations.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, grant access to the FD fan room by an industrial hygienist designated by the Union to observe and survey noise level hazards.

(b) Post at its Mt. Tom facility in Holyoke, Massachusetts, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[3] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[4] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 2 August 1984 Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and the Charging Party and the General Counsel each filed a response to the Respondent's exceptions with a supporting brief.[1]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, EPE, Inc., Fredericksburg, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The General Counsel and the Charging Party each moved to strike the Respondent's exceptions as not conforming to the requirements of Sec. 102.46(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. We find it unnecessary to pass on these motions in view of our determination that the exceptions lack merit.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, inter alia, by canceling its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, we find it unnecessary to rely on his finding that the wage reopener provision of the agreement does not provide for the cancellation of the entire collective-bargaining agreement in the event of the failure of the parties to reach agreement in reopener negotiations. We rely instead on the other grounds stated by the judge for finding that the Respondent unlawfully canceled the collective-bargaining agreement.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Washington, D.C., on May 30, 1984. The charge was filed on January 24, 1984, by Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO (the Union). The complaint, which issued on March 6, 1984, and was amended on March 15, 1984, and at the hearing alleges that EPE, Inc., formerly European Parts Exchange, Inc. (Respondent or the Company),[1] violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. The gravamen of the complaint is that the Company allegedly (1) approached wage reopener negotiations with a fixed position, (2) insisted to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, and (3) unilaterally terminated its contract with the Union. The Company's answer denies the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices. All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs were waived.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the demeanor of the one witness, and having considered the arguments of the parties, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The Company, a California corporation, with an office and place of business in Fredericksburg, Virginia, is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of foreign automobile parts and related products. In the operation of its business, the Company annually sells and ships from its Fredericksburg facility, products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside of Virginia. I find, as the Company admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE BARGAINING UNIT INVOLVED

It is undisputed, and I so find, that since September 28, 1982, and at all times material, the Union has been and is the certified and exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Fredericksburg, Virginia location, including parts department employees, but excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

IV. BACKGROUND: HISTORY OF PRIOR LITIGATION

The Company's response to unionization has been the subject of two previous unfair labor practice proceedings. The facts of the second case are closely related to those of the present case. In June 1981, the Union commenced an organizational campaign among the employees at the Fredericksburg facility. In European Parts Exchange, Case 5–CA–13517, the administrative law judge found, in sum, that the Company responded to this campaign by discriminatorily discharging the leading union adherent after subjecting him to harassment, isolation, altered working conditions, and unwarranted discipline, and otherwise violating the Act by coercive interrogation, creating the impression of surveillance of union activities, and unlawfully restricting employee union activity. The judge found and concluded that the Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and recommended, inter alia, a broad cease-and-desist order by reason of the Company's "flagrant disregard for the fundamental rights guaranteed employees by the Act." No exceptions were filed and, on June 2, 1983, the judge's recommended Order was adopted by the Board.

On September 28, 1982, following a Board-conducted election, the Board certified the Union as representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. The certification is reported at 264 NLRB 224. In late January 1983,[2] the Company and the Union commenced contract negotiations, and on April 25 reached complete agreement on the terms of a contract. That fact has never been in dispute. Nevertheless, despite its own promises and repeated requests by the Union, the Company did not execute the contract until December 5, following an unfair labor practice hearing before a second administrative law judge. In the meantime, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges which resulted in the issuance of a consolidated complaint and the practice hearing on December 5 in Cases 5-CA-15584 and 5-CA-15777. On January 20, 1984, the judge issued his decision, finding and concluding that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by (1) failing and refusing to execute and abide by the terms of the agreed-upon contract, (2) unilaterally increasing the unit employees' health care insurance premiums without notifying and bargaining with the Union, (3) unilaterally increasing wages without notifying and bargaining with the Union, and (4) dealing directly with the unit employees and bypassing the Union by polling the employees as to whether they desired health insurance coverage and if so, what type of coverage they desired. The above third violation consisted of a 15-cent hourly wage increase which was granted on September 12 and announced to the employees by letter shortly thereafter. The judge recommended, inter alia, by way of affirmative relief, that the Company be ordered to forthwith sign the contract, reimburse the employees for any losses as a result of its failure to honor the contract, reinstitute the insurance premiums as they existed prior to the July 8 increases, pay the carrier the difference between those premiums and the increased premiums, and reimburse the employees for the increases they paid as a result of the July 8 increase. However, the judge recommended that: "This obligation shall be tolled either on the date Respondent bargains to an agreement with the Union over the premium increases involved herein or on the date a bona fide impasse exists after good-faith bargaining over the matter." Respondent filed exceptions which were pending before the Board at the time of the present hearing. On June 19, 1984, the Board issued its Decision and Order in 270 NLRB 1244. The Board affirmed the judge's findings and conclusions but modified the proposed order. The Board rejected the Company's argument that the contract permitted it to grant wage increases without discussion with the Union. The Board deleted from its order, the proposed qualification regarding bargaining over insurance premiums. The Board held that article XIX of the contract precluded the Company from increasing premiums paid by the employees for insurance coverage during the effective period of the contract without the agreement of the Union. The Board reserved for the compliance stage of the proceeding the Company's argument that 5 cents of the 15-cent wage increase was to compensate the employees for the insurance premium increase.

V. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES IN THE PRESENT CASE

A. The Facts

The evidence submitted in the present proceeding consists of stipulated or admitted matters and the uncontroverted testimony of Union Vice President and Regional Director Bruce Dunton, the only witness. The contract between the Company and the Union was effective by its terms from March 15, 1983, through July 1, 1984, and subject to renewal from year to year thereafter. The contract contained in pertinent part the following articles:

> ARTICLE XIX—HEALTH AND WELFARE INSURANCE PLANS
> During the life of this Agreement, the Company will maintain their present insurance plans. The cost of such plans, paid by the employees, shall not be increased during the life of this Agreement. . . .
> ARTICLE XXI—WAGE RATE AND CLASSIFICATIONS
> A. The wage rate and classification Schedule A, attached hereto, and made a part of this Agreement, shall become effective on April 25, 1983. This schedule does not prohibit the Company from paying higher rates for any employee or any classification.
> B. Wage Reopener.
> 1. Between the dates of November 1 and November 15, 1983, either party, by written notice to the other party, can open this Agreement on wages only.
> 2. The parties shall meet within five (5) working days after receipt of said notice and try to reach agreement on new wage rates.
> 3. Should the parties fail to reach agreement on the new wage rates by December 15, 1983, then either party can give five (5) working days notice to cancel said agreement and the Agreement will be cancelled after the five (5) day notice unless extended in writing by both parties.
> 4. Should the parties reach agreement on new wage rates, then said rates will be effective December 16, 1983.

The language of articles XIX and XXI was drafted by the Company and submitted as part of its final offer, which was accepted by the Union.

By letter dated November 15, the Company informed the Union that it was reopening the contract in accordance with terms of article XXI. By letter dated November 21, the Union indicated that it was available to meet, and again requested the Company to sign the contract. By letter dated November 22, the Company stated as follows:

Our proposal for a wage increase is that which was received by the employees on September 12, 1983. The specifics are as follows:

(1) 10¢ per hour cost of living increase.

(2) An additional 5¢ per hour to pay for increased insurance cost.

(3) We propose an additional 10¢ per hour for the lead personnel due to the increased duties and responsibilities.

We would like your written answer no later than December 2, 1983.

In a subsequent position letter to the Board's Regional Office following the filing of the present charge, the Company's labor relations consultant confirmed that the November 22 proposal consisted of the wage and insurance increases which were the subject of the then pending unfair labor practice proceeding. By letter dated November 29, the Union requested a meeting to discuss the Company's proposal and any proposals which the Union might wish to submit.

On December 5, immediately following the unfair labor practice hearing, company and union representatives met informally for about 15 minutes. The Union asked if there was any new money involved in the proposal beyond that for the lead personnel. The Company answered that there was not and that there was no money available for further increases. At this point Union Representative Dunton responded that: "If you find any money between now and spring, give us a call and we will sit down and conclude." There was no further discussion of the matter of wage increases. The Union confirmed its position by letter dated December 9. Thereafter, by letter dated December 19, the Company asserted that: "It would appear by our meeting on December 9th, that the parties have reached an impasse per the Wage Re-opener provision of the Agreement. Therefore the Company has put our last offer in effect, and hereby gives notice to the Union of our terminating said Agreement per its Provisions." At the present hearing, the Company stipulated that by its letter of December 19, the Company acted to cancel the entire contract.

By letter dated January 6, 1984, the Union again restated its position, asserted that it had not broken off negotiations, and requested a meeting and that "if necessary, a Federal mediator be present at that meeting." The Company did not respond to this letter. Instead, by letter dated March 30, 1984, the Company asserted that:

> After review of the sales of the Company by Headquarters in California, it was decided by the Board of Directors to increase the hourly rates of all employees. Therefore we would propose a ten cents (.10) per hour increase effective April 1, 1984. Said amount covers any additional amounts of insurance premiums that might have been or will be necessary at some future date.

The Company also proposed negotiations for a new contract "as the old agreement was cancelled." By letter dated April 12, the Union refused to agree "to an increase in wages, as outlined in your letter, that is coupled with insurance premiums." The Union agreed to commence negotiations for a new or amended contract in accordance with the terms of the current contract. As of the time of the present hearing the Company had not implemented the proposed 10-cent-per-hour increase.

Concluding Findings

I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by the manner in which it purported to reopen the contract, and by unilaterally repudiating the contract when it did not get its way. First, the Company's action in purporting to reopen the contract for wage negotiations was nothing more than a transparent attempt to coerce the Union into ratifying the Company's unilateral and unlawful actions in raising insurance premiums and granting a general 15-cent-per-hour wage increase. It is established Board policy that where, as here, an employer unlawfully (whether for discriminatory motives or in violation of a collective-bargaining obligation), grants wage increases, the Board will not punish the employees by directing the employer to rescind the increases. Rather, the Board will simply order the employer to refrain from such conduct in the future and to bargain in good faith with the representative. See, e.g., Dayton Blueprint Co., 193 NLRB 1100, 1111 (1971); Century Papers, Inc., 155 NLRB 358, 362–363 (1965). Indeed, in Case 5–CA–15584 the Board left open the possibility that part of the wage increase might be used as an offset against reimbursement for the insurance premium increases. The Company never rescinded the wage increases. Therefore, in purporting to reopen the contract for wage negotiations, the Company did not propose anything which the employees were not already receiving. Moreover, the Company proposed that 5 cents per hour of the proposed increase be used to pay for increased insurance costs, although that increase itself was unlawful insofar as it was passed on to the employees. Therefore, the Company was engaging in another step in an unlawful course of conduct. As for the proposed increases to lead personnel (assuming that they had not already been put in effect), they could have been handled by negotiations under the second sentence of article XXI, paragraph A, without any need to formally reopen the entire article. As found, when the parties met briefly on December 5, the Company told the Union that its so-called "proposal" did not involve any new money and the Company could not afford any increases. The Company thereby precluded any meaningful bargaining concerning wages, and disclosed the true motivation for its actions. The Company placed the Union in a position where it could only (1) propose wage decreases which neither party wanted, (2) accept the Company's bogus proposal, and thereby give approval to the Company's prior unlawful actions, or (3) reject that proposal and thereby give the Company a pretext (which it used) to unilaterally terminate the entire contract. I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) by dealing in bad faith with the Union and by submitting a proposal which was nothing more than a demand for approval of its prior unlawful actions, and that the Company did not in fact, or in good faith, reopen article XXI for true wage negotiations. Therefore although the Company's proposal nominally dealt with the subject of wages, the Company did not validly reopen article XXI. For this if no other reason the contract remained in effect. It follows that the Company also acted in bad faith by later proposing a wage increase effective April 1, 1984, notwithstanding that the time for validly reopening article XXI had expired and the contract term ran until July 1, 1984. As the proposed wage increase purported to compensate the employees for the unlawful increased insurance premiums, the Company's proposal, if implemented, would have been unlawful for this additional reason.

Even if the Company, in November, validly reopened article XXI for bona fide wage negotiations, this did not give the Company the right, as it did, to use failure of agreement as an excuse to cancel the entire contract. First, the Union did not break off negotiations. Rather, the Union requested further negotiations "if you find any money between now and spring." Therefore, even assuming good faith on the part of the Company, there was no impasse in negotiations. See generally Hi-Way Billboards, Inc., 206 NLRB 22, 23 (1973), revd. on other grounds 500 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1974); Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), affd. sub nom. American Federation of Television & Radio Artists v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968). Second, article XXI does not provide by its terms for cancellation of the entire contract. Rather, when considered in context, it is evident that the phrase "said agreement" as used in pargaraph 3 refers to the wage reopener agreement. Therefore, if the parties fail to reach agreement on new wage rates after bona fide negotiations, the contract, including wage rates, remains in effect and both parties are precluded from taking unilateral action. Although the meaning of paragraph 3 is not crystal clear, the language was drafted by the Company. Moreover, the Company's interpretation, if correct, would mean that failure of agreement on one subject, i.e. wages, could have drastic and disruptive results, namely, cancellation of the entire contract and potential strike or lockout action. Therefore, insofar as paragraph 3 may be ambiguous as to its meaning, the doubt should be resolved against the Company and in favor of contract stability. Third, even if paragraph 3 sanctioned cancellation of the entire contract, the Company could not lawfully do so because there was no compliance by either or both parties with the notice provisions of Section 8(d) of the Act. In his closing argument at the hearing, the Company's representative asserted that: "There is no case that we could find that had to do in regards to contracts that are so-called cancelled in mid-term because the parties couldn't get together." Evidently the Company's representative, who has many years of experience in labor negotiations, did not look hard. In NLRB v. Lion Oil Co., 352 U.S. 282, 291–293 (1957), the Supreme Court held, insofar as pertinent to the present case, that the notice requirements of Section 8(d) operate "wholly independently of whatever notice requirement the parties have fixed for themselves," and that the statutory notice requirements are applicable "in the middle of a contract which authorizes a reopening on wages." See also NLRB v. Huttig Sash & Door Co., 377 F.2d 963, 968 (8th Cir. 1967); Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 220 NLRB 1389 (1975), enfd. 572 F.2d 1343 (9th Cir. 1978).

Therefore I find, as discussed, that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. I find that the Company's position in this case is not only lacking in merit, but may fairly be characterized as frivolous. I further find that the Company's actions were also violative of the Board's broad cease-and-desist order in Case 5-CA-13517, and a continuation of the unfair labor practices found in Case 5-CA-15584.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. All production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Fredericksburg, Virginia location, including parts department employees, but excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.
4. At all times material the Union has been and is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above.
5. By improperly invoking the wage reopener provision of its contract with the Union, dealing in bad faith with the Union, continuing its prior course of unlawful conduct, and unilaterally terminating its contract with the Union, the Company has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.
6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommended that it be required to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall recommend that the Company be ordered to maintain and give full effect to its collective-bargaining contract with the Union and any successor contracts, to bargain in good faith with the Union, to reimburse the unit employees for their loss of wages and of other employment benefits, if any, as a result of the Company's termination of the contract, with interest, in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and to post appropriate notices.

The Company's conduct in this case demonstrates both a proclivity to violate the Act and a tendency to engage in frivolous litigation before the Board.[9] Thus the Company persisted in litigating Case 5–CA–15584 etc., notwithstanding that it never disputed that it had negotiated the contract with the Union. Therefore, like the administrative law judge in Case 5–CA–13517, I am recommending that the Company be ordered to cease and desist from infringing in any manner on the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act. I am also recommending to the General Counsel that it seek judicial enforcement of the outstanding orders against the Company. I am further recommending that the Company be ordered to reimburse the Union for its costs and expenses incurred in the preparation and conduct of contract negotiations during the period from November 15, 1983, through April 12, 1984, and in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of this proceeding. See Wellman Industries, 248 NLRB 325, 329 (1980); Koval Press, 241 NLRB 1261, 1263–64 (1979), enfd. 622 F.2d 579 (3d Cir. 1980). But for the Company's action in reopening the contract for unlawful reasons, there would have been no need for such negotiations. Therefore, the Union's expenses are attributable to the Company's unfair labor practices.

[9] Although no exceptions were filed in Case 5-CA-13517, the judge's decision may properly be considered in determining whether the Company has demonstrated a proclivity to violate the Act. Operating Engineers Local 12 (Associated Engineers), 270 NLRB 1172 (1984).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, EPE, Inc., Fredericksburg, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively and in good faith with Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, by invoking the wage reopener provision of their contract for improper or unlawful reasons, dealing in bad faith with the Union, continuing to engage in prior unlawful conduct, or unilaterally terminating its contract with the Union.

(b) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is found necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Maintain and give full effect to its collective-bargaining contract or contracts with the Union.

(b) Bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit.

(c) Reimburse the unit employees for their loss of wages or other employment benefits, if any, as a result of its termination of the contract with the Union, with interest, as set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Pay to the Union the costs and expenses incurred by it in the preparation and conduct of contract negotiations during the period from November 15, 1983, through April 12, 1984, and in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of this proceeding, including salaries and travel expenses, such costs and expenses to be determined at the compliance stage of this proceeding.

(f) Post at its Fredericksburg, Virginia place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to bargain collectively and in good faith with Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the appropriate unit, by invoking the wage reopener provision of our contract for improper or unlawful reasons, dealing in bad faith with the Union, continuing to engage in prior unlawful conduct, or unilaterally terminating our contract with the Union. The appropriate unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Fredericksburg, Virginia location, including parts department employees, but excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of your right to engage in union or concerted activities, or to refrain therefrom.

WE WILL maintain and give full effect to our contract or contracts with the Union.

WE WILL bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit.

WE WILL reimburse you for your loss of wages or other employment benefits, if any, as a result of our unlawful termination of the contract with the Union, with interest.

WE WILL compensatc the Union for its costs and expenses incurred in preparing for and participating in contract negotiations during the period from November 15, 1983, through April 12, 1984, and in preparing for and conducting this case.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 24 August 1984 Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing with respect to this matter was held before me in Los Angeles, California, on April 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, 1984. The initial charge was filed on August 2, 1982, by Mike Sullivan and Associates.

On April 29, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a consolidated complaint and notice of hearing alleging, inter alia,[1] a violation by Building Material & Dump Truck Drivers, Local Union No. 420, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Respondent or the Union) of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

The parties were afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel, counsel for Respondent, and the Charging Party.

On the entire record, and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a labor organization engaged in representing its employee-members in matters of collective bargaining with various employers located in Southern California. In the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent annually remits per capita dues of its members in an amount in excess of $50,000 directly to the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, which is headquartered in Washington, D.C.

It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is admitted that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The principal issue raised by the pleadings is whether employee Leonard Worthington, a business agent, was laid off and/or discharged by Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

B. The Facts

1. Worthington's reinstatement

In a prior Board proceeding[2] it was determined that Leonard Worthington, who had been employed by Respondent as a business agent from August 2, 1976, had been unlawfully terminated on June 8, 1978, by Oliver Traweek, then Respondent's secretary-treasurer and chief executive officer.

In 1979, during the pendency of the Board proceeding, Worthington, who expressed an interest in running against Traweek for the position of secretary-treasurer, together with a group of Respondent's members, including Richard Martino, a personal friend of Worthington, agreed to support Martino for the position. Worthington became a political supporter of Martino and contributed $1000 to his campaign. The election procedure was protracted, and extended over a period of several years. Prior to the time of the scheduled second rerun election, Traweek was removed from office by Respondent's executive board because of alleged improprieties with respect to Respondent's funds, and on June 1, 1981, Martino was appointed to the position. Martino had never held any union position, and his experience for the Union's highest office was limited to driving a truck for 24 years in the rock and sand industry.

[1] The instant case was originally consolidated with an unrelated matter (Case 21–CB–8353) which was settled prior to the hearing and was severed from the instant case at the commencement of the hearing.

Martino was sympathetic with Worthington's unfair labor practice claim which, at the time Martino became secretary-treasurer, had been found meritorious by an administrative law judge and was on appeal before the Board. Martino had previously advised Worthington that, as secretary-treasurer, he intended to reinstate Worthington to his position as business agent and settle the Board case. On assuming office, Martino proceeed to terminate all but one of the business agents who were then employed, and immediately hired seven additional business agents, many of whom had previously been business agents under Traweek's administration but had been dismissed by Traweek for reasons unrelated to the instant matter.

After conferring with the Union's executive board, which is composed of officers and trustees of Respondent, many of whom are also business agents for Respondent, Martino engaged in negotiations with Worthington. On July 13, 1981, he initially offered Worthington reinstatement and $10,000. Later that same day he offered Worthington $30,000 on the condition that he waive reinstatement. Worthington declined both offers. Thereupon, Martino became upset, and accused Worthington of being disloyal and of trying to financially break the Union which, as Worthington was advised, was in a precarious financial position. Martino also advised Worthington that, if he persisted in attempting to extract as much money as possible from the Union, he would be jeopardizing his future with the organization and cited as of an example an individual who sued and recovered a large sum of money from the Union and who thereby irreparably damaged his political aspirations. Worthington persisted, however, and Martino told him that he was not a good teamster and that he did not want him to work for the Union. According to Worthington, Martino told him that if he persisted in insisting upon the full amount of backpay[3] and the job, and got them both, then he would be fired when he made the first mistake.

Several days later, anticipating that the Board would affirm the administrative law judge's decision, Martino offered Worthington reinstatement, with the apparent understanding that Worthington would receive the amount of backpay which the Board would later determine. Worthington, sensing that various executive board members and business agents of the Union did not want him to return, asked Martino whether his tenure was secure. Martino assured him that if he kept his nose clean, didn't "screw up," and did his job, he would be in no danger of being fired. Martino further told him that he need not worry about his relationship with the other members of the executive board, as Martino, not the executive board or other business agents, possessed the authority to hire and fire.

[3] The amount of backpay, at that time, had not been determined. Martino was apparently led to believe that it could be $45,000 or more, as Worthington was apparently insisting upon reimbursement for car allowances and expenses and union-related trips he would have taken had he not been terminated. Reimbursement for these items, however, was disallowed.

On July 15, 1981, Martino employed Mary Jo Smith, a personal friend, as Respondent's hiring hall dispatcher, telling her that the previous dispatcher had been terminated, that he needed someone he could trust in that position, and that he wanted her to keep her eyes and ears open and to report anything that appeared to be illegal or wrong, particularly regarding the operation of the hiring hall. The day before Worthington was to report to work, about August 3, 1981, Martino told Smith that he had been instructed by the Teamsters International to reinstate Worthington, that Worthington had previously been a business agent but had had problems in the past, that he and Worthington had been personal friends but Worthington had run against him or had planned to run against him for office, that Worthington had rejected an offer of $30,000 if he would waive reinstatement and was being shoved down Martino's throat, that Worthington was a "shady character" as he had been involved with the dispatching procedure involving "illegal dealings," and that Smith was to keep an eye on him. Martino also instructed Smith to report anything Worthington did wrong, as Martino would then have grounds for "getting rid of him."

Thereafter, according to Smith, Martino would check with her several times a week regarding Worthington's whereabouts. Smith had no problems with Worthington, and testified that Worthington would call in regularly and that he seemed to be doing his job properly.

The Board order affirming Worthington's unlawful discharge issued on September 15, 1981, and in December 1981 Worthington was paid $16,046.01 in backpay and interest and his severance benefit plan account was required to be credited with $10,000, apparently the amount that should have accumulated in his account since his initial employment in 1976.

2. Respondent's financial condition; layoffs

The Respondent's financial condition worsened and the month following the backpay settlement to Worthington, partly as a result thereof, Martino found it necessary to lay off the hiring hall dispatcher, Smith, for financial reasons. He also implemented additional cost-reducing measures, included the denial of a wage increase to the business agents, and the laying off of the Respondent's grounds maintenance man. Between March 1981 and August 1982, Respondent's treasury was depleted from approximately $330,000 to approximately $21,000. During this time there were occasions when payroll checks were late in being issued or employees were asked not to deposit them immediately. The monetary drain was attributed to former Secretary-Treasurer Traweek's mishandling of union funds; the adverse general economic conditions, particularly in the construction industry, resulting in massive layoffs of Respondent's members and a corresponding reduction in members' dues, the Union's primary source of income; expenses involved in financing several strikes; and the settlement of Worthington's unfair labor practice case.

It is uncontradicted that Martino was advised by the Respondent's accountant that the Union was bordering on bankruptcy, and that it was imperative that he reduce expenses by $15,000 per month. The salary and expenses for retaining each business agent amounted to approximately $5000 per month, and thus Martino determined that he needed to lay off three business agents in order to keep the Respondent solvent.

Martino selected Clyde Craig, who had been assigned to service the rock and sand employees,[4] and was the least senior business agent. Because the construction industry had been most affected by the adverse economic conditions, Martino decided to lay off two of the three construction industry business agents, Keith Penrod and Worthington, and retain Charles Tanberg, the most qualified construction business agent. Martino had earlier appointed Tanberg as coordinator to assist and oversee the work of the other business agents, although Penrod apparently had more seniority as a business agent or experience working in the construction industry than either Tanberg or Worthington. Each of these three individuals had formerly worked under Traweek's administration, had been terminated by Traweek, and were then hired by Martino. Martino testified that the executive board recommended that Martino take whatever action was necessary to cut expenses, and did not become involved in selecting the particular employees to be laid off.

About June 18, 1982, Martino told the assembled business agents, all of whom had previously been advised about the layoff, that he felt the Respondent's financial situation would improve and that the layoff would be for a short period of time. At the meeting, Business Agent Craig proposed an alternative plan whereby three business agents, on a rotating basis, would be laid off for a period of 1 week each month until Respondent's financial situation improved. Martino initially indicated his concurrence with Craig's agents, however, Leo Pittman, then president of Respondent, and Art Webb, both of whom were on the executive board, opposed the plan,[5] and Pittman suggested that the matter be brought up to the executive board. Martino testified that the matter was discussed at an "out-of-session" executive board meeting, and recalls that "probably three members of the board" objected to it, and "everyone was not too happy with the time-sharing program . . . business," so the board just moved on to other business. Apparently objections to the plan revolved around the fact that certain business-agent related expenses are paid on a monthly basis and thus a 1-week layoff per month would not have permitted the Respondent to avoid these expenses. Further, it was apparently believed that such a procedure would not be conducive to the efficient handling of complaints or problems.[6]

The layoff began on June 25, 1982. Because Respondent's financial condition did not improve, Penrod was not rehired. Craig was not rehired until about October 1982 when he returned on a part-time basis for 4 or 5 months. He was then put back on full-time status, apparently to replace another business agent who left Respondent's employ.

Mary Jo Smith, who had been laid off in January 1982, testified that on August 21 or 22, 1982, Martino came to her home regarding an unrelated matter. Martino mentioned that he believed the economic climate would improve in September, and that this would put the Union back on its feet. Smith asked if that meant she could possibly have her job back, and Martino said he would think about it. During the course of the conversation Martino mentioned that he had laid off Penrod, Craig, and Worthington. Martino said that he was going to recall Penrod due to the fact that he would soon be retiring and, on being reinstated, would be able to retire with a higher rate of pay. He also said that eventually Craig would be returning, but Worthington would not. Martino stated that the Union had information that Worthington had been involved in outside activities while employed by the Union, and that this was the "bombshell" they were going to drop on him in court, as he was suing the local.[7] Martino further said, according to Smith, "that the three of them had been laid off because it wouldn't have looked right to have only gotten rid of [Worthington]."

Smith testified that it was a very lengthy conversation. Shortly after the conversation she apparently typed up the points that she could recall and on September 7, 1982, gave a statement to a Board agent regarding the conversation. There is no mention in this statement that Martino told her he laid off the other business agents in order to make Worthington's layoff look proper.

Lon Smith, Mary Jo Smith's husband, was present during the aforementioned conversation. Lon Smith essentially corroborated his wife's testimony, and testified several times that Martino said that the three businesss agents were laid off for monetary reasons as there was no money left in the Respondent's treasury. He was repeatedly asked, on direct examination, if Martino gave any other reason for the layoff but said that he could recall no other reason. Finally, he was directly asked if he recalled Martino "saying something to the effect that he had to lay off Craig and Penrod to cover up Worthington's layoff." Smith testified that, "It seems to me, something was said that it wouldn't look good unless all three were laid off." Martino denied that he made such a statement during the conversation.

3. Worthington's conduct

Aurora Samiano, who has been Respondent's office manager and bookkeeper for about 15 years, testified that a short time after the June 25, 1982 layoff, apparently within a few days to a week or so, Martino dictated the following memorandum to her and directed that it be placed in Worthington's file. The memo is as follows:

[4] Respondent's business agents, when hired, were assigned to primarily service employees within their field of expertise. Thus, Martino designated business agents for the "construction" industry, the "rock and sand" industry, and "the lumber and industrial" industries.

[5] Worthington testified there may have been others who objected to Craig's time-sharing proposal.

[6] Arthur Webb, then a member of the executive board, testified that to his knowledge Craig's alternate time-sharing plan was not discussed by the executive board.

[7] Martino was apparently referring to the instant charge which had been filed on August 2, 1982.

> On June 25, 1982, Leonard Worthington was laid off for economic reasons. We no longer needed his services as a Business Agent.
> We do not wish to hire this employee back due to the following reasons:
> 1. Letter sent to the Western Conference re Landscape agreement stating his policy on Landscape disclaimer without the authority of the Secretary Treasurer and because his policy was not that of Teamsters Local 420.
> 2. Also reports from other Local unions that he was in their jurisdiction on Local 420's time talking to Landscape Companies. This report Local 692. Curt Williams B.A. for Local 692.
> 3. Report from other Local Union that he was in their jurisdiction without proper authority on Local 420's time, Report was from Local 166, Pete Esputo Sec. Treas.
> 4. Was informed many times to call in three to four times daily and report to office, would not respond to that request . . .

Worthington played a significant role as a business agent under Secretary-Treasurer Traweek's administration in organizing the employees of four or five landscaping companies, employing a total of approximately 100 individuals. Respondent entered into contracts with these companies, representing their employees on a wall-to-wall basis. When the contracts expired in 1980, Respondent did not seek to negotiate successor contractors. Rather, it disclaimed further representation of these employees on the basis of a jurisdictional settlement agreement entered into with the Southern California District Council of Laborers, whereby the landscaping employees were to be represented along the customary jurisdictional lines of the two unions. Certain landscape employees contacted Worthington expressing their displeasure at this course of events.

Later, in January 1981, allegedly after various locals of the Laborers Union indicated an intention to violate the jurisdictional agreement by attempting to organize employees of the landscape employers on a wall-to-wall basis, Respondent repudiated the jurisdictional settlement agreement and once again signed contracts with these employers on a wall-to-wall basis. The contracts extended until 1983.

However, in June 1981, before Worthington was reinstated, Martino elected to cancel the contracts and disclaim interest in the employees in an effort to adhere to the terms of the jurisdictional agreement. Martino was aware that Worthington was very upset about this, and talked to him on numerous occasions about the matter. Worthington persisted in requesting that the Respondent renew its wall-to-wall contracts, and requested Martino's permission to talk to the employers about this. Martino emphatically and repeatedly told Worthington not to do this, and specifically stated that he would allow Worthington to approach the employers only on the basis that the Respondent would be willing to represent their truckdrivers but no other employees.

Further, Martino instructed Worthington to discontinue his relationship with Mike Sullivan because it could hurt the Union. Sullivan, an employer representative, had represented Worthington in his prior unfair labor practice proceeding. Also Sullivan represented the landscape employers throughout the course of their relationship with Respondent, and had filed unfair labor practice charges and a suit in Federal district court protesting Martino's rescission of the contracts. On July 15, 1981, during his conversation with Worthington regarding reinstatement as a business agent, Martino stated that he did not know that Worthington's relationship was with Sullivan, but that Sullivan was causing the Union considerable trouble and expense, and that he was going to fight Sullivan and, in this regard, had a number of ideas. Worthington told Martino that he thought it was a shame that Martino had been "conned" into disclaiming the landscape contracts and knew what Sullivan could do with such a case in court. Martino according to Worthington, said he did not want to talk about it further with Worthington "because he didn't want to tell Mike Sullivan his plans.

Following Worthington's reinstatement, on several occasions Worthington told Martino that he was talking to Larry Mayo, director of construction for the Western Conference of Teamsters, with whom it was necessary for Worthington to deal generally regarding construction-related matters, about getting the Teamsters to organize some of these landscape employees. Martino indicated to Worthington that, during his discussions with Mayo or anyone else, it was not his place to formulate an opinion counter to Martino's disclaimer. About April 1982, contrary to Martino's explicit instructions and admonitions, Worthington contacted the owner of one of the landscape employers and suggested that an affiliation of the Respondent and an independent union, which certain landscape employees had formed, could possibly be arranged if the employer, represented by Sullivan, would drop its lawsuit against Respondent then pending in Federal district court. Worthington testified that the owner appeared receptive to this proposal.

Thereafter, on April 20, 1982, Worthington sent a lengthy letter to M. E. Anderson, International vice president and director of the Western Conference of Teamsters, outlining the history of the Respondent's relationship with the landscape employers. The letter, sent without Martino's permission or knowledge, concluded as follows:

> I feel that a prudent approach to limiting our liability in the lawsuits filed by these employers, and potential lawsuits by these employees, would be to offer the independent union and [sic] affiliation with the Teamsters Union.
> I would be willing to discuss this matter with you further and, if and when necessary, to arrange for a meeting with all interested parties. Please feel free to contact me at any time.

Business Agent Tanberg is coordinator of the construction business agents. His duties include recommending to Martino which agents should be assigned to particular areas or jobs. He has trained business agents, including Worthington, and also is apparently responsible for training and assisting Respondent's business agents other than those involved in construction. He is alleged in the complaint to be a supervisor and/or agent of Respondent; however, his supervisory status was not raised as an issue during the course of this proceeding, and the parties appear to have agreed that Tanberg is not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Tanberg was called as a witness on behalf of the General Counsel. On becoming appointed as a business agent by Martino's instructions in trying to organize the landscape drivers only, under a multijurisdiction agreement with the Laborers and apparently other unions.

Prior to sending the aforementioned April 20, 1982 letter to Anderson, Worthington showed it to Tanberg. Worthington and Tanberg had had prior conversations about the matter of seeking affiliation of the independent union, which represented the employees of certain landscape employers, and Respondent. Tanberg asked if he had advised Martino that he was sending the letter, and Worthington said he was sending Martino a copy. Tanberg cautioned him about this approach and reminded him that the explicit policy of Respondent vis-a-vis the landscape industry had been established, and any deviation from the policy should be cleared with the secretary-treasurer. Tanberg, testifying that he possessed a certain degree of authority in instructing the business agents, considered it insubordination that Worthington refused to follow this instruction. However, Tanberg further testified that he had no authority to require that Worthington first clear the letter with Martino. On numerous occasions Tangerg reminded Worthington that his involvement with Sullivan and the landscape industry created a conflict with his position as a business agent for Respondent. Worthington's response was that he would be willing to "take the heat." Tanberg testified, without objection, that he knew that Worthington had not severed his relationship with Sullivan, and that he had warned Worthington about this.

Tanberg testified that shortly after Worthington was reinstated in August 1981, Worthington told him that he was planning to establish an independent union for the landscaping employees.[8] Worthington said he was the one who was setting it up and that his brother-in-law was one of the trustees. He asked whether Tanberg wished to participate and Tanberg said no. Tanberg warned him that if he persisted in such activities there would be a day of reckoning somewhere down the road because Worthington's conduct in this regard conflicted with his responsibility as a representative of Respondent. Worthington disregarded this admonition and told him the independent union was going to be holding elections, and asked Tanberg if he wanted to run for office. Tanberg said no. Worthington said he was running for an "executive position." On several occasions Tanberg warned him that his involvement with the independent union would jeopardize his position with Respondent. Worthington said that he was doing his own thing and there would be a position available with the independent union if he or Tanberg got fired.

Regarding the June 25 layoff, Tanberg further testified that Martino had consistently stated that Worthington and the other business agents were laid off for economic and financial reasons, and recalls that shortly after the layoff Martino stated that Worthington was ineligible for recall.

Tanberg was equivocal regarding his discussions with Martino regarding Worthington's activities with the landscape industry. Tanberg testified that he was attempting to protect Worthington and would be evasive when Martino asked about Worthington's relationship with Sullivan, and that he covered for Worthington regarding this and other matters. However, Tanberg also testified that he feared that Worthington was jeopardizing Tanberg's position because of his close relationship with Worthington, and particularly because of Tanberg's past involvement with the independent union prior to his being hired by Martino. The extent of Martino's knowledge of Worthington's activities, as related by Tanberg, is unclear.

Tanberg testified that after Martino found out about the letter to Anderson he became very upset. Tanberg, without objection, testified that in his opinion Worthington "was on a collision course with the local and I was just hoping that he would get some better sense and there were things that happened that just—it seems like Leonard would start to settle down a little bit and then something would happen and he would go off on another tangent." Tanberg also said that Worthington's involvement with the landscapers after the contracts had been rescinded and the employees disclaimed was a direct affront to the secretary-treasurer and the local union.

There is some discrepancy in the record regarding whether Martino had been given a copy of Worthington's letter to Anderson before he received a call from a representative of the Western Conference of Teamsters. In any event, during this conversation, Martino was told that the letter was contrary to the policy of Respondent, the Western Conference, and various construction industry agreements. Martino was further told that Anderson was upset and wanted to discuss the letter. After this call, according to Martino, Worthington presented him with a copy of the letter, and Martino proceeded to reprimand Worthington for his insubordinate conduct and involvement with the landscape matter, and for sending correspondence without his permission or even knowledge. Martino advised Worthington that his conduct affected the Teamsters' reputation, and was a personal embarassment to Martino. Worthington testified that Martino essentially told him that he would be unemployed if he had "any further involvement in this landscape thing." Worthington did not indicate that he intended to thereafter follow Martino's instruction, but merely responded that he had not received a reply from Anderson.

[8] An independent union was formed in 1979, composed of landscape employees whom the Respondent, through Traweek, had disclaimed. Worthington testified at the hearing herein that he was not involved in the 1979 formation of the independent union which at that time had filed a petition with the Board to become the collective-bargaining representative of the employees of one of the landscape employers in a wall-to-wall unit. However, prior to the election, the Respondent, under Traweek, entered into the second aforementioned collective-bargaining contract, and the independent union apparently became inactive or defunct.

Martino testified that he had received reports from representatives of various building trades unions that Worthington had been involved with the landscapers and had been seen with Sullivan, and that these union representatives would question Martino about Worthington's activities. On one occasion an agent from another Teamsters local, Kirk Williamson, asked Martino to keep Worthington out of the local's geographic jurisdiction, as he was "messing around" with landscaping companies. Martino testified that he did not recollect whether he confronted Worthington regarding this complaint, but his affidavit affirmatively states that he did not. Worthington, however, testified that Martino told him that representatives of the Los Angeles Building Trades Council were questioning Worthington's loyalty to the Teamsters and to the construction union trades.

Apparently in January 1982, Martino received a call from Pete Espudo, the secretary-treasurer of another Teamsters local, who requested that Martino keep Worthington out of his local's jurisdiction, and advised him that Worthington was harassing one of his companies. When Worthington came in that day Martino asked him where he had been. Worthington replied, "Out in the field." Martino asked him, "What field?" and Worthington did not reply. When confronted with the fact that he was known to be in the other local's jurisdiction, Worthington explained that during regular working hours he had gone to his brother-in-law's home, located in the other local's geographic jurisdiction, and admitted checking a nearby company's compliance with the contract, as he had nothing better to do while waiting for his brother-in-law. Worthington's conduct, according to Martino, is clearly against policy, as business agents are to remain within their assigned jurisdiction unless otherwise instructed.

Worthington said that Martino confronted him about this matter on January 11, 1982. He admitted being in another local's jurisdiction where his brother-in-law, who is an officer of the independent union, resides. While waiting, he noticed a small construction company and decided to investigate compliance with the contract as the company had six or eight trucks in the yard but the reporting book which Worthington carried showed that the company employed only one driver. Thereupon, Worthington talked to the employer and, in Worthington's words, saw fit to "rattle his cage."

Mary Jo Smith testified that the business agents were instructed to report in three times a day, and Smith would enter this on a daily log sheet. Smith said that she saw Worthington almost every morning prior to his leaving the hall, and that he would come in around noontime. He would again come in at 4 p.m. or would phone if he was out in the field. She said she had no problem in this regard with Worthington. However, Smith testified that she did complain to Martino about three other business agents who were lax in adhering to the reporting procedure.

All the business agents with the exception of Worthington, and perhaps one other agent, had radios in their vehicles[9] and could contact Respondent's office or be contacted at any time. Worthington had no radio in his car and objected when Martino told him that he wanted a radio installed in his vehicle, stating that he intended to sell one or more of his vehicles. The expense of installing a radio in $350.

Martino testified that he did not believe Smith's testimony was accurate regarding Worthington's adherence to the establish reporting procedures, and stated that the call-in logs, which would reflect the frequency with which the business agents reported in, have since disappeared from the dispatch drawer. Contrary to Smith's testimony, Martino said that Worthington would report to the office in the morning, and thereafter on many occasions would not check in, and, because he had no radio, Respondent would have no way of locating him.

Bookkeeper Aurora Samiano testified that she spoke to Worthington about installing a car radio and Worthington said he did not want one because "he didn't want to be pinpointed or didn't want anybody to know what he was doing at all times." Samiano testified that various office clericals in addition to Smith would receive calls from business agents and note them in the log, and that Worthington would not call as frequently as he was instructed to, and was hard to locate. Samiano testified, without objection, that "Leonard is kind of a free spirit. He wants to be out there and doing his own thing, and he doesn't like to be pinned down."

Tanberg testified that he had spoken to Worthington as well as other business agents about calling in, but that this was an ongoing problem particularly with Worthington, and that "We were having a tremendous problem with Leonard just not calling in. At the same time he didn't want a radio in his car because he didn't want any holes drilled in his car."

C. Analysis and Conclusions

Despite Martino's expressed belief that Worthington, a political supporter, had been unlawfully discharged by Traweek, and Martino's assurance that as secretary-treasurer he intended to reinstate Worthington and settle the Board case, it is clear that Martino mistrusted Worthington and was apprehensive about reinstating him even prior to any disagreement regarding backpay. Thus, upon becoming secretary-treasurer in June, Martino immediately hired about seven business agents, and did not commence his negotiations with Worthington until about mid-July. I credit Martino's testimony and find that he was sincerely concerned with Worthington's integrity. Thus, I find that when Worthington initially offered to contribute $1000 to Martino's campaign fund, it was upon the condition that, as Martino credibly testified, he agreed to hire Worthington's mother-in-law as Respondent's bookkeeper. The administrative law judge in the prior proceeding found that Worthington should not be disqualified from reinstatement as a result of various alleged improprieties during his tenure. Martino nevertheless believed as a result of his past association with Worthington, that Worthington's trustworthiness was certainly suspect and that Worthington did in fact engage in certain improprieties which were considered in the prior Board proceeding. The record supports the conclusion that Martino's mistrust of Worthington preceeded his settlement and reinstatement discussions with Worthington. Although Worthington's insistence upon full backpay admittedly upset Martino, I find that Martino's instruction to Mary Jo Smith, upon Worthington's reinstatement, that she carefully monitor his activities, is consistent with and a result of this inherent mistrust rather than Worthington's activity in connection with the pending Board proceeding. Thus, Martino believed that Worthington was a "shady character" and for this reason emphasized that Smith carefully monitor his activities.

[9] The record is very indefinite regarding this. It appears that Worthington was the sole business agent without a radio.

The financial condition of Respondent became increasingly precarious and, on occasion at various membership meetings, Martino would express his displeasure that Worthington had received what Martino believed to be an inordinate amount of backpay, and that Worthington's insistence upon this amount which contributed somewhat although certainly not extensively to Respondent's financial condition, was not compatible with being a "good Teamster." The record shows that general membership meetings were frequently utilized by contending or potential political opponents as forums for castigating the opposition and gaining membership support, and that Martino perceived Worthington as a political opponent. I do not place significant credence in any of the statements made at these meetings. While Martino may have stated at the October 1982 meeting that, among other reasons, Worthington was not recalled from layoff and was discharged, in part, because of the amount of backpay he insisted on receiving and while this remark demonstrates Martino's antipathy toward Worthington, I find that, in view of the entire record, such a statement, under the circumstances, is insufficient to demonstrate that this was a motivating reason for Worthington's discharge.

It is clear and I find that Worthington directly, intentionally, and knowingly, flaunted Martino's orders regarding the landscaping matter, and that he was instrumental in assisting the independent union in an effort to promote Worthington's, rather than Respondent's, interests,[10] despite the repeated admonitions of Tanberg, who warned Worthington of the readily foreseeable consequences. I further find that, as credibly testified to by Martino, Tanberg, and Samiano, Worthington was often remiss in not sufficiently and regularly reporting his whereabouts, and that Martino had good reason to be particularly concerned with Worthington's whereabouts given the rumors and information Martino had received regarding Worthington's continued preoccupation with the landscape matter. The credible record evidence shows, and I find, that Worthington was indeed, as characterized by various witnesses, a "free spirit" who would elect to do as he pleased, and would not hesitate to disregard policy with which he disagreed.

I do not credit the testimony of Mary Jo Smith and her husband, who testified that in August 1982 Martino made the statement, shortly after the layoff, that the layoff, in effect, was orchestrated merely to dismiss Worthington. It is clear that throughout this conversation Martino consistently stated that the layoffs were necessitated by Respondent's financial condition. Further, had Martino directly stated that the layoffs merely constituted an effort to get rid of Worthington, it is inconceivable that Mary Jo Smith would not have memorialized this in the typewritten notes of the conversation she made immediately thereafter, or in her subsequent statement to the Board. It also defies credulity, absent any plausible explanation, that her husband would have such a faulty recollection of this obviously incriminating statement, and that he would not readily recall it except after being directly asked whether this is what Martino said. Under the circumstances, I credit Martino and find either that he did not make the statement attributed to him by the Smiths, or that the Smiths misconstrued Martino's meaning. I further find that the layoffs were economically motivated, and that Worthington was not discriminatorily selected for layoff because of his refusal to accept a reduced amount of backpay in settlement of his prior Board proceeding.

The record shows that Martino was aware of a good deal, although not the entire extent, of Worthington's insubordinate and improper conduct. While it is clear that Martino would have had good cause to terminate Worthington prior to or at least as of April 20, 1982, when Worthington elected to send the letter to Anderson, the fact that he did not do so until shortly after the layoff[11] does not mean that Martino condoned such behavior. Rather, it apparently occurred to Martino following the layoff that this was a propitious time to permanently sever Worthington's employment.

The General Counsel points out various inconsistent lapses in Martino's testimony, and argues that this demonstrates Martino's lack of credibility on material issues. On a careful reading of the record, and noting particularly Martino's testimony and his demeanor at the hearing, I find Martino to have testified credibly regarding the material issues in this case. The fact that his recollection of dates or time periods or the details of particular conversations is sometimes faulty or incomplete, as Martino readily admitted, does not appear to be contrived or selective in an effort to distort Martino's inability to recollect with precision the details or time sequences of certain events. While the General Counsel emphasized that Worthington's discharge resulted in a large monetary outlay to Respondent as a result of Worthington's entitlement to the funds in his severance benefit account, the record shows that such funds are required to be placed in a separate account and are not supposed to be utilized by the Respondent for the general business purposes. In any event, given Worthington's extensive, blatant, and [10] Worthington admitted at the hearing that he received reimbursement from the independent union for automobile and telephone expenses.

[11] I find, as Martino and Samiano testified, that Martino determined not to recall Worthington from the layoff within a week thereafter, and prior to the time the instant charge was filed.

persistent insubordinate behavior, it is apparent that the expense involved in discharging him outweighed his perceived value to the Respondent.

In summary, I find that even if Worthington was discharged, in part, because of his refusal to accept a reduced amount of backpay in the underlying Board proceeding, nevertheless, the Respondent has demonstrated that Worthington would have been discharged, in any event, because of his failure to properly carry out his assigned duties and responsibilities as a business agent. Therefore, I shall dismiss the complaint, Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and is also a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. The Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 4 August 1981 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

1. We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act when it permanently laid off employee Betty G. Robinson on 7 November 1979. At the hearing, the Respondent filed a motion to dismiss the Robinson allegation on the ground that the underlying charge was untimely reconsidered by the General Counsel under the Board's Rules and Regulations and reinstated outside the time limitations of Section 10(b). At the hearing, the judge denied the Respondent's motion, applying Section 102.19(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. We agree with the judge's ruling, but only for the reasons set forth below.

The Robinson charge (Case 11–CA–8747), filed by the Union on 9 November 1979, was dismissed by the Regional Director for Region 11 on 19 December 1979. Thereafter, the Union timely appealed the dismissal of this charge. The Union's appeal was denied by the General Counsel on 14 March 1980 but, at the Union's request, it was granted an extension until 11 April 1980 to file a motion for reconsideration. The Union submitted a motion for reconsideration dated 11 April 1980. The exact date this motion was submitted is in doubt. It is unclear from the record whether the Union's motion was actually received on Friday, 11 April, or Monday, 14 April 1980.[2] In any event, the General Counsel accepted the Union's motion, apparently in view of another charge against the Respondent (Case 11–CA–9044) filed on 3 April 1980. On 24 April 1980 the General Counsel notified the parties that further processing of the motion for reconsideration had been suspended pending a determination on the merits of Case 11–CA–9044. On 17 July 1980 a complaint on the Robinson charge issued.

Section 102.19(a)[3] of the Board's Rules applies to initial appeals of a Regional Director's dismissal of a charge. Section 102.19(c)[4] of the Board's Rules, not considered by the judge, applies to a motion for reconsideration of the General Counsel's determination regarding the charging party's appeal from the Regional Director's dismissal of its charge. Both these Board Rules allow an initial 10-day period in which to submit either the appeal or the motion for reconsideration. In addition, Section 102.19(a) provides: "Consideration of an appeal untimely filed is within the discretion of the general counsel upon good cause shown." Unlike Section 102.19(a), Section 102.19(c) does not have a similar "good cause" requirement to be met before an un-

[1] The Respondent asserts, in essence, that the judge's resolutions of credibility, findings of fact, and conclusions of law are the result of bias. After a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that this claim is without merit. There is no basis for finding that bias and partiality existed merely because the judge resolved important factual conflicts in favor of the General Counsel's witnesses. As the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659 (1949), "[T]otal rejection of an opposed view cannot of itself impugn the integrity or competence of a trier of fact." Furthermore, the Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] For purposes of this decision, we shall assume the motion was received on 14 April 1980.

[3] Sec. 102.19(a) provides:

> If, after the charge has been filed, the regional director declines to issue a complaint or, having withdrawn a complaint pursuant to section 102.18, refuses to reissue it, he shall so advise the parties in writing, accompanied by a simple statement of the procedural or other grounds for his action. The person making the charge may obtain a review of such action by filing an appeal with the general counsel in Washington, D.C., and filing a copy of the appeal with the regional director, within 10 days from the service of the notice of such refusal to issue or reissue by the regional director, except as a shorter period is provided by section 102.81. If an appeal is taken the person doing so should notify all other parties of his action, but any failure to give such notice shall not affect the validity of the appeal. The appeal shall contain a complete statement setting forth the facts and reasons upon which it is based. A request for extension of time to file an appeal shall be in writing and be received by the general counsel, and a copy of such request filed with the regional director, prior to the expiration of the filing period. Copies of the acknowledgment of the filing of an appeal and of any ruling on a request for an extension of time for the filing of an appeal shall be served on all parties. Consideration of an appeal untimely filed is within the discretion of the general counsel upon good cause shown.

[4] Sec. 102.19(c) states:

> The general counsel may sustain the regional director's refusal to issue or reissue a complaint, stating the grounds of his affirmance, or may direct the regional director to take further action; the general counsel's decision shall be served on all the parties. A motion for reconsideration of the decision must be filed within 10 days of service of the decision, except as hereinafter provided, and shall state with particularity the error requiring reconsideration. A motion for reconsideration based upon newly discovered evidence which has become available only since the decision on appeal shall be filed promptly on discovery of such evidence. Motions for reconsideration of a decision previously reconsidered will not be entertained, except in unusual situations where the moving party can establish that new evidence has been discovered which could not have been discovered by diligent inquiry prior to the first reconsideration.

timely motion for reconsideration can be considered by the General Counsel. Thus, we find that it is within the discretion of the General Counsel to accept reconsideration motions submitted within the 10(b) time limit, but beyond the 10-day period provided by Section 102.19(c) itself or any extension given by the General Counsel. The General Counsel need only act within the 10(b) period, and that action can take the form of mere acceptance of the untimely motion.

We find that there has been no showing that the General Counsel acted arbitrarily or capriciously or abused his discretion when he accepted the Union's motion for reconsideration, even if 1 business day late. We note that reconsideration was granted by the General Counsel within the 10(b) time limit, even though the investigation on the Robinson charge was not completed and a complaint thereon did not issue until 8 months after her layoff. Thus, we conclude that the Robinson charge was not extinguished by the operation of Section 102.19(c) of the Board's Rules and is not time-barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

2. We also agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act when it discharged employee Randolph McCrea on 29 February 1980. In accordance with the judge, we find that the evidence concerning McCrea's work record and production fails to rebut the prima facie showing that his discharge was motivated by his union activity and participation in prior Board proceedings, as more fully detailed in the judge's decision. For the following reasons, however, we reverse the judge's findings and conclusions that McCrea's September 1979 suspensions were unlawful.

The record reveals that the Union filed the charge in Case 11–CA–8748 on 9 November 1979 alleging, in part, that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by suspending employee McCrea on 7 September 1979 and again on 28 September 1979. Thereafter, on 19 December 1979, the Regional Director refused to issue a complaint involving McCrea's suspensions and dismissed the portion of the charge pertaining to McCrea's suspensions. No appeal from this dismissal was taken by the Union.

On 3 April 1980 the Union filed a second charge concerning McCrea, Case 11–CA–9044, alleging that he had been discriminatorily discharged on 29 February 1980. After a complaint on McCrea's discharge issued on 30 June 1980, the Acting Regional Director for Region 11 sua sponte revoked the earlier dismissal of Case 11–CA–8748 pertaining to McCrea's two September 1979 suspensions. In his letter to the parties dated 11 July 1980, the Acting Regional Director indicated the basis for revoking the prior dismissal was the uncovering of new evidence. On 17 July 1980 the Regional Director issued a complaint on McCrea's suspensions and consolidated Case 11–CA–8748 with the other pending charges against the Respondent.

At the hearing commencing 17 February 1981, the Respondent moved to dismiss the portions of the outstanding consolidated complaint relating to McCrea's September 1979 suspensions. The Respondent argued that further proceedings on these allegations were time-barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

The judge denied the Respondent's motion and permitted the General Counsel to adduce evidence relating to McCrea's suspensions. In so ruling, the judge relied on California Pacific Signs, 233 NLRB 450 (1977); the General Counsel's authority under Section 3(d) of the Act; and the General Counsel's assertion that the issuance of the complaint, alleging a violation in McCrea's suspensions, after the allegations earlier had been dismissed in December 1979, was based on "newly discovered evidence." However, the General Counsel never disclosed what constituted the "newly discovered evidence."

In disagreeing with the judge's disposition of allegations involving McCrea's suspensions, we find that the Regional Director contravened the purposes of the limitations proviso to Section 10(b) of the Act[5] by reinstating a charge some 10 months after McCrea's suspensions occurred. We note that, while the charge was timely filed on 9 November 1979, it was thereafter dismissed by the Regional Director, and no appeal from this dismissal was ever filed. We hold today that a dismissed charge may not be reinstated outside the 6-month limitations period of Section 10(b) absent special circumstances in which a respondent fraudulently conceals the operative facts underlying the alleged violation. Where there is a fraudulent concealment, the limitations period begins to run when the charging party knows or should have known of the concealed facts. Accordingly, we reverse California Pacific Signs, supra, and Winer Motors, 265 NLRB 1457 (1982), to the extent that they are inconsistent with our decision.

In California Pacific Signs, supra, the Board permitted the reinstatement of an earlier dismissed charge some 10 months after the alleged violation.

That no complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made, unless the person aggrieved thereby was prevented from filing such charge by reason of service in the armed forces, in which event the six-month period shall be computed from the day of his discharge.

The Board found that the limitations proviso to Section 10(b) is applicable only to the filing of the charge and that Section 3(d) of the Act[6] grants the General Counsel "virtually unlimited" discretion to proceed on timely filed charges as he sees fit. The Board said that, absent a showing that the General Counsel had abused this authority, it would not interfere with the exercise of his discretion.

Later, in Winer Motors, supra, a Board majority did recognize certain limits on the General Counsel's discretion, at least with respect to charges withdrawn by a charging party. There, a Board majority of former Chairman Van de Water and former Member Zimmerman and Member Hunter found that the General Counsel could not, for equitable reasons, reinstate a withdrawn charge outside the limitations period absent fraudulent concealment by a respondent. However, a majority of former Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman did not find the same proscription applicable to dismissed charges. Former Member Zimmerman drew a distinction between withdrawn and dismissed charges. The former, he asserted "ceases to exist," while the latter "continues to exist" because the charging party has not conceded that the charge lacks merit and, accordingly, the General Counsel retains his discretionary authority to reinstate a dismissed charge. We do not agree with the distinction that former Member Zimmerman drew in Winer Motors. Rather, we shall treat withdrawn and dismissed charges alike and shall not allow the reinstatement of either beyond the 6-month limitations proviso absent the special circumstances mentioned above.

We disagree first with the notion that Section 3(d) bestows "virtually unlimited" discretion on the General Counsel to reinstate charges outside the 10(b) limitations period. We find, instead, that the General Counsel must exercise his discretion in conformity with the limitations proviso created by Congress. We note that the General Counsel's authority is to be exercised "on behalf of the Board," and we find that we would exceed our own authority were we to permit the General Counsel to ignore the statutory limitations proviso.

Further, we find this standard must apply regardless of whether the charge was withdrawn or dismissed. We see no substantive distinction between a withdrawn and a dismissed charge. In either event, the charge has been disposed of and, in effect, ceases to exist.[7] Moreover, it seems to us that the dismissal of a charge by a government official well versed in the intricacies of labor law creates the impression on members of the public that the charge has been disposed of even more conclusively than is the case when it is merely withdrawn.[8]

We note also that in Koppers Co., 163 NLRB 517 (1967), a case considered by the judge, the Board held that a respondent has the right under the statute to be assured that, absent the existence of a properly served charge on file, it will not be liable for conduct occurring more than 6 months earlier. To permit the General Counsel to resurrect either withdrawn or dismissed charges is inconsistent with this principle and should be permitted only where a respondent, in effect, forfeits its right to such assurances by engaging in fraudulent concealment. We must, as the majority noted in Winer, "restrike the balance established by Congress when it added the proviso to Section 10(b)." 265 NLRB at 1458.

Applying the above principles to the instant case, we have concluded that the reinstatement of Case 11–CA–8748 relating to McCrea's September 1979 suspensions outside the limitations period cannot be permitted. We find no fraudulent concealment in this case which would warrant our extending the limitations proviso. In this regard, we note that the General Counsel has never asserted or shown any fraudulent concealment of operative facts relating to McCrea's suspensions. At best, it appears that the General Counsel reviewed the evidence on hand pertaining to the suspensions in light of the subsequent discharge of McCrea and reconsidered the earlier dismissal on that basis.

Considering the above,[9] we find that the 10(b) period expired in March 1980, 6 months after McCrea's suspensions, and that the consolidated complaint allegations concerning them must be dismissed.[10]

[The General Counsel] shall have final authority, on behalf of the Board, in respect of the investigation of charges and issuance of complaints under section 10, and in respect of the prosecution of such complaints before the Board, and shall have such other duties as the Board may prescribe or as may be provided by law.

[7] Member Dennis notes that the Casehandling Manual, Sec. 10120.3, provides that a charging party should be given the opportunity to withdraw a charge before it is dismissed. Whether the charging party avails himself of such an opportunity should not determine whether the charge can be resurrected thereafter.

[8] This is particularly true because "the Board's General Counsel has unreviewable discretion to refuse to institute an unfair labor practice complaint." Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 182 (1967).

[9] In view of the manner in which this case was litigated and briefed, Member Dennis finds it unnecessary to pass on the question whether the charge the Union filed 9 November 1979 in Case 11–CA–8747 (alleging that employee Robinson was unlawfully laid off) might have supported the McCrea suspension allegations under a "closely related" theory. See NLRB v. Dinion Coil Co., 201 F.2d 484, 491 (2d Cir. 1952).

[10] In light of this conclusion, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's conclusion that McCrea's suspensions were unlawful. Our disposition of McCrea's suspensions, however, does not detract from our general agreement with the judge's finding that the evidence concerning

3. Contrary to the judge, and for the reasons set forth below, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by discharging employee Larry Hampton on 18 March 1980.

The pertinent credited facts are as follows: Hampton commenced working for the Respondent in 1977, and his job required lifting and pulling units weighing up to 40 pounds. His activities in support of the Union began in August or September 1978, and the Respondent admitted that it had observed Hampton engaging in these activities. Additionally, Hampton testified at an earlier Board hearing held between October and November 1979.

On 25 January 1980 Hampton sustained a back injury while working. He continued to perform his assigned duties for approximately 30 minutes and then requested medical attention because he began to experience pain. Later that day, an examination by Dr. John C. Whitley Jr. revealed tenderness and a muscle spasm in Hampton's lower back. As a result, Whitley prescribed muscle relaxants and pain medication and recommended that Hampton perform only light work duty for 5 days. Hampton returned to work and was instructed by Supervisor Creech to return to his usual job. When Hampton protested on the ground that Dr. Whitley had recommended that he be restricted to light duty, Assistant Plant Manager Stewart demanded that he return to the doctor's office for a written work restriction. Hampton apparently did so, and then returned to the plant where he commenced performing light duties.

On 30 January 1980 Hampton again complained to Dr. Whitley of pain and was given another analgesic. On 4 February 1980 Dr. Whitley's diagnosis of Hampton continued to be back strain, minor contusion, and minor spasm. He therefore referred Hampton to an orthopedic surgeon, Dr. Harry L. Pearce, who, on 8 February 1980, diagnosed Hampton's condition as acute dorsal lumbar back strain or a pulled back muscle. He prescribed pain medication, rest, a back brace (which Hampton thereafter wore), and light duty. Dr. Whitley examined Hampton for the last time on 11 February 1980 and, although he was of the opinion that Hampton could return to full work duty, he deferred to Dr. Pearce's recommendation for light duty as being within the latter's area of expertise.

On 15 February 1980 Dr. Pearce again examined Hampton for pain and prescribed anti-inflammatory medicine. Hampton complained to Dr. Pearce of intermittent discomfort on 17 March 1980, but Dr. Pearce concluded that the healing process had been completed, although he acknowledged that lifting and bending might aggravate the existing injury. Additionally, on that day, Dr. Pearce gave Hampton a "certificate" that he was able to return to work with no limitations. Dr. Pearce testified that he frequently counsels patients against prolonged light duty since there is an abundance of healthy applicants for employment.

When Hampton returned to work on 17 March 1980, he complained to two supervisors of back pain. Nevertheless, based on the certificate issued by Dr. Pearce, Supervisor Creech ordered Hampton to return to his regular job, which he apparently did for the balance of that workday.

Hampton returned to work on the following day and requested more medical attention because of back pain. Later that day, Plant Manager Frank Ducate was advised that Hampton was complaining that he could not or would not perform his regular job because of back pain and that he had requested more medical attention for the problem. Ducate then prepared a permanent layoff notice for Hampton because of "inability or refusal to do the work." When Hampton received the layoff notice, he protested that he was not refusing to do his normal job, but that he was unable to perform his regular job at that time because his back hurt. In a letter dated 19 March 1980,[11] Dr. Pearce, in response to a request from the Respondent, outlined his diagnosis of Hampton's condition and concluded that Hampton was ready to return to work with the help of aspirin, if needed. Approximately 3 weeks later, the Respondent received a letter from Dr. Whitley which noted that his last examination of Hampton had failed to reveal any objective pathology and that he had encouraged Hampton to return to work.

The judge found that the facts established that the Respondent viewed Hampton's injury as an opportunity to get rid of a union protagonist. In so doing, the judge rejected the Respondent's reason for Hampton's discharge—that he "could not or would not work." Thus, the judge noted that, although Hampton could not engage in a full duty job at the time of his discharge, he was capable of engaging in other lighter work which was then available. The judge found that the Respondent's failure to permit Hampton to continue performing such light duties constituted evidence of unlawful motivation. The judge also found no credited evidence to support the Respondent's contention that McCrea's work record for the period in question was inadequate to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie showing of discrimination toward McCrea.

[11] The judge inadvertently referred to "March 19, 1979," rather than "March 19, 1980," as the date of Dr. Pearce's letter to the Respondent. The judge further inadvertently referred to "April 17" rather than "March 17" as the date that Dr. Pearce told the Respondent that Hampton had complained to him of back pain.

Hampton would not work since that would essentially involve a charge that Hampton was malingering. In this regard, the judge found that the Respondent did not have a good-faith belief that Hampton was malingering and that, moreover, the evidence established that Hampton had, in fact, sustained an injury and that he had, in fact, encountered a muscular spasm as a result. Based on the foregoing, the judge concluded that the Respondent discharged Hampton because of his union activities and because of his testimony in the prior Board proceeding.

Contrary to the judge, we conclude that Hampton's physical condition was relied on by the Respondent in deciding to discharge him. It is undisputed that an integral part of Hampton's job required lifting and pulling units weighing up to 40 pounds. It is further undisputed that, immediately after Hampton had sustained the injury to his back on 25 January 1980, the Respondent created a light duty job for him based on his doctor's recommendation that he perform such work for 5 days. Thereafter, the Respondent, again on the advice of Hampton's doctor, extended his light duty work until 17 March 1980, when it received medical certification that Hampton was able to return to his regular job duties without limitations. Hampton admitted, and the judge found, that, even after his doctor had authorized him to perform his regular job duties, he remained in pain and felt unable to fulfill those duties. It was only at this point that the Respondent discharged him. Thus, as it is beyond dispute that Hampton "could not" do the work he was assigned, and as we are satisfied that this was the Respondent's reason for discharging Hampton, we find no violation in the discharge.

Unlike the judge, we find no basis for concluding that the Respondent's failure to permit Hampton to remain on light duty constituted evidence of unlawful motivation since, under these circumstances, the Respondent was neither under a duty to create a permanent light duty position to accommodate Hampton's physical limitation nor under a duty to employ Hampton, who admitted that he could not fulfill the requirements of his position. Further, the General Counsel's contention and the judge's finding that the Respondent was motivated by antipathy toward Hampton's protected activities is undercut by the fact that the Respondent, although under no obligation to do so, created approximately 7 weeks of special light duty work for Hampton during his medically documented incapacitation. Moreover, the Respondent's decision to discharge Hampton appears to be consistent with its past practice since the record contains evidence that the Respondent had discharged another employee for refusal or inability to work after a doctor had released him to perform such work. In light of the above, we shall dismiss that portion of the complaint which alleges that Hampton's discharge was violative of the Act.[12]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Ducane Heating Corporation, Blackville, South Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Discouraging membership in International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, by unlawfully discharging any of its employees, or by discriminating against them in any other manner with respect to their hire or tenure of employment, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Offer Randolph McCrea and Betty G. Robinson immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision. Remove from its files any references to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them, in any way."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[12] As indicated above, the judge rejected the Respondent's alternative contention that Hampton was malingering and thus "would not" work. He further rejected the Respondent's claims that it had a good-faith belief that Hampton was malingering. We find it unnecessary to pass on these findings or the case law cited in support of them since we have found that, in fact, Hampton could not do his work and that the Respondent relied on this fact in letting him go. Thus, no violation of the Act has been made out in this proceeding.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, by unlawfully discharging any employees, or by discriminating against them in any other manner with respect to their hire or tenure of employment.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees because they have given testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Randolph McCrea and Betty G. Robinson immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharges, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify Randolph McCrea and Betty G. Robinson that we have removed from our files any references to their discharges and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

DUCANE HEATING CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The charges in Cases 11–CA–8747 and 11–CA–8748 were filed on November 9, 1979, by the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union). The charges in Cases 11–CA–9044 and 11–CA–9248 were filed by the Union on April 3 and June 30, 1980, respectively. Complaints or consolidated complaints issued on June 30, July 17, and August 6, 1980, alleging that Ducane Heating Corporation (Respondent or the Company) suspended employee Randolph McCrea twice in September 1979; discharged employee Betty G. Robinson in November 1979, McCrea in February 1980, and employee Larry Hampton in March 1980; and refused to recall Robinson in the first quarter of 1980, because said employees joined and assisted the Union and testified at a hearing before the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). A hearing was held before me on these matters in Aiken, South Carolina, on February 17, 18, and 19 and March 17, 18, and 19, 1981.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of a brief by the General Counsel, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a South Carolina corporation with a plant located at Blackville, South Carolina, where it is engaged in the manufacture and sale of heating equipment. During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint on June 30, 1980, Respondent received goods and materials at its Blackville, South Carolina plant valued in excess of $50,000, directly from points outside the State of South Carolina. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Respondent's Prior Unfair Labor Practices

On January 13, 1981, the Board issued its Decision and Order in Ducane Heating Corp., 254 NLRB 112 (1981), wherein it affirmed the findings of an administrative law judge that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act since October 1978 by various acts of interference with its employees' Section 7 rights, and had also violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) in December 1978 by discriminatorily discharging one employee, suspending another, and issuing a written warning and a threat of discharge to employee Randolph McCrea, one of the alleged discriminatees in this proceeding.

As more fully explained in the prior decision, the Union began an organizational campaign in October 1978, and unfair labor practice charges were filed in early 1979, leading to a hearing before the administrative law judge from October 30 through November 3, 1979. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, an election was held on March 22, 1979, which the Union lost with six challenged ballots.[1]

As described in the former opinion, McCrea was one of the leaders of the union movement, and testified at the previous hearing. His testimony was credited over that of Respondent's supervisors. Robinson also participated in union activities and testified at the previous hearing. She was called by the General Counsel as a rebuttal witness, and her testimony was also credited by the judge in preference to that of Respondent's supervisors. Employee Larry Hampton testified without contradiction that he began distributing union cards in August or September

[1] The representation case was not consolidated with the unfair labor practice case.

1978, and further averred that he also testified at the former hearing. Noting the dates of the new alleged unfair labor practices in this proceeding, it may be observed that they allegedly took place at times in close proximity to the dates of the former hearing (October 30 through November 3, 1979).

B. Randolph McCrea

1. Construction of residential gas furnaces

Respondent contends that McCrea was discharged because of substandard production, rather than for the reasons alleged in the complaint. Accordingly, an inquiry into what McCrea was "producing" for the Company becomes relevant. This consists of components of residential gas furnaces, in particular "heat exchanger units."

In essence, according to Supervisor William Creech,[2] a gas furnace consists of a blower pushing air through tubes in a heat exchanger unit, where the air is heated, and from there flows into the air ducts. A flue box carries away fumes, and a burner box holds the gas burners. The burners are placed within a component called a "burner ring," which is actually rectangular in shape. The burner ring is composed of metal pieces called "fillers top and bottom," and "fillers left and right," which are assembled by welding. According to Creech, the completed burner ring is affixed to the bottom of the heat exchanger unit by a combination of hammering and "tacking," or arc welding. Thereafter, the seams formed by the juncture of the burner ring and the heat exchanger unit are sealed by "seam welding" (R. Exhs. 14–20).

There is little uniformity among the employees' description of these operations. Thus, Creech testified that employees who "worked on burner rings" would variously report work on "fillers," or on "left and right," or "tops and bottoms," or burner rings, all referring to the function of placing the burner ring onto the heat exchanger unit. In addition, the next step of seam welding is also referred to by employees in a variety of terms, according to both Creech, McCrea, and Respondent's Exhibit 61. McCrea called seam welding "Left & Right-Top & Bottom," or "L&R-T&B," referring to components of the burner ring welded to the heat exchanger unit.

Whatever the nomenclature, Creech and McCrea agree that the function of placing a burner ring onto a heat exchanger unit is a different operation from the next function of welding it to the unit, and that both functions are normally performed by different individuals. Employee David L. Davis said that these were different operations, but that he, on occasion, had to perform both of them. McCrea testified that the burner ring job was more difficult than the welding position, testimony which was corroborated by leadman Willie Ferguson, a witness for Respondent. According to Ferguson, the "hammering" part of the burner ring job makes it more difficult. I credit this consistent testimony, and find that the placing of burner rings on the heat exchanger unit was more difficult than the seam welding job. Other jobs, according to the evidence, included welding and placing flue boxes, repairing leaks, straightening units, "tying ends," and grinding corners.

Employees did not normally have equal proficiency on all jobs, and McCrea credibly testified that the Company's practice was to assign employees to the jobs which they could do best.

2. McCrea's early work history

McCrea was hired in December 1975, and worked in the oil welding department under Assistant Plant Manager Billie Joe Stewart.[3] He received regular advances and pay raises, and Respondent had no complaints about him at that time, according to Stewart.

McCrea later transferred to the gas welding department, and began as a seam welder, a job at which he was proficient. He attempted to learn other jobs in order to increase his pay. In late 1977 McCrea asked other employees to teach him how to put on burner rings. Creech saw this, and told McCrea that he did "beautiful work," was not fast enough, but would pick up speed.

McCrea testified that he did a variety of jobs in the gas welding department, but was not assigned to do burner rings until the last week of August 1979. Creech, however, testified that McCrea was assigned "to weld burner rings" for an "accumulated" period of 3–4 months prior to August 1979.

The issue in this dispute is whether McCrea had prior experience in the job or, rather, was suspended on September 7 after only about 10 days in a difficult job which was new to him. Creech was a contradictory and unreliable witness, and his testimony on this subject literally describes seam welding rather than burner rings. Those of Respondent's business records which are in evidence do not support its position that McCrea was assigned to burner rings prior to August 1979 and I credit McCrea on this issue. Although he had some experience in burner rings prior to August 1979 and, indeed, was once seen doing this in 1978 by employee David L. Davis, this represented McCrea's attempts to learn from other employees and did not constitute work assignments.

Respondent had a practice of making "special units," i.e., components that were as nearly perfect as possible, for promotional purposes. It used its best employees for this purpose, according to Creech. McCrea testified that, beginning in late 1977 or early 1978, Supervisor Creech and leadman Ferguson asked him to do welding on special units. Supervisor Creech, leadman Willie Ferguson, and employee Bronson Bell denied this. However, Odell Millhouse, an employee of Respondent at the time he testified, stated that he saw McCrea doing special units in 1979, and employee David L. Davis testified that he saw this in 1980. Creech and Ferguson were not disinterested witnesses, and Bell could not have known everything McCrea was doing. I credit the testimony of McCrea, Millhouse, and Davis, and find that McCrea was asked to do welding on "special units."

[2] The pleadings establish and I find that Creech was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[3] The pleadings establish and I find that Stewart was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

3. The union campaign and Respondent's discipline of McCrea

(a) The First Two Warnings. It was at about the time of his transfer or shortly thereafter that McCrea began his organizational work on behalf of the Union, as described in the prior decision. On December 1, 1978, Respondent issued a written warning to McCrea for allegedly having told another employee to stop work and attend a meeting without permission. The warning threatened McCrea with discharge upon repetition of such conduct, was characterized by the judge in the last proceeding as "excessively harsh," and was found to be discriminatory discipline in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). Ducane Heating Corp., 254 NLRB at 122–123, 130.

About 5 months later, on April 24, 1979, Respondent issued McCrea another warning reading as follows:

> This is to inform you that an official warning or discharge notice has been given to you for substandard production.
> This warning is being given to you concerning your substandard quantity work.
> We are confident that your returning late from breaks and lunch could be one of the reasons for your production being lower than that of your coworkers.
> If your production does not pick up and remain up, you will be forcing us to take further disciplinary action.

The warning is signed by Supervisor William Creech (G.C. Exh. 5). Employee David L. Davis credibly testified that McCrea was the only employee to receive a written warning for low production.

McCrea was given this warning by Assistant Plant Manager Billie Joe Stewart in the presence of Creech. According to McCrea, he told Stewart that Creech had told him to do "as many units as [he] could," and asked Stewart to give him, in writing, a daily quota of production he was expected to meet. Stewart responded with a query, asking whether it was "too much to ask" McCrea to do as many as he could, if no more than "one unit" per day. Creech admitted that he did not tell McCrea how to improve his production.

McCrea, dissatisfied, asked Creech for permission to speak with Vice President John Ducate Jr.[4] but was told that Ducate was too busy, and that McCrea should take it to his "Union organizer." Creech asserted that another employee was given a warning for low production on the same day. However, Creech also testified that McCrea was working on burner rings in April 1979, testimony which is contradicted by Respondent's records. I credit McCrea, and do not credit Creech.

(b) McCrea's Transfer to Burner Rings, Two Suspensions and Discharge: McCrea testified that he was assigned "to do burner rings" in the last week of August 1979. Supervisor Creech acknowledged that he assigned McCrea to the new job, but could not remember the date. I credit McCrea's testimony.

On September 7, 1979, McCrea was given a written 3-day disciplinary suspension, which, after a beginning sentence identical to the warning in April, continues as follows:

> After receiving a warning on 4/25/79, your production did show a slight increase for a few weeks thereafter. However, after reviewing your daily production reports, we found your productivity far below department standards. In an effort to avoid any further disciplinary action, I moved you to a job requiring less skill. Even though you had previous experience on this job, we allowed you approximately two weeks for retraining.
> Not only is your production far below your coworkers, two of these co-workers are complaining that while each one of them is producing over 200 units, you are producing only 80 to 90 units per day.
> Therefore, you leave us no alternative but to issue this 3-day disciplinary layoff which is effective from 9/10/79 through 9/12/79. To avoid any further disciplinary action, when returning on 9/13/79, you will be expected to bring your production up to department standards and remain there.

This document is also signed by Creech (G.C. Exh. 6).

McCrea had a conversation with Assistant Plant Manager Billie Joe Stewart that day in the latter's office. McCrea testified that he requested but was denied the presence first of a coworker, and then of a union organizer. Stewart denied that McCrea made this request; I credit McCrea. Stewart told him that the Company did not recognize "Union men." McCrea asked for permission to see General Manager Frank Ducate, but this was denied.

Shortly after this suspension, Creech asked McCrea whether he was willing to have leadman Willie Ferguson show McCrea how to increase his speed, and McCrea agreed. Ferguson then came to McCrea's booth, and a dispute arose as to which employee was more productive. According to McCrea, Ferguson challenged him to a test to see which could put on 10 burner rings more rapidly. According to Creech and Ferguson, McCrea asked for a timestudy.

However initiated, McCrea, Ferguson, and another employee, David L. James, had a "10-burner-ring race." James finished first. McCrea testified that Ferguson was doing his fourth burner ring when McCrea had reached his fifth ring, and that Ferguson had stopped to talk to someone. McCrea did not observe Ferguson again until he had almost finished his 8th burner ring, at which time Ferguson said he had finished all 10. "No way," McCrea told Ferguson, and said that he must have done something with his burner rings. Ferguson insisted that he finished all 10 himself, before McCrea finished.[5]

[4] The pleadings establish and I find that Ducate was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[5] James was not called as a witness. The General Counsel asserts that he tried without success to reach James, and asks for an adverse inference from the fact that Respondent did not call James. The General Counsel contended that, if called, James would have testified that he did some of Ferguson's burner rings and attempted to elicit testimony from McCrea as to what James told the former. I sustained Respondent's objection that this would have constituted hearsay.

Respondent introduced various "documentations" of alleged action which it took between September 7 and 28, the dates of McCrea's two suspensions. Thus, in assigning Ferguson to help McCrea, Creech noted "a slight improvement" in McCrea's production on September 19 (R. Exh. 36). The next day, in analysis of the timestudy, Creech concluded that McCrea did have the ability to meet production standards, and "tried [his] best to explain to Randy that the disappointing part of my job is when you know an employee has the ability and skill to do his job, but will not apply himself" (R. Exh. 37). The next day, Creech wrote, employee David James complained to him that McCrea was not doing his "fair share" (R. Exh. 38). Respondent thus took the position that the timestudy showed that McCrea could produce adequate quantities of work, but that he was not utilizing his ability.

On September 28, 1979, Creech signed another warning which, after the same introduction as the prior warnings, continues as follows:

> Since your last warning on 9/7/79 in a sincere effort to avoid further disciplinary action, we placed a program into effect to help you pick up your production to departmental standards.
> 1. We gave you additional training by the Leadman to make sure you knew every aspect of the job and to see where you were having problems, if any.
> 2. You and Ferguson collectively decided to time study the job. The time study included you, Ferguson, and David James. The results of the study indicate that you could easily do production of 200+ units in eight hours with ample time for rest and delay.
> 3. You received personal assistance from me to help you develop your technique and numerous conversations in an effort to try to motivate you.
> It is evident that through the time study that you have the ability, when applied correctly, to perform to standards.
> Because of the seriousness of this problem and your failure to respond to our help, you leave us no alternative but to enforce a 5-day suspension [G.C. Exh. 7; R. Exh. 39].

McCrea had a conversation with Billie Joe Stewart that day in which he requested but was denied the presence of a coworker. Stewart told him that a study showed that he could do 200 units daily, and that Stewart had no alternative to issuance of a 5-day suspension. McCrea requested permission to see General Manager Frank Ducate, but this request was denied.

McCrea credibly testified that he had no further conversation with any supervisor about his production until February 29, 1980, when Creech discharged him at the end of the day, stating merely that he had already been suspended twice. Creech gave him another written notice (G.C. Exh. 8) and his final check. McCrea walked out, noticing Billie Joe Stewart "peeping around the corner." Stewart testified that he did not meet with McCrea on the day of the discharge. Creech testified initially that he and Stewart had a conversation with McCrea in Stewart's office, but reversed himself on cross-examination. I credit McCrea and Stewart that there was no such meeting.

Creech testified that McCrea was discharged because of low overall production, then vacillated between this position and the contention that the reason was low burner ring production, and finally admitted that he did not know the reason without his records.

4. Statistical analysis of McCrea's alleged low production

(a) Description of the Evidence and Contentions of the Parties: The parties engaged in extensive argument during the hearing as to the means of proving or disproving that McCrea was guilty of low production. At the outset, it must be acknowledged that the relevance of all this evidence is questionable, since Supervisor Creech admitted at the hearing that Respondent had no production requirements, and that "it is more or less what a man is capable of doing."

Nonetheless, the General Counsel moved to admit two statistical studies, one concerning McCrea's production, and the other concerning production of other employees. Although these summaries purported to be derived from Company documents in Respondent's possession which the General Counsel had subpoenaed, or from copies of such documents made by employees who had submitted the originals to the company, Respondent opposed their introduction. The parties agreed to the following procedure: Each would be afforded an opportunity to submit statistical summaries with supporting data and copies to the other parties, after the close of the hearing but prior to the due date for briefs, whereupon the summaries and data would be received in evidence.

The General Counsel, having withdrawn the summaries originally submitted at the hearing prior to this arrangement, filed a posthearing motion submitting General Counsel's Exhibits 13 and 14 with supporting data, while Respondent filed a "Submission of Post-Hearing Evidence" with supporting data. In accordance with the aforesaid agreement at the hearing, these documents are hereby received as General Counsel's Exhibits 13 and 14, and Respondent's Exhibit 61, respectively.[6] Comparison of the data on these exhibits shows that they are substantially consistent, although Respondent's exhibit has more production reports of employees other than McCrea.

The General Counsel argues that his exhibits show that "while McCrea's production was somewhat less than that of other welders on the burner ring operation, his production on seams was representative with the output of other welders in the department." Moreover, in the month before his discharge, McCrea's performance was equivalent overall to that of other employees, according to the General Counsel.

Respondent offers no opinion as to what its statistics show. Both the General Counsel's and Respondent's exhibits consist of summaries of daily production reports prepared by employees. There is no evidence that the quantities shown on the reports were verified by management. Creech testified that various products were not subject to production requirements, but some of the products he named appear on the production reports.

The Company's exhibit, "Compilation of Ducane Employee Production Reports," states in part as follows: "The jobs, welding seams, seams, left right top and bottom, burner rings, doing burner rings, putting on burner rings, tacking burner rings, ends and tying ends are approximately equal in terms of numbers of units produced by an employee in an eight hour day. Many of the terms used by the employees on the production reports are aberration(s) of the current description of the job as defined by the company and are different names for the same job" (R. Exh. 61).

The first sentence quoted above appears to say that each employee produces the same number of units no matter which job he is performing. If so, this is equating apples with oranges and is demonstrably false.[7]

(b) Statistical Evidence Pertaining to the April 24 Warning, and the September 7 Warning and Suspension: Respondent issued a warning to McCrea on April 24, 1979, for "substandard production," as described above. No such conclusion can be derived from Respondent's production statistics for that month. The only conclusions which may be derived, assuming that two other employees were doing the same work as McCrea but were giving it a different name, are that (1) Respondent was keeping more production figures on McCrea than it was on other employees, and (2) such comparative figures as are available show that McCrea was in about the mid-range of production.[8]

McCrea's production increased slightly in May, which is acknowledged in Respondent's September 7 warning and disciplinary suspension (G.C. Exh. 6). However, it is difficult to find justification for Respondent's statement, in its September 7 warning, that McCrea's transfer to burner rings in late August was caused by "review" of his production reports showing him "far below department standards." The reason is the fact that the Company's exhibit shows no figures whatever for June and July 1979 for McCrea or any other employee. The General Counsel's exhibits show that McCrea continued about the same pace, and, as before, that there were other employees who produced less units, doing work which may possibly have been the same as McCrea's.[9]

The General Counsel's statistics, like Respondent's, are derived from employee production reports. However, if Respondent did not keep the production records submitted to it by its employees for these 2 months, then it obviously had nothing to "review" for this period.

Respondent's statistics start again in August 1979 and, as previously described, McCrea was assigned to burner rings in the last week of August. As noted, Respondent's September 7 warning and suspension allege that two of McCrea's coworkers had complained to the Company that McCrea was only producing 80 to 90 units daily while they were producing over 200.

Respondent called former employee Lee Brown, who testified that McCrea frequently left his work station, and that Brown told Creech that McCrea had said that he did not have to work as hard as Brown. The latter further averred that he told Creech that McCrea, then working on burner rings, "wasn't doing shit." Brown could not recall when he said this to Creech, but appeared to testify that he said it "not one time but many times . . . ."[10] Brown further testified that he averaged 250–255 burner rings daily for a size "60" heat exchanger (a small size), about 230–235 daily for a size "80," and 215–220 daily for the larger size "100." Respondent's statistics show that Brown exaggerated his own production, and that he never averaged over 200 units daily for any period of time.[11] I do not credit his testimony.

For the same period of August 1 through September 7, four other employees had burner ring averages lower

[11] From August 1, 1979, through September 7 (the date of McCrea's first suspension) Brown had daily burner ring production figures of 178, 152, 169, 189, 150, 126, 125, 211, 191, 164, 154, 187, 178, 140, 212, 206, 212, 179, and 142 (R. Exh. 61), a total of 3593 and an average of about 180 daily. This data includes only days when Brown's daily work was entirely or almost entirely devoted to burner ring production. Consideration of other work during this period would bring down his averages, e.g., 106 "filler welding" (seam welding?) on September 6, and 63 "philliers" and 63 burner rings on September 7 (R. Exh. 61). Brown's lower production, when doing work easier than burner rings, which was the only work McCrea was doing during the same period, remains unexplained.

For the period from September 8 through 28 (the date of McCrea's second suspension), Brown had only 3 days of exclusively burner ring production—174, 147, and 112, a drop in average production to about 144. The other days, combinations of burner ring and easier work, show the same pattern of substantially less than 200 units daily.

than Brown's, about 169,[12] 166,[13] 148,[14] and 137.[15] McCrea's first burner ring production was on August 27, but it was combined with other work on that and the following day.

Beginning on August 29 and continuing through September 7, McCrea had only 6 days of exclusively burner ring work—85, 87, 80, 85, 91, and 106, an average of about 89 with a pattern of increasing productivity.[16] He was then suspended for "low production."

As I have already found, McCrea's new burner ring job was more difficult than that of his former seam welding job. The statement in Respondent's September 7 warning, to the effect that burner rings was "a job requiring less skill," is clearly false. Employee Odell Millhouse testified that it took about 2 months for an employee to reach the standards of his fellow employees in burner ring production, and Respondent's September disciplinary action against McCrea therefore occurred when he was learning a new and more difficult job. According to Millhouse, McCrea was the only employee so disciplined during this beginning 2-month period. I credit this testimony.

(c) Statistical Evidence Between September 7 and McCrea's Second Suspension on September 28: Respondent's figures show that McCrea increased his daily burner ring average from 89 to about 116 during the period between his two suspensions.[17] The only other employees with substantial numbers of burner ring days were David James, with an average of about 158,[18] and L. Brown, previously noted. James had long experience at burner rings. Two other employees with isolated burner ring days had averages of about 130.[19]

As set forth above, Respondent's "time study" took place during this period. According to Respondent, it showed that McCrea had the ability to produce "268 units per day," 68 over the "200 required" for a day (a "requirement" stated for the first time in the record). Respondent asserts that this proved that McCrea could do the job, but would not do so. As previously noted, David James was the "winner" of the timestudy which, according to Respondent, showed that he could do "450 units" per day, 250 over the "200 required." Creech told James that he was "very pleased that he outdid anything we ever expected on the job . . . ." (R. Exh. 37.)

McCrea's average production of 116 during this period was about 43 percent of his capacity indicated by the timestudy,[20] and less than the "200 required" per day. James' average of 158 was also less than the "200 required" daily, and was about 35 percent of James' capacity as revealed by the timestudy.[21] Although James was far more experienced than McCrea in burner rings, and was the winner over leadman Ferguson as well as McCrea in the timestudy, he was still deficient in actual production according to Respondent's asserted 200-unit daily quota, and was working at a less percentage of his daily capacity than was McCrea. Nonetheless, James received only lavish praise, while McCrea, who increased his average, received a suspension.

(d) Statistical and Other Evidence Pertaining to McCrea's Discharge on February 29, 1980: McCrea injured his thumb with a hammer on October 17, 1979. Respondent's figures from the time of his second suspension on September 28 until his injury show that he increased his burner ring production average to over 126 daily.[22]

The doctor put McCrea's hand in a splint and placed him on light duty. Stewart told McCrea to go back to seam welding, but McCrea could not put on a glove, and was sent home. His name next appears on the production records on November 16, doing work other than burner rings, and he continued doing different kinds of work through the rest of 1979.[23]

McCrea and employee David L. Davis testified that Supervisor Creech held a meeting in January 1980, in which he showed employees photographs of completed units which were deficient. Creech said that he was not going to lose his job for anybody, and that the quality of the work would have to improve. He was not too much concerned about production, and did not care if a man put out only one unit per day, as long as it was of good quality. Creech admitted that he probably told employees on more than one occasion that he did not care how many units employees produced, as long as they worked 8 hours a day and produced work of good quality. Millhouse testified that Stewart said substantially the same thing at another time.

McCrea returned to burner ring production on January 7, 1980, and in about the first week increased his daily average to over 137.[24] He was then switched to welding seams, on which he did well. On his last 5 days of employment, McCrea produced 200 "seams" on February 25, 164 "seams" and 27 burner rings on February 26, 153 burner rings and 27 "seams" on February 27, 90 burner rings and 27 "seams" on February 28, and 130 burner rings on February 29.[25] Employee David L. Davis testified that he saw McCrea doing special units in January, and McCrea stated that he did so during his last week of employment. I credit this testimony.

(e) Other Evidence of McCrea's Work Habits and Attitude: Employee Bronson Bell said that McCrea once told him that he did not have to work so hard. "That's why we need a union," McCrea told him. As previously described, Lee Brown alleged slack work habits on the part of McCrea. The latter, on the other hand, testified that his fellow employees never complained to him about low production. On the contrary, they asked him why he stayed in his booth so much. Employee Odell Millhouse testified that McCrea was "the type who would stay in his booth."

McCrea and Millhouse impressed me as more reliable witnesses than Brown and Bell. In general, however, on the issue of McCrea's work habits and productivity, I attach less weight to this conflicting evidence, and greater weight to the production records.

5. Summary and analysis

Respondent's discipline of McCrea is a textbook study in discrimination under Section 8(a)(3) and (4) of the Act. The Board has already determined that Respondent committed prior unfair labor practices manifesting animus against the union campaign and its supporters, of which the principal one was McCrea. The Board concluded that Respondent's prior warning to McCrea and threat of discharge were discriminatorily motivated. This previously determined animus is a factor which must be considered in assessing Respondent's subsequent discipline of McCrea, and tends to establish that the latter, like Respondent's former conduct, was unlawfully motivated. J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 676 (4th Cir. 1980), enfg. as modified 245 NLRB 198 (1979); NLRB v. Clinton Packing Co., 468 F.2d 953 (8th Cir. 1972), enfg. as modified 191 NLRB 879 (1971).

Subsequent to his organizational activities which had already incurred Respondent's ire, McCrea testified against Respondent in the last Board hearing. His testimony was one of the factors which resulted in a decision adverse to Respondent—a fact which could only have added to Respondent's animus.

In April 1979, about 5 months after Respondent's unlawful warning and threat of discharge which were litigated in the last hearing, Respondent issued another "warning," this time for "substandard production." This charge cannot be supported by any production figures then available, because Respondent did not require uniform job descriptions in its employees' production reports, did not verify the accuracy of those reports, and had no established production quotas. McCrea was then doing seam welding, although he, like other employees, called it by another name. Such comparisons as can be made suggest only the tentative conclusion that McCrea was in about the midrange in production.

There can be no doubt of the quality of McCrea's work—it was outstanding. There had been no complaints about his work in the oil welding department. After his transfer to the gas welding department, McCrea became an exceptional seam welder, and was assigned to welding on "special units," products required to be free of defects, for promotional purposes. McCrea's excellent work record constitutes evidence that his discipline was discriminatorily motivated. Clark Manor Nursing Home Corp., 254 NLRB 455 (1981); Boyer Ford Trucks, 254 NLRB 1389 (1981). His work record was considered to be excellent until he appeared at a Board hearing on behalf of the Union. Dillon Stores, 241 NLRB 579 (1979).

Despite this record, Respondent issued a written warning to McCrea about his production—the only such warning it had ever issued up to that date. The uniqueness of this treatment of McCrea, as distinguished from other employees, additionally suggests its pretextual nature.

Respondent conceded in its September 7 warning and suspension that McCrea's production improved in May 1979, but contended that "review" of his production thereafter showed that it was "far below department standards." Respondent submitted no figures for June or July, warranting an inference either that it had none to review, or that it believed that the figures would be adverse to its cause. Respondent in fact did receive employee production reports for these months, since they are covered by the General Counsel's statistics based on copies of employee reports submitted by the Company. These figures suggest that McCrea continued at about the same pace in his seam welding job, and that there were other employees producing less units of the same work.

Respondent has a practice of assigning employees to the work they do best. McCrea was an expert seam welder, but was not good on the more demanding job of burner rings. However, he was transferred to burner rings in late August 1979, contrary to company practice. In its September 7 warning, Respondent falsely stated that the burner ring job was less demanding. Considered in connection with later events, this transfer to more onerous work is evidence of discriminatory motivation on the part of Respondent. Ward Products Corp., 243 NLRB 354 (1979).

After only 6 full days of burner ring production, during which McCrea increased his daily output, Respondent gave him a 3-day suspension for production "below department standards," contrary to its established policy of allowing 2 months for development of proficiency in this work. When McCrea asked Assistant Plant Manager Stewart for a written quota he was expected to produce, Stewart refused, evasively asking McCrea whether it was too much to produce only one unit per day. Respondent's refusal to tell McCrea what he was expected to produce, and suspending him again for failing to meet production, constitutes further evidence of its arbitrary and discriminatory frame of mind.

Respondent conducted a so-called timestudy of the production of McCrea and two other employees. Although the "study" was conducted under circumstances which cast doubt on its objectivity, Respondent professed to discover from it that McCrea could meet an asserted "200-unit" daily quota, but lacked motivation to do so. During the 3-week period after the first suspension, McCrea increased his production to the point where he was producing a higher percentage of his own capacity than was the winner of the timestudy. Both were below the "200" daily quota—a fictional standard newly invented by Respondent, which no employee other than McCrea was required to meet. Although neither McCrea nor the winner of the timestudy met this standard, the latter received praise, while McCrea received a 5-day suspension. This gross disparity in treatment simply adds to the already abundant evidence of Respondent's unlawful motivation. AMF, Inc. v. NLRB, 593 F.2d 972 (10th Cir. 1979), enfg. 228 NLRB 1406 (1977).

During the 2–3 weeks after his September 28 suspension, McCrea continued to add to his burner ring productivity, so that he reached the lower range of more experienced producers of this product. He was then injured, was off work, and was thereafter transferred to other work for the balance of 1979.

McCrea returned to burner ring work in January 1980, and quickly raised his production so that he reached the low to middle range. He was then transferred to other work, including seam welding of special units. He had an outstanding last 5 days of work before his discharge, including one "200-unit" day of seam welding. He was discharged on February 29 for "substandard production," the only employee so disciplined. Magnesium Casting Co., 250 NLRB 692 (1980).

The transparent falsity of Respondent's asserted reason for twice suspending and then firing McCrea is further demonstrated by the fact that two supervisors told employees in early 1980 that Respondent did not care about production as long as quality was good, and by Supervisor Creech's admission at the hearing that he did not know whether McCrea was discharged for low burner ring production or low overall production. As Creech candidly testified, Respondent has no production requirements—"it is more or less what a man is capable of doing." Respondent's vacillating, equivocal, and ultimately false reason for McCrea's discipline shows that it was engaged in "elaborate and contrived bureaucratic exercises" to get rid of the leader of the union movement and the principal witness against it in a previous Board proceeding. Midwest Stock Exchange, 244 NLRB 1108, 1119 (1979); Town & Country Supermarkets, 244 NLRB 303 (1979).

The overwhelming weight of the evidence establishes that Respondent twice suspended McCrea in September 1979, and discharged him on February 29, 1980, because of his union activities and sympathies and because he gave testimony at a previous Board hearing. The General Counsel has therefore established a strong prima facie case that McCrea's discipline was unlawful, and Respondent has not rebutted that case. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's aforesaid conduct was violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

C. Betty G. Robinson

1. Employment history

Robinson was employed in June 1979 and worked at a variety of jobs, as a welder and press braking machine operator in the welding department, and as a shipping clerk in the shipping department. She was working in the latter job at the time of her layoff on November 7, 1979. Like McCrea, she had been active in the union campaign and had testified on behalf of the Union at the prior Board hearing.

2. Supervisory interrogation of Robinson

Robinson testified that in March 1979 Shipping and Receiving Supervisor Dennis Ducate[26] asked her, "What is this that I hear about you being for the Union?" In response, Robinson asked whether she could "afford" to be for the Union, and Ducate answered that she could not afford to do so. Robinson asked the identity of the person who told Ducate that she favored the union cause, and Ducate gave the name of another employee. Ducate denied this conversation and asserted that Robinson said that people would be "crazy" to vote for the Union, although Ducate also said that he did not know whether Robinson was really against the Union. Robinson was the more believable witness, and I credit her testimony.[27]

Robinson described a second conversation with Ducate in late March 1979, in which the supervisor, referring to the absence of another employee, said, "Yeah, that is how we are going to get rid of the bunch of them, all 166 of them, right, Betty?" (The tally of ballots in the election on March 22 showed that 166 employees voted for the Union. Ducane Heating Corp., supra, 254 NLRB at 113.) According to Robinson, this statement was made in the presence of another supervisor, Arnold Croft or Ronnie Hutto.[28] According to her testimony, Robinson asked Ducate who it was that said she was "one of the 166." Ducate, Croft, and Hutto denied any such conversation. Robinson impressed me as the more truthful witness. In addition, the figure "166," being the exact number that voted for the Union during the election, is a corroborative detail adding verisimilitude to Robinson's testimony, which I do not consider a likely invention on her part. I credit Robinson's testimony.

3. The September 7 layoff and Robinson's conversations with management

According to Plant Manager Frank Ducate,[29] Respondent laid off about 90 employees on September 7, 1979, because of an alleged decline in customer orders. Robinson was not included in this layoff but, being pregnant, was concerned about future layoffs. Accordingly, she had a conversation about September 14 with Supervisor Arnold Croft in which she asked about company policy on layoffs, and whether there would be any more. Croft replied that layoffs were by seniority, that he did not know whether there would be any more, but that Robinson and another employee would be the next layoffs if there were any.

Robinson testified that she asked Croft whether she could meet with Plant Manager Frank Ducate. The [26] The pleadings establish and I find that Dennis Ducate was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[27] Respondent objected that this incident took place outside any "relevant period" herein, and the General Counsel responded that it was intended to prove background animus, not an independent violation.

[28] The pleadings establish and I find that Croft and Hutto were agents of Respondent and supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[29] As in the cases of John Ducate Jr. and Dennis Ducate, the pleadings establish and I find that Frank Ducate was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

latter agrees that he did have a conversation with Robinson and, although he places it about 1 week earlier than Robinson, he stated that it took place after the September 7 layoff. Croft, on the other hand, denied that Robinson asked for a meeting with Ducate. In light of the obvious fact that such a meeting did take place, I credit Robinson's testimony that she asked for it, and do not credit Croft on this difference. However, Croft did corroborate Robinson's testimony about his description of Respondent's layoff policy as governed by seniority, and Robinson's concern with the possibility of her own layoff.

Robinson's version of her conversation with Frank Ducate is that it took place on the afternoon of the same day that she spoke with Croft. Robinson asked about her rights to maternity benefits, and whether she was going to be laid off. Ducate replied that she would receive $60 weekly in insurance payments, and would not be laid off. He advised that this would be a better policy than "taking a layoff," since Robinson could automatically return to work after 2 months on maternity leave. Robinson then went home and wrote Ducate a letter, thanking him. He called her into the office after receiving it, and asked whether she had written this "sweet letter." An amiable conversation ensued, in which Ducate told Robinson that he needed her in the shipping department, that he had no one else to put back there, and that everything was going to be "all right."

Ducate admitted one conversation with Robinson, and averred that she merely asked whether there were going to be any more layoffs, and whether she would be eligible for unemployment benefits and food stamps. He replied that he did not know about future layoffs, and supposed that she would be entitled to benefits. Ducate denied that Robinson wrote him a letter, or that he had another conversation with her about layoffs.

Robinson's version of what she described as her first conversation is more likely than Ducate's. She had just seen Supervisor Croft, to whom she had expressed concern about the possibility of her own layoff, and her right to maternity benefits. The supervisor had told her that she and another employee would be the next to be laid off. It is highly probable that Robinson expressed the same concerns in her conversation the same day with Plant Manager Ducate. According to the latter, however, Robinson talked only about layoffs in general and her right to unemployment benefits, but did not specifically ask about her own status in any forthcoming layoff nor mention maternity benefits. This is highly unlikely, and I credit Robinson's testimony as to the nature of her concerns expressed to Ducate.

Ducate denied the statements attributed to him by Robinson, assuring her of continued employment and maternity benefits. As in his testimony about the beginning of the conversation, Ducate's version is contrived and unnatural. Robinson was a more believable witness, and I credit her testimony. I also credit her account of the letter she wrote Ducate, thanking him, and her second conversation with him thereafter.

4. Robinson's testimony at the prior hearing

On November 3, 1979, Robinson appeared as a rebuttal witness for the General Counsel in the earlier proceeding, and her testimony was relied on by the administrative law judge in the latter's finding that an alleged discriminatee had not been suspended for cause, contrary to Respondent's witnesses. Ducane Heating Corp., supra, 254 NLRB at 126.

5. Robinson's "Permanent Layoff"

On the day that she returned to work after her testimony at the hearing, according to Robinson, she was called to the telephone by Supervisor Dennis Ducate. She took the call, and an individual at the plant called her "a very dirty person [for] testifying for the Union." Robinson averred that she protested this call to Dennis Ducate, who replied that it was a "personal problem." Robinson testified that she asked Ducate to get this "harassment stopped," and told him that she would contact the Labor Board if it were not stopped. According to Robinson, Dennis Ducate replied, "I know you will." Dennis Ducate admitted knowing the individual identified by Robinson who, he testified, was employed by a vending company at the plant canteen. However, Ducate denied that Robinson ever protested any call she had received from this individual. Ducate was not a reliable witness, and I credit Robinson's testimony.

On November 7, 4 days after her testimony before the Board, Robinson was laid off by Plant Manager Frank Ducate. The latter told her and three other employees in his office that they were being put on "permanent layoff due to the economic situation in the country," and that they should seek employment elsewhere. Frank Ducate initially testified that 10 employees were laid off on November 7. Ducate also testified, however, that Robinson and five other employees were all present in his office on that date at the same time, when he read to them from a layoff notice which had been posted on the bulletin board.

Ducate further stated that six employees were laid off on November 26, because of a reduction in customer orders. All three layoffs—September 7 and November 7 and 26—were "permanent," according to Ducate.

6. Respondent's asserted reasons for Robinson's layoff

a. The seniority issue

(1) Summary of the Evidence: Respondent contends that Robinson was laid off in accordance with plantwide seniority. Plant Manager Frank Ducate said that Robinson had "less seniority than the next person" on a "seniority list." He could not recall the name of the next person on the list, but contended that he had submitted a copy of same to the Board. However, the General Counsel represented that he had no such list, and Supervisor Arnold Croft testified that he was not even aware of a seniority list. Supervisor Dennis Ducate contended that the November 7 layoff was made on the basis of plantwide seniority, but testified that Robinson was not the least senior employee in the plant, thus contradicting Frank Ducate.

Frank Ducate conceded that some employees were recalled after layoff. Although they had been laid off according to plantwide seniority, they were recalled pursuant to a system of departmental seniority, according to the plant manager. Robinson credibly testified that two other employees, who had "started working" after she did, were called back to work. One of these worked in the shipping department, where Robinson was assigned at the time of her layoff, and the other in the welding department, where Robinson formerly worked.

(2) Analysis: Because of the undocumented and contradictory nature of Respondent's evidence concerning the existence of a seniority list and Robinson's placement on it, Respondent has not established that Robinson was laid off in accordance with any seniority system.

Assuming arguendo the truth of Frank Ducate's testimony about layoff of employees according to plantwide seniority, and recall according to departmental seniority, such a system is fraught with potential for manipulation by an employer to get rid of an undesirable employee. Thus, an employer could transfer the latter to another department, where he would be last in departmental seniority, implement a mass layoff, and then recall in accordance with departmental seniority. This may have been the case with the shipping employee who was recalled although he started working at the plant after Robinson began. With respect to the welding department employee who was also less senior than Robinson, the employer's argument would be that Robinson was not employed in that department at the time of layoff, and therefore not entitled to recall.

This system in effect would grant the employer discretion to select which employees shall continue to be employed. The Board has already approved of the conclusion that "an employer's discretion as to who shall have continuous service and who shall not is to enable an employer to pick and choose between employees, a result totally inconsistent with the generally accepted purpose of a seniority system." Ram Construction Co., 228 NLRB 769, 776 (1977).

The dubious nature of Respondent's double system of seniority is further emphasized by the fact that, although all layoffs were "permanent" according to Ducate, some of the employees were recalled. To paraphrase Orwell's Animal Farm, some of the permanent layoffs were apparently more permanent than others.

Considering all these conclusions together—the fact that Respondent has not established that Robinson was initially laid off pursuant to a seniority system, the double system of seniority with its potential for discriminatory manipulation, and the recall of some "permanently" laid-off employees with less plantwide seniority than Robinson—I find that Robinson was initially laid off, and her layoff status was thereafter maintained, contrary to any system of seniority. In fact, she was discharged. Don Pizzolato, Inc., 249 NLRB 953, 957 (1980).

b. The declining business issue

(1) Respondent's Position: Plant Manager Frank Ducate testified that the layoffs were caused by decline in customers' orders. The Company went bankrupt in 1974, and had permanent layoffs at that time, according to Ducate. He feared that the Company might be facing similar problems in late 1979, and planned permanent layoffs to avoid them.

During the 1974 layoff, according to Ducate, the position of shipping clerk was abolished as a separate job, and was later reinstated. Betty Robinson held this position in the fall of 1979. According to Dennis Ducate, it consisted of typing packing slips and bills of lading, and operating a teletype information service for customers.

Three employees in the shipping department were laid off during the September 7, 1979 layoff, according to Frank Ducate. The plant manager and Dennis Ducate testified that they discussed the shipping clerk position about 2 weeks before the November 7 layoff, and at that time decided to have the personnel clerk perform the shipping clerk's duties. The personnel clerk at that time was, and still is, Donna Winstead. Respondent thus contends that it made a decision to eliminate Robinson's job about 2 weeks before the November 7 layoff. This is described by Respondent's witnesses as "consolidation" of the shipping clerk and personnel clerk positions. Since the prior hearing began on October 30, and Robinson testified on November 3, Respondent appears to be suggesting that its decison to lay off Robinson was actually made just before Robinson's testimony at the last hearing. Robinson was not given any advance notice of this decision, according to Dennis Ducate.

Respondent's witnesses testified that Donna Winstead performed the shipping clerk functions about 2 hours daily. There is no plan to reinstate the shipping clerk job as a separate position, although Dennis Ducate said that it now takes more than 2 hours to perform shipping clerk functions.

(2) Analysis: The General Counsel argues that Respondent's failure to call Donna Winstead casts doubt on the testimony of Respondent's witnesses, and that I have no choice but to find that her testimony would have been adverse to Respondent's cause, if she had been called. There is merit in this argument.[30]

Respondent did not submit any documentary evidence to support its contention that there was a decline in customers' orders. The General Counsel asked Dennis Ducate whether he could state the number of orders either at the time of the layoff or the time of hearing, and Ducate replied that he could not.

The search for documentary evidence pertaining to Respondent's economic defense is not, however, entirely in vain. As described above, Respondent submitted voluminous production records and a summary thereof in an attempt to prove that Randolph McCrea had "substandard production." Production records, of course, are not customers' orders. However, there must be some relationship between the two if a company is to stay in business. Absent special circumstances, no rational entrepreneur would increase his production while his daily sales were declining. As a corollary, the fact that production is increasing is some evidence that sales, or orders, are also increasing. These principles apply to Respondent's economic defense of its layoff of Betty Robinson, and to the production records which it submitted in this proceeding.

Respondent's records cover the months of April 1979 through February 1980, with unexplained omissions of June and July 1979. They are thus coextensive with the one layoff in September and the two in November. They do not purport to be records of all units or components produced by the Company. Nonetheless, they do constitute records of a very substantial number of components produced during a relevant period. The monthly totals of all these components thus constitute some evidence of the Company's orders from customers at times when employees were being laid off because, the Company asserts, orders were going down.

The records are quite the reverse of what one would expect in a business with declining sales. Thus, they show totals of 6162 components produced in April,[31] 13,579 in May (no figures for June or July), 12,137 in August, 28,361 in September, 33,587 in October,[32] 27,463 in November,[33] 18,373 in December,[34] 20,688 in January 1980,[35] and 31,789 in February.[36])

Thus, in the month of the first layoff (September), production was about four and one-half times greater than it was 5 months before (April), and continued at the same substantially higher level. Assuming some lag time between receipt of orders and production, the fact that production continued at a high level for all 5 months after September strongly suggests that there was no decline in orders during that and succeeding months.

These figures are not conclusive, since they are derived from the Company's gas welding department. Frank Ducate testified that the rising cost of home heating fuel had almost eliminated business in oil furnaces since November 1979. However, he admitted that business in gas furnaces had "picked up" in the winter of 1980. The record thus contains only testimonial assertions of a decline in total orders and a decline in oil furnace sales, while the only documents available, plus Frank Ducate's corroboration, show a substantial increase in gas furnace sales. There are no documents to establish that this increase in one part of Respondent's business was more than offset by a decline in another part. Respondent presumably had business records showing total orders during relevant periods of time. No such records were supplied.

[32] McCrea was injured in October and did not return to work until November. R. Exh. 61 omits figures for all employees for the period of McCrea's absence. Thus, for October 1979, with 23 working days, the exhibit provides production figures for only 9 days, the total of which is 13,143 units. Assuming similar production during the 14 working days omitted on the exhibit, the extrapolated total is 33,587 for October.

[33] Out of 22 working days in November 1979, R. Exh. 61 provides production figures of 18,724 for 15 days. Assuming similar production rates for the 7 omitted days, the extrapolated total for the month is 27,463. See fn. 32.

[36] Ibid.

Respondent's animus against the Union and its supporters has already been established, as well as an elaborate structure of pretextual defenses in the case of McCrea. Respondent's witnesses on the issue of its alleged decline in orders were not reliable, and I conclude that the Company has not established that it suffered a decline in customers' orders during the period of the layoffs.

c. The "Prior Decision" issue

With respect to the specific layoff of Robinson, I do not credit the testimony of Respondent's witnesses that this decision was made about 2 weeks prior to November 7. Robinson had had an amiable conversation with Frank Ducate only a few weeks before, in which she was assured of continued employment and maternity benefits. It is unlikely that Ducate would thereafter make a secret decision to terminate her, but delay notifying her for 2 weeks. There is no evidence of delay in implementation of layoff decisions pertaining to other employees, and no reason to believe that Respondent varied its customary practice in the case of Robinson.

It is probable that Respondent would have consulted with Donna Winstead before adding the shipping clerk duties to her existing duties as a personnel clerk, and that Winstead would then have had some knowledge of the date of the alleged decision to "consolidate" the two positions. However, Winstead, currently employed by Respondent, was not called as a witness. I infer that, if called, her testimony would have been adverse to Respondent on this issue.[37]

For these reasons I find that Respondent's decision to give Robinson a "permanent layoff" was made about the date of the actual layoff, to wit, November 7, 1979.

d. Respondent's other evidence against Robinson

Respondent introduced voluminous shipping documents with various errors on them, allegedly by Robinson. Dennis Ducate asserted that he spoke to Robinson in May 1979 about these errors, but acknowledged that he never gave her a written warning. Ducate also admitted that these errors had nothing to do with Robinson's layoff. There is therefore no need to consider them, since Respondent concedes that they were not a factor in its action against her.

Respondent also sought to attack Robinson's credibility on the ground that she filed an application for unemployment compensation benefits on November 13, stating thereon that she was not pregnant, whereas in fact she gave birth 2 days later. Robinson testified that she was obviously pregnant 2 days before childbirth, at the time when she appeared in the unemployment compensation office, and that she inadvertently checked the wrong box on the application. I have carefully considered this evidence and conclude that it does not indicate that Robinson was an untruthful witness.

[37] Supra, fn. 30.

7. Legal analysis and conclusions

As in the case of McCrea, Robinson was a union supporter who testified at the prior hearing, and Respondent's animus against such employees has been established. For reasons already given and authorities cited, this animus must be considered in evaluating Respondent's action against Robinson.

In March 1979, Supervisor Dennis Ducate asked Robinson, "What is this that I hear about you being for the Union?" and told her that she could not "afford" to be for the Union. In a later conversation referring to the absence of another employee, Ducate said that this was how Respondent was going to "get rid of the bunch of them, all 166 of them." Since 166 employees voted for the Union during the election held the same month, Ducate was obviously threatening to get rid of all the union supporters. Although these statements by Ducate were not alleged as independent violations of the Act, they were obviously coercive.

Robinson did not openly admit her prounion sympathies in March 1979. Thus, she asked Dennis Ducate who it was that had told him that she was "one of the 166." Ducate contends that Robinson said that employees would be "crazy" to vote for the Union. Respondent's doubts about Robinson's true sympathies were augmented during her two conversations with Frank Ducate in September 1979, after the first layoff, when she requested assurances of maternity benefits and job continuity. The fact that Ducate gave her these assurances in a friendly conversation, and told her that he needed her in the shipping department, suggests that Respondent was not yet aware of Robinson's stand on the union issue.

Robinson's views became apparent on November 3, when she testified for the General Counsel in the prior hearing. Respondent's attitude underwent an abrupt about-face. Thus, when Robinson returned to work and protested being called a "dirty person" for testifying, and said that she was going to the Labor Board if the harassment did not stop, Dennis Ducate said that he knew she would—a comment evidencing Respondent's animus.

On November 7, 4 days after her testimony, Robinson received a "permanent layoff" under circumstances which warrant a finding that she was discharged, as already set forth. Her discharge was motivated by Respondent's discovery of her union sympathies, and by the fact that she testified on behalf of the General Counsel at the Board hearing. This conclusion is warranted because of Dennis Ducate's prior coercive interrogation and threats in March 1979,[38] the abruptness of Robinson's discharge[39] a few days after her testimony at a Board hearing,[40] the fact that the asserted reason for her discharge, a decrease in orders, did not in fact take place,[41] the fact that other employees were recalled at a time when business was allegedly going down, without explanation in accordance with any rational seniority system,[42] and by Respondent's previously established animus against the Union and its supporters. Wright Line, supra.

For these reasons, I find that Respondent discriminatorily discharged Robinson on November 7, because of her union sympathies and her testimony before a Board hearing, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

D. Larry Hampton

1. Employment history

Hampton started working for the Company as a welder in the oil welding department in August 1977. He later transferred to the gas welding department where his principal job was tying ends. This work required him to lift and pull units weighing up to 40 pounds.

2. Hampton's union activities

Hampton credibly testified that he started working on behalf of the Union in August or September 1978, and that this continued until about October 1979. He passed out union leaflets and asked fellow workers to sign union cards. John Harrison, a supervisor in the oil welding department,[43] testified that he saw Hampton distributing leaflets, and company knowledge of this activity is therefore established.[44] Hampton also testified at the previous Board hearing which began October 30, 1979, and Respondent obviously had knowledge of this fact.

3. Hampton's injury and treatment

On January 25, 1980, Hampton slipped in a hole caused by a missing roller within the roller belt, and fell on his back.[45] He worked for about 30 minutes, then began to feel pain, and asked to see a doctor. He was examined that day by Dr. John C. Whitley Jr., a witness for Respondent. Frank Ducate described Dr. Whitley as "our Company doctor," although the latter said that he was "simply available" to the Company. Whitley took X-rays and conducted a physical examination of Hampton. The X-rays showed no abnormality, but the physical examination revealed tenderness and a muscle spasm in the lower back. Hampton was given muscle relaxants and pain medication, and was recommended for light duty for 5 days.

[43] The complaint dated July 17 alleges and the answer thereto admits that "John Hairston" is an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. At the hearing, "John Harrison" testified that he had been a supervisor in the oil welding department since March 1979. I find that the correct last name is "Harrison," as stated in the official transcript, and that he was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[44] As indicated, ibid., Harrison said that he had been a supervisor since March 1979. The allegation in the complaint, admitted by the answer, avers that he was a supervisor "at all times material herein." Since Hampton's union activities continued through October 1979, I conclude that Harrison and, by attribution, Respondent acquired knowledge of Hampton's activities at times subsequent to Harrison's acquisition of supervisory status.

[45] Hampton stated that the date was January 5. However, the medical records show that it was January 25.

Hampton returned to Dr. Whitley on January 30. There was some improvement, but he still complained of pain, and was given another analgesic. After Hampton's return to Dr. Whitley on February 4, the latter continued his diagnosis of back strain, minor contusion, and minor spasm. However, because of the continued pain, Hampton was referred to an orthopedic surgeon, Dr. Harry L. Pearce, who examined him on February 8. X-ray examination was unremarkable, and Dr. Pearce's diagnosis was acute dorsal lumbar back strain or a pulled back muscle. He prescribed pain medication, rest, a back brace, and light duty. Hampton credibly testified that he wore the back brace throughout his period of treatment, and thereafter.

Dr. Whitley saw Hampton, for the last time, on February 11. It was his opinion that Hampton could return to full duty. However, he deferred to Dr. Pearce's recommendation for light duty as being within the latter's area of expertise. Although Dr. Whitley testified that he had detected a muscle spasm in Hampton's back on initial examination, he was later unable to say whether there were any involuntary muscular contractions. He was asked what diagnostic inference might be derived from the absence of such contractions. Dr. Whitley answered that, although "faking" had to be considered in the absence of involuntary signs and symptoms, "the patient can't help but experience some discomfort and sometimes [it] is almost impossible to really tell whether it is subjective or objective."

Dr. Pearce saw Hampton again on February 15, at which time he was still experiencing pain. Dr. Pearce prescribed anti-inflammatory medication and, 4 days later when Hampton was seen again, Dr. Pearce felt that there had not been sufficient time for healing.

Hampton missed one appointment with Dr. Pearce on March 11 because of transportation problems, but was seen on March 17. He was still complaining of "intermittent discomfort," but Dr. Pearce considered that the healing process had been completed. He testified that no examination of Hampton was necessary after the initial examination, because the latter reported diminishing pain over the period that he was seen. Dr. Pearce did acknowledge, however, that lifting and bending might aggravate the existing injury.

Hampton testified that Dr. Pearce told him that his back might hurt for a while because of the injury. However, the doctor told him that he might lose his job if he continued on light duty. Although Dr. Pearce said that he did not know specifically whether Hampton was working, or the name of his employer, he agreed that he frequently counsels patients against prolonged light duty, because of the abundance of healthy applicants for employment. Accordingly, he gave Hampton a "certificate" that he was able to return to work with no limitations.

4. Hampton's work during the period of treatment and his discharge

Hampton credibly testified that, after he returned from seeing Dr. Whitley the first time, Supervisor Creech told him to go back to his usual job. Hampton protested, saying that Dr. Whitley had assigned him to light duty. Assistant Plant Manager Billy Joe Stewart demanded that Hampton return to the doctor's office and get the work restriction in writing. Creech maintained that tying ends was light duty. Hampton differed with this, because of the bending and lifting requirement, and Creech attempted to show him how to do the job without bending and lifting. Hampton was then assigned to sweeping. He testified, and Creech denied, that the latter tried to get him to sweep under the roller belts in a manner which required bending. I credit Hampton.

In February, Hampton was transferred to the oil welding department under Supervisor John Harrison. His job was making cleats, a spot welding function classified as light duty. Hampton testified that there was sufficient work of this nature. Harrison, although he said that this was a "created" job, also testified that he had enough of this work for Hampton to do.

When Hampton returned from his March 17 visit with Dr. Pearce, he gave Harrison the doctor's certificate stating that he could return to work without limitations. Harrison read the certificate and, noting that "they're putting you back on your regular duty," asked Hampton how he felt. According to Hampton, he replied that his back still hurt, and Harrison responded by saying he did not know why Hampton should go back to regular duty with pain in his back. Harrison alternately denied and then said that he did not know whether he had this conversation. I credit Hampton.

Harrison further testified that Hampton walked around the plant "slumped over," but that he also saw him walking normally one night in a grocery store. When Hampton saw the supervisor, according to Harrison, he "sort of went back into his slump." I attach little importance to this testimony, because the fact that Hampton was actually experiencing pain is medically documented. Further, as noted, Hampton wore a back brace at times, and may have had unusual posture because of it.

After Hampton's return to the plant with Dr. Pearce's certificate on March 17, he went back to making cleats. Creech came over and asked him what Dr. Pearce had said, and how his back felt. Hampton said that his back hurt, and referred Creech to Harrison for the doctor's report. Hampton was then ordered to return to the gas welding department and begin welding, which he did for the balance of March 17.

Hampton returned to work the next day, and during the morning told Creech that his back still hurt and that he would like to see a doctor. Creech asked whether the last doctor had released him, and Hampton responded affirmatively. According to Creech, Hampton said that he was unable to do his job and would not do it. I credit Hampton's version of this conversation.

Plant Manager Frank Ducate testified that he received a report on March 18 that Hampton had been released for work without limitation, but that he was complaining that he could not or would not do the job, and wanted to see a doctor. Ducate asserts that he then called Dr. Pearce, who told him that he could not find anything wrong with Hampton, and that the latter was "malingering." Ducate then spoke with his attorney, and also stated that he called Dr. Whitley, who told him that Hampton was "faking." Ducate then prepared a permanent layoff notice for Hampton, because of "inability or refusal to do the work," and gave it to Assistant Plant Manager Billie Joe Stewart.

Hampton was then called into Stewart's office, with Creech present, and was given the discharge notice. According to Hampton, he read it, and protested that he was not refusing to do his normal job, but that his back hurt and he was unable to do his job at that time. Stewart replied that there was nothing he could do. Hampton stated that he unsuccessfully asked for a union representative or coworker. Stewart testified that the entire proceeding went smoothly. It was "cut and dried." Hampton did not ask for a union representative, and did not even object to being permanently laid off. This testimony is incredible, and I accept Hampton's version.

Respondent introduced into evidence a letter from Dr. Pearce dated March 19, 1979, stating that it was in response to a request from Ducate. The letter outlines Dr. Pearce's diagnosis and treatment given above, and concludes that Hampton was still complaining of mild pain in the middorsal back on April 17 but that the doctor felt he could return to work with the help of aspirin if needed. Respondent also introduced a letter from Dr. Whitley dated April 11. This letter notes that Hampton was last seen on February 11, that examination then "failed to reveal any objective pathology," and that Hampton was "encouraged to return to work as suggested by Dr. Pearce."

I do not credit Ducate's testimony concerning the "malingering" and "faking" statements attributed to the doctors. Dr. Whitley testified during the hearing, and his letter is outlined above—there is no reference to "faking" anywhere in this evidence. Indeed, when Dr. Whitley was explicitly asked whether "faking" could be inferred from an absence of involuntary muscular contractures, he replied that it was difficult to tell.

Nor is there anything about "malingering" in Dr. Pearce's testimony or letter. Given his diagnosis of acute back strain, and his treatment consisting of pain medication, rest, a back brace, and light duty, it is incredible that he would have considered Hampton a malingerer. Even on March 17, when he released Hampton for general duty, Dr. Pearce acknowledged that Hampton was still asserting intermittent pain, but felt that he could work with the help of aspirin if necessary.

There is no testimony from either doctor about a telephone conversation with Frank Ducate on March 18. Respondent introduced a "documentation" wherein Ducate sought to record his alleged conversation with Dr. Pearce on March 18, and, as noted, the latter did send a letter dated March 19. There is no "documentation" concerning a conversation on March 18 with Dr. Whitley, however, and the latter's letter to Respondent about Hampton is dated April 11, about 3 weeks after the layoff. I do not credit Ducate's testimony that he had any conversation at all with Dr. Whitley on March 18.

Up until the time of his return from Dr. Pearce's office on March 17, Hampton had been engaged for several weeks in light duty, making cleats. He was then transferred for the balance of the day to welding, despite his claim that his back hurt. The next day he said that his back still hurt, and asked to see a doctor. He was a believable witness, and his testimony as to pain is supported by the medical evidence. I credit that testimony.

5. Respondent's other evidence against Hampton

Respondent introduced evidence of Hampton's alleged absenteeism. However, Frank Ducate testified that Hampton was not laid off because of absenteeism, and there is therefore no need to consider this evidence.

Hampton was given a written warning for "low productivity" on June 9, 1979, but was also given "recognition" a week later for improvement. Other similar evidence introduced into the record by Respondent has nothing to do with the issues in this case.

Frank Ducate testified that Respondent had permanently laid off another employee (Timothy Jeffries) under "exactly the same" circumstances as Hampton's—refusal or inability to work after a doctor's release to full duty from light duty (R. Exh. 43).

6. Legal analysis and conclusions

The record clearly establishes that Hampton suffered a work-related back injury on January 25, and was thereafter in pain. The General Counsel seeks to cast doubt on the value of Dr. Whitley's testimony, because of its variance from that of Dr. Pearce, and on the latter's opinions because he did not conduct a physical examination of Hampton on March 17 before releasing him for general duty.

Dr. Whitley candidly deferred to Dr. Pearce's expertise in the field of back injuries. And there is no record evidence to contradict Dr. Pearce's description of medical practice, i.e., that barring evidence of a new injury, a patient's assertions of diminishing pain warrant a release without another examination. However, if the patient's statements alone provide the basis for a medical opinion, according to Dr. Pearce, then there would appear to be no medical contradiction to Hampton's statement the next day that his back hurt too much to engage in welding. On the other hand, if Hampton's statement is insufficient for a medical judgment, then he should have been given a physical examination before increasing the level of his physical activity, particularly in light of his protestations of continuing pain.

These doubts as to the procedure followed are augmented by Dr. Pearce's counseling of Hampton—that he might lose his job if he continued on light duty. It is unclear how Dr. Pearce knew that Hampton was on any kind of duty, since he testified that he did not know whether Hampton was working. Further, this view would seem to be an unwarranted introduction of a nonmedical opinion into what should have been an exclusively medical subject.

Although these factors must be weighed in assessing the medical evidence, they do not establish bias on the part of the doctors in favor of Respondent. As set forth, both doctors agree that Hampton did suffer an injury, and that he was in pain. The appropriate area for consideration is Respondent's use of the information it received from Hampton and the doctors.

As in the cases of McCrea and Robinson, Respondent's animus against the Union and its supporters has already been established, and must be considered in analysis of its treatment of Hampton. Like the other two employees, Hampton was a union activist and a witness at the prior hearing.

The record shows that Respondent viewed Hampton's injury as an opportunity to rid itself of a union protagonist. Thus, it was only with grudging reluctance that Respondent complied with Dr. Whitley's prescription of light duty for Hampton. First, Stewart demanded that Hampton go back and get the order in writing from the doctor. Then, Creech tried to convince Hampton that his regular job of tying ends was light duty. Finally, with Hampton transferred to sweeping duties, Creech tried to force him to sweep under the roller belts, a process requiring bending.

When Hampton returned from Dr. Pearce with a general duty "certificate," Creech promptly transferred him to welding, despite Hampton's statement that he was still in pain. The next morning, March 18, Hampton told Creech that his back still hurt and that he would like to see a doctor. This simple request was transformed into a statement that Hampton "would not or could not" do his job—at least, this is the report which Plant Manager Ducate received. Ducate did not consult with Hampton about the latter's version before making a decision—he talked merely with his lawyer, perhaps with Dr. Pearce, and thereupon decided to give Hampton a "permanent layoff." Respondent's failure to investigate the matter fully prior to making a decision constitutes evidence of its animus. T.I.M.E.-DC, Inc. v. NLRB, 504 F.2d 294 (5th Cir. 1974), enfg. 203 NLRB 1141 (1973).

When Stewart met with Hampton, it was to inform him of a decision already made, because Hampton "would not or could not" do his job. When Hampton said that he was suffering pain which prevented him from doing the welding job at that time, Stewart dismissed the matter without any consideration of the fact that Hampton had manifestly been able to make cleats in the oil welding department, a light duty job where there was a sufficiency of work. It is therefore clear that one of the alternatives in Respondent's dual rationale for its discipline of Hampton—that he "could not" do his job—was inaccurate. Although he could not engage in a full duty job at the time, he was capable of engaging in other, lighter work, which was then available. Respondent's failure to transfer him back to this work constitutes additional evidence of its unlawful motivation. PPG Industries, 251 NLRB 1147, 1173 (1980).

The other alternative in Respondent's dual rationale—that Hampton "would not" work—involves in essence a charge that Hampton was malingering. It is clear that this was not true in fact, based on the medical evidence of an actual injury, the observed muscular spasms, the doctors' opinions, and Hampton's credible testimony of pain.

Nor does the evidence warrant a finding that Respondent had a good-faith belief that Hampton was malingering. Respondent's only support for this argument is Dr. Pearce's general duty certificate. Factors militating against a finding of a good-faith belief, however, are (1) Respondent's initial reluctance to give Hampton light duty; (2) Hampton's protestations of pain to Supervisors Creech and Harrison, without any expressions of doubt from the latter; (3) Hampton's abrupt transfer back to the gas welding department upon Respondent's receipt of Dr. Pearce's certificate, without any consultation with Hampton; (4) Ducate's precipitate decision to give Hampton a permanent layoff without full investigation, and without an opinion from the doctors that Hampton was malingering; (5) Stewart's denial of Hampton's request for a union representative or coworker during the exit interview; (6) Respondent's failure to transfer Hampton back to the light duty which he could do; and (7) Respondent's pr viously established union animus. Respondent's argument that it was merely following its own past practice, citing the Jeffries case, is not persuasive—there is no evidence that any, much less all, of the foregoing factors were present in the Jeffries case.

The Board has had occasion to pass on a similar factual situation. In Fasco Industries, 214 NLRB 93 (1974), the company sought to establish the validity of its belief that the alleged discriminatee, a union activist, had abused company policy against "summer leaves" for female employees by a false claim of a back impairment. Chairman Miller, in a dissenting opinion, concluded that the company had established its position, and stated that "all of the medical evidence and the factual evidence confirms the report of the orthopedic specialist that from and after July 7 even the subjective symptoms of back pain had disappeared. There never having been any evidence of other than purely subjective symptoms, there is no reason to doubt, and every reason to accept, Respondent's reasons for having had a deep-seated suspicion that (the alleged discriminatee) was indeed attempting to circumvent Respondent's policy against 'summer leaves" (id. at 95). A panel majority, however, sustained the administrative law judge's conclusion that the company's asserted reason was a pretext (id.). In the case at bar, warrant for a finding of pretext is measurably stronger than in Fasco, because of the many factors cited above, and because Hampton, unlike the discriminatee in Fasco, gave testimony in a Board hearing in addition to his union activities.

For these reasons, I find that Respondent discriminatorily discharged Hampton on March 18, 1980, because of his union activities and his prior testimony in a Board hearing, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

In accordance with my findings above, and upon consideration of the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Ducane Heating Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discriminatorily suspending Randolph McCrea for 3 days beginning September 7, 1979, and for 5 days beginning September 28, 1979; and by discriminatorily discharging Betty G. Robinson on November 7, 1979, Randolph McCrea on February 29, 1980, and Larry Hampton on March 18, 1980, and by thereafter failing and refusing to reinstate them, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

4. The foregoing unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. It having been found that Respondent unlawfully suspended Randolph McCrea for 3 days beginning September 7, 1979, and for 5 days beginning September 28, 1979; and unlawfully discharged Betty G. Robinson on November 7, 1979, Randolph McCrea on February 29, 1980, and Larry Hampton on March 18, 1980, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to offer the foregoing employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing if necessary any employee hired on or since November 7, 1979, to fill any said position, and to make said foregoing employees whole for any loss of earnings any of them may have suffered by reason of Respondent's acts herein described, by payment to each of them a sum of money equal to the amount he or she would have earned from the date of his or her unlawful discharge to the date of an offer of reinstatement, including in the case of McCrea the period of his aforesaid unlawful suspensions, less net earnings during such period, with interest thereon to be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner established by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[46]

I further conclude that Respondent's unfair labor practices found herein, engaged in concurrently with and following its unfair labor practices established in the last proceeding, demonstrate a proclivity to violate the Act. Thus, the record shows that Respondent has additionally violated the Act by two discriminatory suspensions and three discriminatory discharges, with practices including questionable bookkeeping, layoffs for dubious reasons, a propensity to seize upon the work-related injury of employees for discriminatory purposes, and a panoply of pretexts. Accordingly, I shall recommend a broad order.

Respondent will also be required to post an appropriate notice.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[47]

ORDER

The Respondent, Ducane Heating Corporation, Blackville, South Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, by unlawfully discharging or suspending any of its employees, or discriminating against them in any other manner with respect to their hire or tenure of employment, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

(b) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because they have given testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Randolph McCrea, Betty G. Robinson, and Larry Hampton immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his or her seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any employee hired to replace any of them, and make them whole for any loss of pay any of them may have suffered by reason of Respondent's unlawful discharge or suspension of him or her, in accordance with the recommendations set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its plant in Blackville, South Carolina, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[48] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

14 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 11 February 1983 Administrative Law Judge Harold Bernard Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

The judge found that the Respondent's subcontracting of installation work orders received in September 1981, without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. We disagree.

The record shows that in September 1981 the Respondent completed installing a satellite disc that added eight new channels to the services offered to customers. As a result the Respondent experienced an unusually large influx of installation work orders. Rather than hire more unit employees, the Respondent decided to subcontract the additional installation work. Based on our decision in Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984), we find that the Respondent's decision to handle the increased workload affected the scope of the business and was not a bargainable item. We therefore dismiss the 8(a)(5) portion of the complaint.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified and set out in full below and orders that the Respondent, Ausable Communications, Inc., Plattsburgh, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees that their work will be subcontracted out and that there would be layoffs because of employees' support for the Union.

(b) Promising employees better employment benefits in order to discourage them from supporting the Union.

(c) Threatening employees with a loss of seniority, company stock benefits, and other employment benefits as well as job reclassification because employees supported the Union.

(d) Informing employees that employees were laid off for engaging in union activities.

(e) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities.

(f) Creating the impression that employees' union activities were being kept under surveillance.

(g) Informing employees that the Respondent would never settle on a contract with the Union.

(h) Subcontracting out construction work in order to discriminate against employees because of their activities in support of the Union.

(i) Discriminating against employees by laying them off for their activities in support of the Union.

(j) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Michael Minnie, David Gladue, and Thomas Nephew whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the section of the judge's decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports,

[1] In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent knew of employee union activity, we do not rely on his inference (based on the fact that most employees attended a union meeting) inasmuch as the record contains sufficient direct evidence of employer knowledge.

In the section of his decision entitled "Promise of Benefits," the judge's spot-cite to Jamaica Towing is incorrect. The correct citation is 236 NLRB 1700, 1700–1701 (1978).

Finally, in adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent, through Supervisor Art Caron, violated Sec. 8(a)(1), we find it unnecessary to rely on Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., 228 NLRB 440 (1977).

[2] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's inadvertent failure to provide appropriate cease-and-desist language for his finding that the Respondent discriminatorily laid off employees. We find merit in the exception and modify the recommended Order accordingly.

We also modify the recommended Order so as to require the Respondent to expunge from its files any reference to the unlawful layoffs of employees Minnie, Gladue, and Nephew, and to notify them in writing that this has been done and evidence of the unlawful layoffs will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

Finally, we modify the recommended Order to make clear that the restoration order applies to work discriminatorily subcontracted and does not require undoing construction work already completed.

[3] Member Dennis relies on her concurring opinion in Otis in agreeing with her colleagues that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) by unilaterally subcontracting installation work. She would find that the subcontracting decision had only "an indirect and attenuated impact on the employment relationship" and therefore fell within the definition of nonmandatory Category I decisions. 269 NLRB 891.

and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Return to the construction work subcontracting policy and practices existing prior to the subcontracting action herein found unlawful and restore to bargaining unit employees the work discriminatorily subcontracted which is uncompleted.

(d) Expunge from company files any reference to the unlawful layoffs of employees Minnie, Gladue, and Nephew, and notify them in writing that this has been done and the evidence of the unlawful layoffs will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(e) Post at its Plattsburgh, New York location copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT create the impression of engaging in surveillance of the union activities of our employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with layoffs for engaging in union activities.

WE WILL NOT inform employees that employees were laid off for engaging in union activities.

WE WILL NOT interrogate employees concerning their union activities or sympathies.

WE WILL NOT promise employees improved medical or dental programs, extra holidays based on an employee's birthday, or other improvements in employment benefits in order to discourage support for International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union #781, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT inform employees that we will never settle on a contract with the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten to subcontract work, or that employees will lose their seniority, stock benefits, or other benefits and that jobs will be reclassified to discourage employee support for the Union.

WE WILL NOT subcontract our construction work to discriminate against employees because of their union activities.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against employees by laying them off for their activities in support of the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE have already offered reinstatement to Michael Minnie, David Gladue, and Thomas Nephew and WE WILL pay them for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against them, with interest.

WE WILL return to the construction work subcontracting policy and practices existing prior to our unlawful subcontracting of construction work and restore to bargaining unit employees any such work discriminatorily subcontracted which is uncompleted.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to the unlawful layoffs of employees Minnie, Gladue, and Nephew, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful layoffs will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD BERNARD, JR., Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were tried before me in Plattsburgh, New York, on March 24 and 25, 1983, pursuant to complaint allegations that Respondent, inter alia, promised employees improved benefits, interrogated employees concerning union activities, created the impression of surveillance of employee union activities, threatened employees with reprisals, subcontracted construction work, and laid off employees David Gladue, Michael Minnie, and Thomas Nephew because of employees' union activities, thereby discriminating against employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The complaint further alleges that Respondent unilaterally subcontracted installation work on September 8, 1981, without notice to the Union, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Respondent's duly filed answer denies all allegations of conduct violating the Act.

All parties were accorded the opportunity to participate fully at the hearing, to examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, to present oral argument, and to file briefs.

On the entire record[1] in this proceeding, including my observation of the witnesses and briefs filed by counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a New York corporation located in Plattsburgh, New York, where it is engaged in operating a cable television system. Respondent annually derives gross revenues in excess of $1 million in the course of its business and annually purchases products valued in excess of $50,000, directly from points outside New York. As admitted, I find Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Admittedly, the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, and I so find.

The Appropriate Bargaining Unit

The parties agree that the following bargaining unit, for which the Union is the certified bargaining representative pursuant to certification on October 8, 1981, in Case 3–RC–8090 is appropriate:

> All employees employed by the Employer at its 68 Bridge Street, Plattsburgh, New York facility; excluding managerial employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Respondent further admits the supervisory-agency status under Section 2(11) and (13) of the Act of Manager Charles Malone and Chief "tech" Arthur Carn as alleged in the complaint, supported by the record and, accordingly, so found.

[1] The General Counsel's unopposed motion to correct minor errors in the transcript is granted.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The time frame for events is the period beginning in late summer 1980 and lasting through November 1981.

Respondent installs cable television service in several New York communities where it has secured the franchise to do so, and maintains that service, which comprises some 235 miles of cable and 23 channels with a work force numbering about 14 employees divided into 6 office clericals, 3 outside installers, 2 service technicians, 1 line technician, and 1 installer with a clerk in warehouse inventory. Manager Charles Malone, Chief Tech Art Caron, and an officer manager comprised the supervisory echelon at relevant times herein. By the time of the hearing, in addition, Respondent had moved employee Ron Depo into an admittedly supervisory position as line supervisor.

In the fall of 1980, the above employees were not yet represented, there having been a Board election the previous June in which a majority cast votes against representation.

The record demonstrates that in the summer and fall of 1980 Respondent was engaged in a large amount of work, renewing franchises, making bids, purchasing new equipment, including a construction trailer, supplies, and hiring employees for anticipated stepped-up needs arising from rebuilding a system in Plattsburgh, and building up a system in the Cumberland Head project. Both employees Michael Minnie and David Gladue were informed by Respondent when hired that there was a "lot of work" to be done. Respondent's Exhibit 11 clearly indicates that the workload, in fact, reached new highs in this period, August through January 1981, as the number of backlogged customer orders for installations, disconnects, and service calls mounted.

In addition, the record shows that Respondent (which had, in the past 4 years, performed construction work—involving digging with its own equipment and the like—such as setting up and framing poles and laying cable with its own employees as well as outside contractors) "formed" a construction crew in January 1981. This crew, up until the events noted below, engaged in construction work according to undisputed employee testimony, as well as Respondent's own business records.[2]

B. Employee Union Activity

Following an earlier discussion between service tech Russell Caron and installer David Gladue 2 weeks before about getting together to discuss employment matters, all the shop employees met at Russell Caron's home in early March, where they discussed the need for help in securing better pay and benefits and clarification concerning their job classifications. The employees decided to contact a union representative for such purpose. On March 17 a meeting was held pursuant to such decision, at 7 p.m., at the Union's hall on North Beacon Street, attended by all shop employees except one, four office clerical employees, and two union representatives. During the course of the 2-hour-long meeting, there was discussion concerning the benefits available to employees from union representation. All the shop employees there signed cards authorizing the Union to be their representative for purposes of collective bargaining with the Respondent.

[2] In fact, it is instructive to note that Respondent's employees performed in-house construction work in the years 1981, 1979, 1978, and 1977.

C. Respondent's Knowledge Concerning Employee Activities

As shall further appear, there is no question that the employees' union activity became quickly known to Respondent. The fact that the entire work force—except one employee—attended the March 17 meeting above warrants such a conclusion. In addition, the Union sent Respondent, by letter dated March 24, notice that:

> The employees of Ausable Communications, Inc., have selected the I.B.E.W. as their bargaining representative. A petition for recognition will be filed at the appropriate time.

The letter was received by Respondent on March 25. Events on the following day, March 26, further sharply illustrate Respondent's knowledge in this regard.

D. Respondent's Animus

On that day, March 26, employees Michael Minnie, David Gladue, Russell Caron, and Ron Depo—who later became an admitted supervisor by the time of this hearing—were working at the North County Shopping Center when Respondent's chief tech and admitted supervisor Art Caron approached the group while employees were clearing out rocks and cleaning up the area. Minnie testified that Art Caron asked, "Who is going to be your shop steward?" David Gladue testified that, when no one replied, Caron pressed further with his questioning and stated, "Come on, we know all about it." When Minnie professed ignorance, Caron replied that he and the Company were both aware of all the union meetings that had been taking place and that he knew who the ringleader was because an employee who attended the meeting had handed in a four-page report to Caron and Malone listing the names of those who attended the meeting, and describing what had been said and what had taken place. As an acknowledged supervisor, and second in command, Caron's knowledge was, in addition to the other factors showing Respondent had knowledge of employee union activities, further proof in such regard. Bartenders Local 19, 240 NLRB 240, 246 (1979), enfd. 636 F.2d 1227 (9th Cir. 1980). Minnie testified further that Caron turned to Ron Depo and Russell Caron and said it would hurt them more (than Minnie and Gladue, only hired recently) because they would lose their stocks with the Company, their seniority would be thrown out the window, everyone would be reclassified, and the construction crew would be done away with as construction work would be contracted out. Minnie recalled that Caron stated employees would lose their benefits and would be working without a contract because the Company would not settle on a contract.

During the 45 minutes involved in the discussion, employee David Gladue recalls Caron admonishing employees, stating, "Come on you guys, all you're doing is doing yourselves in," and that Caron continued by saying, "I've been with this Company for quite a few years and I know the way they operate—they'll never settle [a contract] with you. What's going to happen is that they will lay off people, and they'll reassign your job position. You'll lose your seniority." When Caron also stated that Depo and Russell Caron would lose their stocks and was told by an employee that such stocks could not be taken away, he stated they would lose their rights to acquire company stock in the future. Gladue further corroborates Minnie's account of Caron's reference to construction work recalling that Art Caron stated, "Since we were going union, they [the Company] would probably contract out all the work and get rid of a few people." Russell Caron testified:

> He [Art Caron] told us it was going to be very rough on us if we tried to go union because the company was anti-union and he was against the union himself. Because he said if the union gets in there's going to be a lot of people going down the road. Including probably myself. And he said it would include losing stocks for people who had been there a long time, I didn't have any. So I didn't have any stocks to lose. But he said they'd lose stocks, benefits and seniority. And that they were going to contract the construction out. To subcontractors.

Although Ron Depo (by the time of the hearing a supervisor) testified on behalf of the Respondent and was present during the alleged statements by Art Caron, he was not questioned by Respondent as to these statements; nor was Art Caron, Respondent's then second in command and the person reported to have made the statements called by Respondent to testify. Both factors warrant the conclusion that such testimony would not be contrary to the testimony of Minnie and Gladue, whose accounts were further corroborated by the testimony given by Russell Caron at this hearing. Considering such facts, as well as the credibly tendered and completely uncontradicted testimony, it is concluded that on March 26, the day after Respondent received the Union's letter informing it that employees had designated the Union as their bargaining representative and that a petition for "recognition [sic]" would be filed, Respondent, through Art Caron, unlawfully interrogated employees concerning their union activities—(viz, the selection of a shop steward); unlawfully created the impression that the union activities of employees were being kept under close surveillance by Respondent (a conclusion based upon Caron's reference to a four-page report on employee activities being in Respondent's hands and that Respondent knew all about the union meetings and what took place there); and unlawfully threatened employees with a loss of stock ownership, job reclassification, loss of seniority and other benefits, subcontracting of construction work, and layoffs and that Respondent would refuse to bargain in good faith with the Union so that employees would not be working under a collective-bargaining agreement even if they did select the Union as bargaining representative. By such conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in the described respects. El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468, 471 (1978) (employer told employees he would not sign a contract); Computer Sciences Corp., 236 NLRB 266 (1978) (employer telling employees he would never negotiate contract with union); Brodart, Inc., 257 NLRB 380 (1981) (employer found to have unlawfully created impression of surveillance by telling employees he knew they were attending union meetings); see also to the same effects, E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 257 NLRB 139 (1981); Major Cab Co., 255 NLRB 1383 (1981) (unlawful interrogation where employer asked employees whether or not they had started union activities); Holly Manor Nursing Home, 235 NLRB 426 (1978) (unlawful interrogation to question employee as to who was on bargaining committee); Hendricks County Rural Electric Membership Corp., 236 NLRB 1616 (1978) (interrogation of employees as to identity of hardcore union advocates found unlawful); Jays Foods, 228 NLRB 423 (threat to subcontract if employees persisted in union activities found unlawful); Meyer Jewelry Co., 230 NLRB 944 (1977) (threatened loss of profit-sharing benefits if union came in found unlawful); Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., 228 NLRB 440 (1977) (foreman's statement to employee friend they would both be jobless if union won election held unlawful); and Anchorage Times Publishing Co., 237 NLRB 544, 551 (1978) (threats of layoffs and subcontracting if union became employees' bargaining representative).

Shortly afterward, placed by employee Gladue as 2 or 3 days later, and on April 1 by Minnie, Art Caron told employees coming in from work that two or three employees would be laid off, again stating that all construction work was going to be contracted out. Gladue testified without contradiction that Caron gave as the reason, "Since you guys petitioned for a union there's going to be a layoff."

E. The Layoffs

On April 3 Minnie and Gladue returned to the shop for lunch and were told to report to Manager Malone's office at 3 p.m. They had been told earlier that morning by Art Caron that there was no longer a construction crew and that construction work was being contracted out. Wanting to know more about why Malone wanted to see him, Minnie went to Art Caron and asked whether there was, in fact, to be a layoff. Caron told Minnie that when Miami (Respondent's home office is located in Miami) heard about the union talk and the union meetings, they wanted to fire his brother Russell Caron because he was the ringleader. Caron continued, according to Minnie, by saying, inter alia that "[he] said that at one time they were thinking about firing the whole construction crew" which consisted of Minnie, Gladue, Russell Caron, and Ron Depo.

In any event, when Gladue and Minnie reported to Malone, they were informed that they were laid off due to lack of work. Employee Thomas Nephew was also laid off that same afternoon and was given the reason that construction work was going to be "farmed out." As Nephew was cleaning out his truck and securing his personal belongings, Art Caron approached him and said:

> I told everybody a long time ago, he said, not to start organizing a union this early. Simply because there were going to be people who would get hurt by it. Certain people are going to go down the road. Don't feel too bad [he said] I'll probably be the next one. Along with a few others.

Based upon the foregoing, it is found that on April 1 Respondent, through Art Caron, further threatened employees with layoff due to their union activities, and that, on April 3, Respondent, through Caron, attributed the cause of employee layoffs in a conversation with Nephew to their union activities, in further violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Home Lumber & Supply Co., 237 NLRB 322, 325 (1978).

F. The Alleged Cause for Layoffs

Respondent alleges that the layoffs of Gladue, Minnie, and Nephew were caused by a long-established company policy against performing construction work with its own employees and that it did not learn about Arthur Caron's construction crew doing such work until March 31 at which time, during a conversation with the company vice president, Malone testified, "[I]t came out through me or Arthur Caron that I had some employees on payroll doing some construction work." Later, on April 3, during a conference telephone call with Miami officials, Malone testified the decision was made to let three of the least senior employees go as a result of the policy-dictated decision to cease construction work with company employees and subcontract it out.

Analysis Concerning the Layoffs

Respondent's defense for laying off the three employees is not supported by the record. To begin with, Malone testified he did not know Art Caron's crew was doing construction work prior to March 31, but he also testified that during the meeting with the company vice president on March 31, it came out for the first time either through him or Art Caron that such work was being done. The only way it could have come out through either Malone or Caron that such was happening is if Malone did know about it beforehand. In addition, there is abundant evidence in this record tending to establish that Malone knew construction work was, in fact, being done. As first in command of overall operations, it is reasonable to infer Malone knew what work was being performed. In fact, under examination, Malone admitted that his supervisors informed him concerning the work being done. Malone's duties, according to his own testimony, included overseeing the billing for work performed by all employees and this would have included billing for the construction work being performed by Respondent in the Cumberland Head project. In addition, there is undenied employee testimony in the record that

Malone gave employees instruction on using the construction trailer while employees were loading cable prior to leaving for work at the Cumberland Head project, which job involved, as well known, construction work. It is readily apparent that Respondent knew that construction work was being performed all along. The only reason it advanced so frivolous a basis for the layoffs, as described above, on the heels of employee union activities was to cloak the only basis appearing in the record for such action and that is to discourage employees from supporting the Union. Moreover, Respondent failed to explain why such precipitous action as immediate layoffs was warranted against satisfactory workers who could have remained on call that weekend, and beyond, to complete what the record shows was at least enough work to warrant retention beyond April 3. It is well established that unsupported reasons for employee terminations under such circumstances, including employee union activity, employer knowledge, and union animus, especially when coupled with clear violations of employee rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act, all occurring at the advent of employee efforts to seek union representation, provide the basis to infer an unlawful motive under the Act. C & D Transfer, 258 NLRB 586 (1981); Burk Bros. v. NLRB, 117 F.2d 686, 687 (3d Cir. 1941); A. J. Krajewski Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 413 F.2d 673, 675–676 (1st Cir. 1969); and Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966). Furthermore, it follows from the foregoing that, in order to carry out the unlawfully designed layoffs, Respondent, the record shows, subcontracted the construction work formerly performed by its employees to other companies, as treated further below.

Respondent's motives for subcontracting the construction work and laying off three employees are further confirmed by the testimony credibly offered by employees at this hearing, who uniformly described the repeated threats communicated to them by Respondent's second in command, Arthur Caron, that Respondent intended to subcontract the work involved and lay off employees because employees had filed a petition seeking union representation. Caron was in overall charge of all outside work and there can be no doubt that, when Caron informed Nephew after the layoffs that his earlier predictions of layoffs had come true, any question concerning Respondent's proven motive for the layoffs was put to rest.

Respondent, during the course of this proceeding, and in brief, suggested that Arthur Caron actually favored the Union and, further, implied that the testimony of Gladue, Minnie, and Nephew bore the taint of self-interest attributable to alleged discriminatees in Board proceedings so that their testimony, as well as the statements attributed to Arthur Caron, who was discharged by Respondent following the layoffs, is not reliable. I consider Respondent's contentions wholly without merit because the fact that a witness is an interested party in litigation standing alone does not and should not invite disbelief as to such testimony and, further, because none of these three witnesses displayed any lack of credibility during their testimony on any central issue in this case. Regarding Respondent's contention that Caron was actually in favor of having a union it must be concluded that, assuming arguendo this to be true he must, it follows, have been reflecting Respondent's motives, apart from his own, when he ascribed the layoffs and subcontracting as Respondent's retaliation for the employees' union activities. Accordingly, were I to conclude—which I do not—that Respondent had established this unsupported allegation, it would not lend support to the defense raised in this case.

Finally, I note that Supervisor Ron Depo, who was present during the threats made by Arthur Caron and who was called to testify as a witness for Respondent, did not testify in contradiction of the accounts rendered by Nephew, Minnie, and Gladue. For these additional reasons, as well, i.e., the admissions by Respondent's second in command as reported by employee witnesses, and undenied by Supervisor Depo, I find that the General Counsel has proven by a clear preponderance of the evidence that Respondent laid off the three employees and subcontracted the construction work in retaliation for employees' efforts seeking union representation thereby discriminating against employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Valley Oil Co., 210 NLRB 370 (1974); see also Herman Bros. v. NLRB, 658 F.2d 201, 210 (3d Cir. 1981), quoting NLRB v. Ferguson, 257 F.2d 88, 89 (5th Cir. 1958).

G. Promise of Benefits

The Union filed a representation petition on May 12, which eventually led to an election being scheduled on June 18. About 2 weeks beforehand, Respondent's vice president of personnel Richard Vura, an admitted agent of Respondent, conducted a meeting of all Respondent's employees at the company office building, lasting about 2 hours. During the meeting, according to the testimony of employees Kenneth Bashnew and Russell Caron, Vura told employees that the Company was against unions and definitely did not want one. He also showed two films to employees, one concerning the Company's expansion into new fields, and the other, a film depicting "roughhouse" employee tactics used trying to get a union in a plant.

According to Russell Caron, Vura told employees he knew that there were a few problems employees had with the Company but that he felt "we" could work them out. Vura then stated that the Company was looking into trying to get a better medical benefit plan, a better dental deductible, and another holiday based on the employee's birthday. Bashnew corroborates Caron's account, recalling Vura talking about a reduced deductible or doing away with it as "not really fair" and possibly adding an additional holiday. Vura was not called to deny the employee accounts or explain why, at the advent of a pending election, employees were promised improved employment conditions and new benefits—or even to deny the complaint allegation that such promises were unlawfully motivated. Absent any such explanation or denial, and given the undenied testimony, it is concluded that Respondent announced its intention to improve employment conditions and promised such new benefits as part of an ongoing pattern of preceding conduct herein found unlawful in order to discourage employee support for the Union in the shortly forthcoming election, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Jamaica Towing, 236 NLRB 1700, 1705 (1978), and Harvey's Resort Hotel, 236 NLRB 1670 (1978)

H. Unilateral Subcontracting of Installation Work

It is undisputed that between the date of the election, June 18, and certification of the Union as collective-bargaining representative, on October 8, Respondent subcontracted installation work usually performed by bargaining unit employees to other companies in September, without prior notice to the Union.[3] Although the Union's official certification as bargaining representative between June and October was still pending due to election results involving the resolution of challenged ballots, Respondent made such unilateral changes (viz, the subcontracting of bargaining unit work) under the legally established risk that if the Union were to become certified, such changes would be in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Mike O' Connor Chevrolet Co., 209 NLRB 701, 703 (1974), revd. on other grounds 512 F.2d 684 (8th Cir. 1975). As noted therein:

> Such changes have the effect of bypassing, undercutting, and undermining the union's status as the statutory representative of the employees in the event a certification is issued. To hold otherwise would allow an employer to box the union in on future bargaining positions by implementing changes of policy and practice during the period when objections or determinative challenges to the election are pending.

It is clear from the record that the installation work subcontracted out by Respondent was, in the past, performed by unit employees. Moreover, it is plain that unit employees, had the work not been contracted out, could have benefited by the increase in such which Respondent advanced as the necessity behind its decision to subcontract, say, by working overtime at increased pay rates, the hiring by Respondent of additional unit employees thereby enhancing the seniority status of present employees, their employment longevity, and the like, had Respondent fulfilled its duty under law and contacted the Union beforehand with notice of its intentions. It is, moreover, quite clear that a mere increase in orders for installation work—one of Respondent's established services—would in no way act to prevent Respondent from according the Union such notice. Further, even assuming, as argued by Respondent on brief, that an increase in orders for installations constituted a valid economic basis for its action, it is well established that subcontracting pursuant to alleged economic reasons but without notice to the Union and an opportunity to bargain about the subject nevertheless violates the Act. ACF Industries, 234 NLRB 1063 (1977); Appalachian Construction, 235 NLRB 685 (1978); Ramos Iron Works, 234 NLRB 896 (1978); Equitable Gas Co., 245 NLRB 260 (1979); Pay 'N Save Corp., 210 NLRB 311 (1974); and see also Madison South Convalescent Center, 260 NLRB 816 (1982). I therefore conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally subcontracting installation work in September without notice to the Union.

[3] In view thereof, it is unneccesary to decide whether portions of a telephone conversation regarding settlement of this matter are admissible to prove a violation.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section II, above, and found to constitute unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, occurring in connection with Respondent's business operations as set forth in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and is the exclusive certified collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate bargaining unit as described above in section I within the meaning of the Act.
3. By engaging in the conduct described in section II, above, Respondent engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
4. By subcontracting all construction work and laying off employees Michael Minnie, David Gladue, and Thomas Nephew, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.
5. By unilaterally subcontracting installation work, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in the unfair labor practices set forth above, I will recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist thereform and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent discriminatorily laid off employees Minnie, Gladue, and Nephew on April 3, 1981, but, as conceded by the General Counsel, that Respondent has already offered them reinstatement, it shall be recommended that Respondent be ordered to make them whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discriminatory actions by payment to them of a sum equal to that which they would have normally received as wages from the date of their termination until Respondent offered them reinstatement, less any net earnings in the interim. Backpay, with interest, is to be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651

(1977).[4] I will also recommend that Respondent be ordered to make available to the Board, on request, payroll and other records in order to facilitate checking the amount of backpay due them and other rights they may be entitled to receive.

Regarding the unlawful subcontracting of construction work, it shall be recommended that Respondent be ordered to return to its former subcontracting policies existing prior to the discriminatory subcontracting of construction work at which time it unlawfully increased the amount of such subcontracting to include work previously performed by unit employees and to resume said operations and restore to such employees said work. Regarding the unlawful subcontracting of installation work, it shall be recommended that Respondent be ordered to restore all such work to the unit until it accords the Union an opportunity to bargain with it over such decision and its effects and otherwise fulfill its bargaining duties under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[5]

A broad remedial order will be recommended due to the serious character and widespread scope in Respondent's unfair labor practices to better assure employees their rights as guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 28 June 1983 Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached decision. Counsel for the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the administrative law judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by, inter alia, a refusal to supply information to the Union pursuant to a 2 December written request. Respondent's answer specifically denies the allegation and avers that "indeed Respondent has scheduled a number of meetings at the request of the Charging Party to present said information to it, which scheduled meetings without notice were not attended by the Charging Party and, subsequently, the Respondent, by Certified Mail, addressed the matters requested by the Charging Party which it was capable of so addressing." We find that the General Counsel has failed to prove this allegation because no testimony was adduced at the hearing to rebut Respondent's averment that it did not agree to supply the requested information. We further note in adopting the administrative law judge's conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to supply information requested by Union Representative Sharon Davies on 2 September 1982, that no allegation concerning this information request is contained in either the complaint or the amended complaint.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing was conducted in Detroit on June 20–21, 1983, on a complaint issued March 30, 1983, alleging principally the unlawful termination of five clerical employees and the contracting out of their bargaining unit work on or about September 1, 1982, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (5), following expiration of their labor agreement 5 months earlier.

The principal issue is whether Respondent satisfied its bargaining obligation.

All parties having waived their right to file posthearing briefs and having made closing arguments on the record, I hereby make the following findings of fact and conclusions of law, based on the record evidence as a whole, as credited.

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer subject to the Act and that Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

Respondent is a specialty carrier with executive offices and terminal in Dearborn and terminals in four other locations in Michigan and Ohio. For many years, its more than 100 drivers have been represented by various Teamsters locals; its five clerical employees in Dearborn by another Teamsters local; and its mechanics by the Machinists. There is no evidence of antiunion sentiment on Respondent's part.

The five office workers, who perform all billing and payroll functions, have been covered by contract since the 1950s, when Respondent agreed to recognize the Teamsters who were seeking to organize the office workers of all specialty carriers in the area. In fact, by 1980, Respondent was the only specialty hauler whose clericals were under contract and its office costs greatly exceeded those of its competitors. Its labor costs in 1982 were in excess of $31,000 per annum per office worker, based on an hourly rate of $11.30 plus benefits and taxes. By 1982, Respondent was in dire financial straits, a condition admittedly recognized by the Union. Between 1979 and 1982, its net worth declined at an alarming rate, from $271,406 to a deficit of ($1,734,608), its revenues declined from $19 million to $14 million and its losses increased from ($203,355) to ($368,610).

Faced with this financial crisis, Respondent, as provided in the office clerks' labor agreement, gave notice of intent to terminate that contract on its March 31, 1982 expiration date. One year earlier, in March 1981, it had obtained an agreement from its five clericals to forgo for 1 year scheduled wage increases under the contract.[1]

In the spring of 1982, a new contract for office clerks was negotiated between the Teamsters Central-States Negotiating Committee and the appropriate employers' association (of which Respondent was not a member), calling for yet higher hourly rates for office clerks. Faced with mounting losses, a need to curb office expenses (its own executives had taken salary cuts) and an inability to purchase needed state-of-the-art data processing equipment, Respondent, through its attorney, David Jerome, initiated discussions with the Union in June 1982, concerning a new office workers contract generally and, more specifically, wage concessions and other alternatives.

[1] The credible evidence is that, while it dealt directly with the employees and their steward, Respondent did advise them to consult with their union representative. Apparently they did not do so. No unfair labor practice charge was filed then or later. A grievance was delivered to the Union by the employees in the summer of 1982, but was dropped by the Union.

The credible—and largely undisputed—evidence establishes that on June 29 Jerome met with local union administrative assistant Barnett, a veteran union official whose position placed him over that of the several business agents, at the local union offices. Jerome reviewed Respondent's financial problems (which were acknowledged by Barnett as well known) and the history of the Teamsters organization of office workers (which left Respondent as the only specialty carrier whose office clerks were organized); he asked for a deviation from the new $12 hourly rate for office workers which had just recently been negotiated; he told Barnett that, without a deviation, Respondent would have to contract out the unit work; and he asked Barnett, with whom he had many dealings in the past on special problems beyond the authority of a business agent, what Respondent could do. Barnett replied that there could be no deviation from the newly negotiated contract for office workers (i.e., no "white paper contract"), particularly since it was an election year; that Respondent could transfer jurisdiction over its Dearborn units to another Teamsters local which did not cover office workers (a "proposal" made in a joking manner); that he "knew" Respondent had to contract out the office work, as was already being done by other carriers; that he could give no guarantees or assurances about strike activity that might follow; and that the Company should "play the game" so that it looks good. Jerome already knew of the "unwavering" Teamsters policy of permitting no deviations from new contract terms.

Following this meeting, Respondent began to negotiate with data processing contractors and, on July 30, entered into a cost-plus contract (based on hourly clerical rates of $4.50) with an independent contractor to perform the work then being performed by the five-employee office unit. The contract was executory, in the sense that no services were to be performed until equipment was obtained by the contractor and work was transferred to it by the company. In fact, no work under that contract was performed until early September 1982, after termination of the five employees on or about September 1.

In late July, Business Agent Fistler, unaware of the earlier discussion between Barnett and Jerome, telephoned Jerome with a request for bargaining over a new office workers contract. Jerome told Fistler to speak with Barnett, so that he might get the "full story" from Barnett of their previous meeting.

On August 10, Jerome and Fistler privately met in the former's law office immediately prior to a scheduled meeting to be attended by the company president and the union steward, Shirley Benitez. Fistler confidentially told Jerome that he had spoken with Barnett, that he understood a contract could not be agreed on and that "we'll go through the motions only, for the benefit of the employees." The two then met in the conference room with the company president and Benitez to "negotiate" a new contract. There was no discussion of any employee grievance over the "give backs" of 1981. Jerome recited the Company's position concerning its inability to pay more than a $6 hourly rate for office workers and its ability to get comparable work outside for even less than that. Fistler stated that it was the master contract and "nothing else." No mention was made of the Company's decision to contract out the work. The parties agreed to "check out some things" (relating to mechanics in another unit) and to "meet again." Fistler never requested another meeting and, on August 31, 1982, was replaced by Business Agent Davie.

In the meantime, by letter dated August 26, Jerome advised Fistler that the office work would be contracted out and the five employees laid off on or about September 1. Davie responded in writing and by telephone, objecting to the contracting out of the work and requested a delay of the layoffs until the end of the week, which was agreed to.

On September 2, Jerome and the company president met with Davie and Barnett. Davie, who admittedly had not been advised by her local union superiors or her predecessor that the labor contract had been lawfully terminated by the Company months before, testified that there was no discussion of a new contract, only one relating to the reason for the layoffs. Jerome testified, credibly, that Davie's request for the name of the contractor was denied and that she asked if anything could be done. Jerome replied that the Union could sign a contract with a $6 hourly rate for office workers. All present considered this remark as an attempt at levity, since it was understood by all, based on the earlier discussions, that the Union could not agree to such a deviation and that each had to play out their parts for the "benefit" of the employees.

Several months later, on December 2, the Union requested information for bargaining. The request was denied.

Throughout, I have credited the testimony of Attorney Jerome, an experienced member of the labor bar generally and, more particularly, an experienced negotiator with Teamsters local unions. His testimony, based on my observation of demeanor on the stand, was clear, candid, and convincing. Moreover, his testimony as to contract negotiations with Union Representatives Barnett and Fistler and as to Teamsters policy against deviations from new contract terms stands unrefuted. Barnett, seriously ill, was not called. Fistler, working in the Detroit area, was not called either by the General Counsel or the Charging Party. Steward Benitez, despite her more than 20 years as steward, demonstrated little knowledge of contract administration and apparently had little or no contact with union officials. As a witness, she was confused and claimed a lack of knowledge that the contract had been terminated and that the employees' grievance over "give backs" had been dropped by the Union. Current Business Agent Davie admittedly did not participate in any of the relevant negotiations and had not been briefed by her predecessor as to those negotiations.

The General Counsel's contentions are twofold: one, that the contracting out of bargaining unit work and the termination of all five bargaining unit employees was retaliatory and unlawful under Section 8(a)(3) in that it was in response to the employees' demand for increased wages and return of "give backs" in 1981; the other, that Respondent's actions were taken without the requisite bargaining.

Neither finds factual support in this record.

As to the former, there simply is nothing in this record to suggest antiunion sentiment on the part of this employer or any retaliatory motive. Respondent's long-standing relationship with the Teamsters and Machinists is uncontroverted and there is no history of union animus. Counsel simply confuses a management decision following unsuccessful bargaining over wage rates with an unlawful motive. This allegation must be dismissed.

As to the bargaining issue, the record evidence (almost entirely uncontroverted) establishes a number of critical facts: on June 29 the parties met and reached impasse over hourly rates for office workers; on June 29 the Union acknowledged that the Respondent would have to contract out the work, as already was being done by other carriers; and on June 29 the Union acknowledged that, for cosmetic purposes only (i.e., for the benefit of the five employees in the unit), it would have to go through the motions of further bargaining.

That Respondent participated with the Union in this charade by conducting a "negotiating session" on August 10 does nothing to alter the irrefutable fact—admitted at the time by union representatives responsible for this unit—that agreement on a new contract was an impossibility. That the current business agent was unaware of the negotiating activities of her predecessor and superior similarly cannot undo those actions or reverse their legal and factual effect. That the Company did not specifically inform the steward on August 10 of its decision to contract out the work cannot alter the fact that the Union already knew the Company would have to contract out the work and the reasons for that decision.

Once impasse in fact is reached, the law imposes no obligation on an employer to continue as a participant in showcase meetings which a union may, for whatever reasons, deem essential for the pacification of certain of its members. Here, the Union approached the bargaining table in June with a fixed, inflexible position—the master contract with its $31,000 price tag per office worker per year or subcontracting, with the attendant risk of strike activity. Without reading any further between the lines, I note that no strike activity ensued and I have to conclude that this Union recognized the impossibility of its bargaining posture as to these office workers, given the economic climate which threatened the security of other of its members in the trucking industry.

Respondent having satisfied, as a matter of fact, its bargaining obligation, this allegation and the one relating to information is dismissed.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

It is ordered and directed that the complaint be dismissed.

Case 15-CA-8213

14 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 17 September 1982 Administrative Law Judge Philip P. McLeod issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a memorandum in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The Respondent admittedly discharged William Hicks because he was involved in union activity; the only issue is whether Hicks was an employee within the meaning of the Act or a supervisor. We find that he was a supervisor, and accordingly we will dismiss the complaint.

Hicks was "Evening Coordinator" in the Respondent's operating room, a position equivalent in the Respondent's organization to assistant head nurse; from 5:30 to 11 p.m. each day, he was the person of highest authority assigned to the operating room on a full-time basis. Above Hicks in the hospital hierarchy, only the house supervisor was present in the hospital, and she was responsible for the Respondent's entire division of nursing services, with 400 beds, in which the operating room was only 1 of 24 units. By Hicks' admission, the house supervisor stopped in the operating room on her rounds no more than twice in an evening, for no more than 10 or 15 minutes altogether; in essence, Hicks testified, she might stop to chat over a cup of coffee. The General Counsel's witnesses maintained that Hicks would consult with higher supervision if a "serious" problem arose, but the only examples of such problems they were able to cite involved conflicts between the operating room and other departments. Thus Hicks was effectively in charge of the 15 evening shift employees in the operating room; this alone is strong evidence that he was a supervisor.[2]

The evening coordinator also scheduled any surgery called in during the evening shift, and assigned employees—both professional and technical—to it. In assigning employees, Hicks needed to assess their skills and to consider their preferences and availability, thus exercising independent judgment in the interest of the Respondent. While Hicks testified that other registered nurses sometimes substituted for him, he also admitted that this generally occurred when a nurse was feeling ill indicating that this did not happen regularly. Although the judge found that Hicks regularly assigned work, he minimized the significance of Hicks' authority because it only occupied 10 to 15 percent of Hicks' time. We view the amount of time spent as substantial especially considering that this authority is regularly exercised.[3]

The record demonstrates that Hicks, as evening coordinator, had substantial influence in the evaluation of other employees. We note the written evaluations of two employees in the record, including recommendations for salary increases; while the record does not show that those recommendations were adopted ultimately, it is nonetheless significant that Hicks' opinion was sought. The same is true of the "assessment" of a part-time registered nurse: that Hicks made only positive comments about this employee does not detract from the evidence that he was in a position to affect the employee's status.[4] We note that Hicks not only completed the evaluation forms in each case but discussed them with the affected employees before submitting the evaluations to higher supervision; this is further evidence that Hicks performed as a supervisor and was regarded as one. We do not see any relevance in the judge's observations that two of the employees involved were "a mere orderly and a technician completing his probationary period." Nor do we see any basis for the judge's conclusion that Hicks must not have made other evaluations because only these two were introduced. Someone who supervises lower-level employees is a supervisor, and evaluation is no less a form of supervision when it occurs at such times as completion of an employee's probationary period.

Beyond the written evaluations in evidence, the record shows that Hicks had continuing oral input into the evaluation of evening shift employees. While the judge attempted to minimize the importance of this input, the Respondent's former operating room supervisor, testifying for the General Counsel and credited by the judge, admitted that she evaluated these employees with little or no direct knowledge of their ongoing performance and development, thus necessarily relying on Hicks' recommendations.

Hicks admitted that he exercised other authority over employees. For instance, he testified that, if he noticed an employee overstaying a break or not working, he would warn that employee to get back to work. Also, employees who wished to leave work early sought permission from Hicks who, in the exercise of his judgment, sometimes granted such requests and other times did not. Likewise, Hicks authorized overtime when he believed it was needed and, although he informed the operating room supervisor afterwards that overtime had been worked, the record does not show that his decisions in this regard were ever questioned.

In sum, as evening coordinator William Hicks assigned employees, evaluated their performance, and directed or authorized them in returning from breaks, leaving work early, and working overtime. That is, he had authority to assign employees, responsibly to direct them, and effectively to recommend that they be disciplined, rewarded, or promoted. Each of these responsibilities required, and Hicks exercised, independent judgment to ensure that employees carried out the Respondent's requirements of them. Moreover, during most of the evening shift the evening coordinator was the person of highest authority in the operating room; if he was not a supervisor, this crucial department of the Respondent's operation, with 15 employees, was unsupervised for about 6 hours each day—an unlikely situation. These facts establish that Hicks was a supervisor, and we need not discuss any secondary indicia of supervisory status.[5] Because Hicks was a supervisor, not an employee within the meaning of the Act, we will dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting.

I would find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging William Hicks because of his union activity. I agree with the judge, for the reasons he stated, that Hicks is an employee rather than a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

[5] We note that the judge erred in finding that Hicks had less vacation than any admitted supervisors; the record indicates that the head nurse, like Hicks, had 2 weeks of vacation.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PHILIP P. MCLEOD, Administrative Law Judge. On June 18, 1981, a charge was filed in this proceding against West Florida Hospital, Inc. (Respondent) by William M. Hicks. On July 15, 1981, a complaint and notice of hearing issued alleging that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by creating the impression of surveillance of employee union activities by telling an employee (Hicks) that Respondent was aware of his attendance at a union meeting and by terminating Hicks because of his membership in and activities on behalf of District 1199, International Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, RWDSU, AFL-CIO (the Union). In its answer to the complaint, Respondent admits all facts alleged regarding its business operation, but denies the legal conclusion that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent admitted that at all times material Barbara Thames occupied the position of director of special services, but denied the legal conclusion that Thames was a supervisor and agent of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) and (13) of the Act. In its answer, Respondent admits that about June 8, 1981, Respondent terminated Hicks, but denies it did so because of Hicks' membership in or activities on behalf of the Union. Respondent denies having engaged in any conduct which would constitute an unfair labor practice.

A trial was held before me on June 7, 1982, in Pensacola, Florida, at which all parties were represented and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. At the close of the trial, the General Counsel availed himself of the opportunity to argue orally. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent both filed briefs which have been duly considered.[1]

On the entire record in this case, and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

[1] Following receipt of briefs from both parties, Respondent filed a motion to strike the brief of the General Counsel because, at the conclusion of the trial, the General Counsel did not specifically request of the judge the opportunity to file a brief and because counsel for Respondent did not receive a copy of the brief filed by the Counsel.

In its statement in opposition to Respondent's motion, the General Counsel points out that it did attempt to serve a copy of the brief on counsel for Respondent, but that the brief was inadvertently mailed to the wrong address. Another copy of the brief was served along with the statement in opposition to Respondent's motion. Since briefs are filed simultaneously and there is no opportunity for a reply brief, I conclude that no harm has been done by the delay experienced by counsel for Respondent in receiving the brief of the General Counsel.

I also note that neither party herein specifically requested permission to file a brief with me. I inquired and was informed by counsel for Respondent that he intended to file a brief. I thereafter set a due date for the receipt of briefs. The General Counsel did not waive the right to file a brief herein, and the briefs received were timely filed by both parties. Accordingly, the briefs of both parties have been accepted by me and have been given due consideration.

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Florida corporation engaged in the operation of a hospital facility in Pensacola, Florida, where it provides nursing and health care services. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Florida.

I find that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act and an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

District 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, RWDSU, AFL-CIO is, and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Allegations and Issues

The General Counsel contends that on June 8, 1981, Respondent created the impression of surveillance of employee union activities by telling Hicks that Respondent was aware of Hicks' attendance at a union meeting. He also contends that Hicks was discharged during that same conversation for having attended the union meeting in question.

At the trial Respondent admitted having discharged Hicks because of his activities on behalf of the Union. However, it denied doing so because of any meeting Hicks attended Rather, according to Respondent, the activities on behalf of the Union which Hicks engaged in and which led to his termination were his support of the Union and his encouragement of other employees to join and support the Union.

The real issue in this case relates to Hicks' status. Respondent contends that Hicks' position with Respondent was that of a supervisor and that, as such, Hicks is not entitled to the protection of the Act. Although this affirmative defense was not raised in its answer to the complaint, the General Counsel did not claim surprise when Respondent raised this issue at the trial. The issue of Hicks' supervisory status was fully litigated, and in fact took up the greater portion of this trial. Accordingly, that issue is considered on its merits.

B. Facts Regarding Hicks' Status as a Supervisor

Respondent is a 400-bed hospital facility in Pensacola, Florida. Hicks worked for Respondent from May 1977 until his discharge on June 8, 1981. During that time, Hicks worked as a graduate registered nurse from the time he was hired in May 1977 until August 1977 when he passed the state medical board examinations and became a staff nurse. In December 1978, Hicks was promoted to the position of evening coordinator in the operating room. Hicks held this position until the time of his discharge. The duties of that position are considered at length below.

Within Respondent's hospital there are several departments, one of which is the division of nursing services headed by a person entitled "Director of Nursing Services." Below the director of nursing services are several assistant directors of nursing services, one of whom is responsible for a defined area of the hospital which includes the operating room. Below them are administrative assistants, also known as house supervisors who are responsible for the overall functioning of the shift to which they are assigned. Below house supervisors are department supervisors who, in turn, are assisted by head nurses and assistant head nurses.

The operating room supervisor, a department supervisor, is responsible for the overall supervision and operation of the operating room 24 hours a day. The operating room supervisor, hereafter called the O R supervisor, is assisted on the day shift by a head nurse and on the evening shift, which runs from 3 until 11 p.m., by the evening coordinator. At the time of his discharge, Hicks filled the position of evening coordinator.

The O R supervisor, charged with the overall supervision of the operating room, is responsible for coordinating the surgery schedule and handling all personnel-related matters. The O R supervisor works until approximately 5:30 p.m. and consequently has a normal workday which overlaps the beginning of the evening shift for about 2-1/2 hours. The O R supervisor is responsible for correlating the surgery schedules for both the day and evening shifts. The O R supervisor has authority to hire and fire employees. Neither the head nurse nor the evening coordinator possesses such authority. Even the O R supervisor would have to confer with the assistant director of nursing services before terminating an employee. In addition to correlating surgery schedules, the primary functions of the O R supervisor are to make out work schedules of employees, assign vacation times, conduct performance and merit evaluations of employees, and take disciplinary actions against employees where necessary. In addition, the O R supervisor makes budget recommendations to her superiors regarding the operating room.

As previously indicated, the O R supervisor is assisted on the day shift by a head nurse and on the evening shift by the evening coordinator. The authority and functions of the O R supervisor described above are exclusive to her and are not shared with nor exercised by either the head nurse or the evening coordinator, except as noted below. Further, while both the head nurse and evening coordinator assist the O R supervisor, their functions and authorities are also different from one another. The head nurse does not generally scrub and circulate among patients. Rather, because there are more employees assigned to the operating room on the day shift and because the operating room is generally busier during the day shift than it is on the evening shift, most of the head nurse's time is spent making work assignments to employees and providing overall direction in the department. The head nurse does conduct performance and merit evaluations of employees who work in the operating room on the day shift, including staff nurses. She participates in counseling and disciplining of employees to the extent of making recommendations to the O R supervisor. The head nurse reviews and approves the timecards of all employees below her in the operating room, including employees who work on the evening shift, and the evening coordinator himself.

There is no head nurse in the operating room on the evening shift. Rather, the operating room is under the direct supervision and control of the O R supervisor from 3 until approximately 5:30 p.m. After 5:30 p.m. the evening coordinator is the person of highest authority assigned to the operating room on a full-time basis.

Respondent points to the job description of the evening coordinator as one of the primary bases for finding that position to be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. That job description describes the specific duties of the evening coordinator in part as follows:

> In addition to the duties of the operating room staff nurse, the evening coordinator will:
> 1. Coordinate the completion of scheduled procedures which extend beyond the day shift.
> 2. Make shift assignments for evening personnel.
> . . . .
> 5. Supervise and provide guidance to all evening personnel.
> 6. Assist with counseling and guidance when needed; document and communicate outcomes.
> 7. Assist in evaluating staff members; identifying needs, recommending appropriate interventions and supporting strengths, leading toward the fulfillment and unit goals.

It is primarily these enumerated functions to which Respondent points in support of its position that the evening coordinator is a supervisor. Reliance on the job description, however, tends to beg the question. A job description prepared by management stating that the evening coordinator shall exercise supervisory functions does not establish that the evening coordinator is, in fact, a supervisor. The determination of that question turns on what functions Hicks as evening coordinator actually performed. Valley Hospital, 226 NLRB 309, 312 (1976). Respondent argues that, as evening coordinator, Hicks exercised five indicia of supervisory authority which warrant a conclusion that he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. These five indicia are: making work assignments to employees; evaluating employees; disciplining employees; granting employees time off; and, finally, the absence of other supervisors in the operating room on the evening shift.

With regard to Hicks' actual duties, the record reflects the following.

As evening coordinator, Hicks had no authority to hire or discharge, suspend or transfer, lay off, or recall, nor promote or demote employees. Hicks had no authority to alter the work schedules of employees established by the O R supervisor, and he played no part in the assignment of vacation times.

As evening coordinator, Hicks spent approximately 85 to 90 percent of his time performing routine staff nursing functions, including scrubbing and circulating cases, setting up equipment for surgical procedures, and stocking surgical supplies for the operating rooms. In addition to his base wage rate, Hicks received an hourly shift differential which was received by all employees working on the evening shift. In addition, he received 50 cents per hour more than a staff nurse for his duties as evening coordinator. Unlike the head nurse or the O R supervisor, Hicks was required like other staff nurses to make himself available on-call from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. on 5 out of every 10 workdays during which he was subject to being called back to the hospital by the house supervisor to assist physicians in emergency operations. Also, unlike the head nurse and the O R supervisor, both of whom received 3 weeks' paid vacation per year, Hicks received only 2 weeks.

As evening coordinator, Hicks correlated some of the surgery to be scheduled on the evening shift, sometimes with the help of the O R supervisor prior to her leaving in the evening and sometimes on his own. The 10 to 15 percent of Hicks' time not spent in the actual performace of routine staff nursing functions was spent primarily assigning work to other employees in the operating room on the evening shift. The record is clear that Hicks did regularly assign work to such employees and that these assignments called for the use of at least some independent judgment. I credit Hicks, however, that these assignments were routinely made on the basis of various nurses' known special skills and preferences. Thus, employees with specialized skills in these areas were routinely assigned to cardiac, neurological, and orthopedic cases. The remaining employees were then assigned to surgery cases based on their availability. Thus, most assignments were the same night after night with little variance. I also credit Hicks that if he was busy performing routine nursing functions himself, thus not behind the desk to make an assignment at a time when the need arose, other registered nurses on the shift regularly took it on themselves to make the necessary assignments.

Regarding Hicks' role in the performance evaluation of employees, Respondent introduced two evaluations of employees in which Hicks had a direct part. The first involved an orderly named Timothy Cremshaw. This evaluation was dated November 23, but undated as to the year. The evaluation was filled out by Hicks and signed by him as "RN-evening coordinator." Below Hicks' signature are also the signatures of Frances Traynon as "O.R. Supervisor" and Barbara Thames as "Director of Special Services." Prior to July 1980, Traynon was head nurse under O R supervisor Faye Lewis. In July 1980, Lewis left and Traynon took over as O R supervisor, a position she still holds. In the section of this evaluation entitled "recommendation," Hicks checked one of five available options indicating that Cremshaw should receive a salary increase. The record is silent as to whether Cremshaw, in fact, got that increase.

The second evaluation introduced by Respondent involved an operating room technician named Stephen Nichols. It is dated August 14, 1980. The front page of this evaluation indicates that it is one conducted at the end of an employee's first 90 days of employment. The evaluation is signed jointly by Traynon as "O.R. Supervisor" and by Hicks as "evening coordinator." Traynon's name appears above Hicks. Below their joint signatures, Traynon's signature appears again on the line denoted "department supervisor." Below Traynon's second signature appears the signature of Barbara Thames as "director of special services." In the "recommendations" section of this evaluation, the choice "salary increase" is also checked. Apparently to show they were effective, Respondent asked Traynon whether Hicks' recommendations for salary increases were followed. Traynon answered that they were, but failed to provide any specific instance to support her assertion and failed to mention either Nichols or Cremshaw as having received raises based on Hicks' recommendation. On cross-examination, Traynon admitted that the only recommendation she could recall was that of Nichols and that Nichols was not given the recommended wage increase.

I conclude that the evaluations of Cremshaw and Nichols were the only evaluations actually completed by Hicks for if there were others Respondent would surely have introduced them. Traynon testified that, in addition to completing these evaluations, Hicks was consulted by her before she evaluated other employees on the evening shift. Traynon asserted that she relied heavily on Hicks' reports since Traynon was not on the evening shift past 5:30 p.m. Traynon, who became rather unnerved and upset under cross-examination, struck me as a biased witness whose testimony is largely unworthy of belief. Regarding Hicks' real degree of authority, I find it significant that the two evaluations actually completed by Hicks involved a mere orderly and a technician completing his probationary period. All other employees on the shift, including nurses, were evaluated by the O R supervisor. I found the testimony of former O R Supervisor Faye Lewis, who is no longer employed by Respondent, to be much more candid and straightforward regarding Hicks' actual duties than the testimony of any of Respondent's current supervisors. I credit Lewis, and on the basis of her testimony I conclude that, while Hicks did have some input into employees' annual evaluations, it was substantially more limited than suggested by Traynon and was not independently relied upon. I believe the degree of Hicks' actual authority was well exemplified by Lewis' testimony that, if Hicks thought an employee was not performing properly, Hicks could report it to the head nurse or the O R supervisor, who would investigate the matter.

Regarding Hicks' role in assessing discipline, Respondent introduced one "behavior assessment" form completed by Hicks regarding part-time registered nurse Alphonso Vacarro dated November 5, 1980. The reason Hicks had occasion to fill out this form is not clear from the record. Hicks testified without contradiction that a "behavior assessment" form such as that introduced by Respondent is not the same as an employee reprimand. According to Hicks, a reprimand involved adverse action being taken against an employee. The evening coordinator clearly had no authority to issue reprimands. A behavior assessment, as near as I can tell from Hicks' testimony, was more in the nature of a notice to an employee that he/she was engaging in some behavior which required correction. Thus, it was more in the nature of a preliminary warning.

The behavior assessment form itself contains the following direction to the person completing it:

> Please make comments on the individual's performance in the following areas: . . . .

Twelve areas of professional and generalized skills are enumerated and listed. The lower right hand corner of the form contains a signature line which is designated "head nurse signature." As indicated, the testimony of all witnesses suggests that "behavior assessment" forms of this type play some role in the discipline of employees. The remarks of Hicks, however, on the form in question are all positive comments such as "good," "satisfactory," or "excellent." Thus, it would appear that on the one occasion when Hicks completed such a form it served more as an evaluation of the employee than as part of discipline imposed on the employee. I find the "behavior assessment" form introduced by Respondent to be of little probative weight regarding Hicks' role in imposing discipline on employees for that reason and for an additional reason. In the lower left hand corner of the form, there is a signature line on which the employee is expected to place his/her signature. The form introduced by Respondent is unsigned by the employee in question. This is the only such form introduced by Respondent signed by Hicks. There is no indication the employee in question received, or was intended to receive, this particular form which Hicks completed. These facts and the additional fact that all of the comments by Hicks on the form are positive lead me to believe that on this occasion the form was not used regarding the discipline of an employee, but rather was used in some preliminary way with regard to an employee evaluation. Its use in this manner is consistent with the evidence discussed above concerning Hicks' role in the evaluation of employees, and is considered as such. It reveals little about Hicks' role in the discipline of employees, and I rely instead on the testimony of former O R Supervisor Faye Lewis, which I credit, regarding that subject. I credit Lewis that, as evening coordinator, Hicks could independently take care of only minor disciplinary matters, such as reminding people to return from coffeebreak or pointing out to a person the fact that they were breaking sterile techniques.

Whenever problems of a more serious nature arose, Hicks would be expected to contact the head nurse, the O R supervisor, or the house supervisor. If Hicks reported such a problem to one of his superiors, the superior would first conduct an independent investigation before meting out discipline. All witnesses agree that Hicks never attempted to send someone home for the day as a disciplinary action. I discredit the assertion of some of Respondent's witnesses, particularly Traynon, that even though he never exercised it, Hicks possessed such authority. Rather, I credit Lewis that Hicks did not have such authority and that if such a serious situation arose Hicks would be expected to contact the house supervisor or to telephone the O R supervisor at home. Lewis testified credibly that whenever problems of any major consequence arose, including even scheduling problems in the operating room, Hicks would be expected to and did call in the house supervisor. I credit Lewis that the house supervisor on the evening shift was very often involved in resolving matters related to the operating room.

Regarding Hicks' authority to grant time off, the record reflects that Hicks did possess such authority under certain circumstances. Hicks played no part in establishing the work schedules of employees. Schedules were established by the O R supervisor, and Hicks had no authority to alter the established work schedule. Hicks did possess authority to allow employees on the evening shift to clock out and go home early when the workload was slack and there was no need for staff personnel. I note, however, that Hicks was limited to granting a request to go home initiated by an employee. Hicks had no authority to make an independent judgment that employees were no longer needed and direct them to clock out. I also note that the timecards of all employees on the evening shift, including Hicks, had to be approved by the head nurse. In view of all the above, I find that the circumstances under which Hicks could exercise the authority to grant time off were so limited and circumscribed that Hicks had little real authority.

Finally, Respondent argues that Hicks should be found to be a supervisor because he is the person of highest authority in the operating room during the evening shift. I must note, however, that Respondent concedes the O R supervisor is responsible for the overall supervision of the operating room 24 hours per day. Further, I am convinced that it is by no means accidental that while the day shift ends at 3 p.m., the O R supervisor works a schedule which overlaps the beginning of the evening shift for approximately 2-1/2 hours. While Hicks correlated some of the surgery to be scheduled on the evening shift, it was most often with the help of the O R supervisor prior to her leaving and only sometimes on his own. The overlap in work schedules of the O R supervisor allowed her to oversee coordination of the surgery schedule for the evening shift and to assure herself that everything was functioning smoothly before she left, and would continue to do so in her absence. As I have found above, Hicks' authority vis-a-vis other employees was limited. Whenever a problem of any serious nature arose, Hicks was expected to contact the house supervisor on duty or, if necessary, to even telephone the O R supervisor at home. As I have found above, the house supervisor was in fact very often involved in seeing to it that the operating room functioned smoothly on the evening shift.

In conclusion, my review of all the evidence leads me to the conclusion that Hicks' role in evaluating employees was primarily advisory. There is nothing on which to base a finding that his recommendations were followed and, in fact, the evidence is to the contrary. Further, any negative remarks or recommendations made by Hicks would be investigated independently by his superior before being acted on, and contrary to Respondent's claim, I conclude Hicks did not play any effective role in the discipline of employees. Hicks' authority to grant time off was circumscribed and could be exercised only when an employee requested to go home. Hicks had no authority to independently determine that employees were not needed and send them home. Hicks played no part in establishing work schedules and had no authority to change the established schedule. Hicks possessed no real authority vis-a-vis other employees, and whenever a problem of any serious nature arose, he was expected to contact the house supervisor or, if necessary, the O R supervisor. Hicks had no authority to hire, discharge, suspend, transfer, lay off, recall, promote, demote, or reprimand employees. Hicks spent 85 to 90 percent of his time performing routine staff nursing functions. The only authority really exercised by Hicks which might be supervisory in nature was his assignment of work to other employees on the evening shift. Even this, however, was minimal, requiring no more than 10 to 15 percent of his time. Respondent concedes that Hicks possessed no more authority than, and that his title as evening coordinator was interchangeable with, assistant head nurse. Hicks' assignment of work to other employees, while involving the use of some independent judgment, tended to be routine, made primarily on the basis of various nurses' known special skills and preferences. Accordingly, I conclude and find that Hicks was not a supervisor but rather was an employee within the meaning of the Act. Milwaukee Children's Hospital, 255 NLRB 1009 (1981); Mount Airy Psychiatric Center, 253 NLRB 1003 (1981); Victor Valley Hospital, 227 NLRB 513 (1976); Valley Hospital, supra. Cases cited by Respondent are inapposite for in each of those cases the individual found to be a supervisor possessed significantly greater authority than that exercised by Hicks.

C. Hicks' Discharge

The General Counsel and Respondent do not disagree that Hicks engaged in prounion activities. Respondent in fact admits that these activities led to Hicks' discharge and does not contend that the activities are, in any way, unprotected by the Act when engaged in by a statutory employee. As noted, Respondent simply argues that Hicks' discharge was unprotected because he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Nevertheless, testimony was introduced both by the General Counsel and the counsel for Respondent regarding the conversations between Director of Special Services Thames, O R Supervisor Traynon, and Hicks during which Hicks was discharged. Some of Hicks' testimony is disputed by Thames and Traynon. The reason testimony was introduced regarding this conversation is because the General Counsel alleges that during the conversation Thames created the impression that Hicks' union activities were under surveillance by stating that Respondent was aware of Hicks' attendance at a union meeting. This was also specifically alleged in the complaint.

I credit the testimony of Hicks over that of Thames and Traynon where there is direct conflict. For example, Thames testified that during the conversation, she asked Hicks if he considered himself to be a part of management, and Hicks stated that he did. Hicks denied this. Hicks testified that during the meeting Thames asserted Hicks was a supervisor, but denied he, too, said he considered himself to be a part of management. I credit Hicks.

It is undisputed that when Thames told Hicks he was being discharged because of his prounion activities and his alleged status as a supervisor, Hicks offered to resign his position as evening coordinator and remain a staff nurse. Thames informed Hicks that was not an option available to him and that he was being discharged. Following the conversation with Thames, Hicks asked and was allowed to meet with Personnel Director Kenneth Korff. Korff also informed Hicks that resigning as evening coordinator was not an available option and that he was being discharged.

The General Counsel argues that in the conversation between Thames, Traynon, and Hicks, Thames stated that Hicks had broken the law as a first line supervisor by going to a union meeting. Thames and Traynon testified that it was Hicks who first raised the subject of the union meeting. More specifically, they testified that Hicks stated he had not been told that his actions or activities on behalf of the Union "would get him into this kind of trouble, even at the meeting he attended." Traynon and Thames testified that they did not bring up the subject of union meetings and that neither of them was aware Hicks had attended a meeting. In Hicks' cross-examination, he candidly admitted that in the conversation with Thames and Traynon he may well have been the one to begin the discussion regarding the union meeting by saying he had not been told that as a supervisor he could not attend the meeting. Accordingly, I do not believe there is a direct conflict between the testimony of Hicks and that of Thames and Traynon. Rather, I conclude that counsel for General Counsel's argument regarding the facts is not clearly supported by the record. Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that Thames made the alleged remark. Therefore, while Hicks clearly was discharged because of his support for and activities on behalf of the Union, itself in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I do not specifically find that Respondent otherwise created the impression of surveillance of employee union activities.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, West Florida Hospital, Inc., is a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act and an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. District 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, RWDSU, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. William M. Hicks, prior to and at the time of his discharge on June 8, 1981, was an employee within the meaning of the Act.

4. Respondent discharged Hicks because of his support for and activities on behalf of the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

5. The unfair labor practices which Respondent has been found to have engaged in, as described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glassworkers, Local Union No. 513 and SK Consultants and Carpenters District Council of Greater St Louis. Case 14–CD–702

15 January 1985

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 11 September 1984[1] by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, Glaziers, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Carpenters. The hearing was held on 4 October before Hearing Officer Lynette K. Zuch.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, SK Consultants, a sole proprietorship with her principal office and place of business located in Godfrey, Illinois, is engaged in the installation of aluminum windows. The Employer commenced operations on 2 January 1984 and will annually perform window installation services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Illinois. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Glaziers and Carpenters are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

The Employer contracted to install operable and fixed aluminum replacement windows at the St. Louis Public Library and has a collective-bargaining agreement with Carpenters. The Employer commenced work at the jobsite in June 1984, and assigned the installation of both fixed and operable aluminum replacement windows to its six employees who are represented by Carpenters.

On 24 August Carpenters and Glaziers entered into a memorandum of understanding covering the St. Louis area which provided that operable and fixed aluminum replacement windows would be installed by a composite crew of Carpenters and Glaziers. Thereafter, about 10 September, a Glaziers representative spoke to the Employer's agent and claimed the work being performed at the St. Louis Public Library jobsite, and threatened to have pickets on the job. The following day, pickets for Glaziers appeared on the jobsite with an "area standards" picket legend. A Glaziers representative testified that the picketing would have stopped if the work had been assigned to the employees represented by Glaziers in accordance with the memorandum of understanding.

At the hearing, the Carpenters business representative claimed the work in accord with the memorandum of understanding. However, the Employer's employees, who are represented by Carpenters, at the hearing claimed all of the work involved in the installation of both operable and fixed aluminum replacement windows at the St. Louis Public Library jobsite.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the installation of operable and fixed aluminum replacement windows at the St. Louis Public Library at 1301 Olive Street, St. Louis, Missouri.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that reasonable cause exists to believe that Glaziers has violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. It argues that the picketing violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) because it constituted unlawful coercion. The Employer contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by Carpenters based on its collective-bargaining agreement with Carpenters; the Employer's past practice; relative skills; economy and efficiency of operations; and the Employer's preference. It further contends that it is not a party to the memorandum of understanding executed between Glaziers and Carpenters and that there is no area or industry practice to use glaziers to perform the installation of aluminum replacement windows.

Glaziers contends that no reasonable cause exists to believe that it has violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. Glaziers contends that the purpose of the picketing was to protect the area standards established by Glaziers. Furthermore, Glaziers contends that there is no jurisdictional dispute because Glaziers and Carpenters have entered into a memorandum of understanding which provides that a composite crew of carpenters and glaziers shall install operable and fixed replacement windows, and that Carpenters has disclaimed work relating to the glazing of windows and the installation of fixed window systems.

Carpenters contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to a composite crew of employees represented by Glaziers and Carpenters, consistent with the memorandum of understanding.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of a dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

The record shows that pickets for Glaziers appeared on the jobsite with an "area standards" picket legend. However, there is no support for a finding that the picketing had solely an area standards purpose as the record shows that the Glaziers business representative testified that the picketing would have stopped if the installation of fixed and operable aluminum replacement windows had been assigned to employees represented by Glaziers in accordance with the memorandum of understanding. Therefore, we find reasonable cause to believe that the picketing had an object of forcing and requiring the Employer to assign the disputed work to Glaziers-represented employees, and that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred. The parties stipulated that there exists no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.[2]

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

Neither labor organization has been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of the Employer's employees in an appropriate unit. However, the Employer currently has a collective-bargaining agreement with Carpenters which covers "the installation of replacement windows into existing buildings." We find that the collective-bargaining agreement is sufficient to cover the work in dispute. The Employer has no collective-bargaining agreement with Glaziers. We therefore find that the factor of collective-bargaining agreements favors an award of the disputed work to the Employer's employees represented by Carpenters.

2. Company preference, assignment, and past practice

It is undisputed that the employees represented by Carpenters have installed operable and all fixed aluminum replacement windows in the past for the Employer and are presently assigned to do so. The Employer has never assigned this type of work to glaziers. We find that the Employer's assignment and practice favors an award to its employees represented by Carpenters.

The Employer, at the hearing and in her brief, has expressed her preference that the disputed work continue to be performed by her employees represented by Carpenters. While we do not afford controlling weight to this factor, we find that it favors an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by Carpenters.

3. Area and industry practice

The Employer's agent testified that generally other employers in the St. Louis area have assigned the installation of fixed and operable aluminum replacement windows to employees having skills normally associated with Carpenters-represented employees. The Employer also presented the testimony of a manufacturer of replacement windows that Glaziers-represented employees have not been assigned this work in the St. Louis area. Glaziers presented testimony that employees it represents have been assigned to glaze windows and to install fixed aluminum replacement windows in the St. Louis area, and this testimony was corroborated by the business representative for Carpenters. Furthermore, as noted above, Glaziers and Carpenters entered into a memorandum of understanding after the Employer commenced work at the jobsite, which provided that fixed and operable replacement windows would be installed by a composite crew of employees represented by both Glaziers and Carpenters respectively.[3] The Employer's agent further testified that in his 17 to 18 years of experience in the industry employees represented by Glaziers did not perform work similar to that in dispute. However, it is clear from the record that his testimony was limited to the companies for whom he had worked in the past in the St. Louis area. Accordingly, we find the factors of area and industry practice are inconclusive.

4. Relative skills

The Employer presented undisputed testimony that her employees represented by Carpenters are specially trained to install operable and fixed replacement windows. A Glaziers representative testified that Glaziers-represented employees possess the skills to install fixed aluminum replacement windows, but traditionally have not installed operable aluminum replacement windows. Accordingly, we find that the factor of relative skills favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

The Employer presented undisputed testimony that, if the Employer were to assign the installation of aluminum replacement windows to a composite crew of Carpenters-represented employees and Glaziers-represented employees, the employees represented by Glaziers would stand idle during periods of the installation process. The record also reflects that Carpenters-represented employees, unlike Glaziers-represented employees, are able to work with all construction mediums, whether they are metal or wood. Therefore, Carpenters-represented employees, unlike Glaziers-represented employees, can perform and are assigned a variety of tasks at the jobsite, resulting in greater economy and efficiency than can be achieved by a composite crew of Carpenters-represented and Glaziers-represented employees. Glaziers has not shown that an award of the work to employees represented by it would be as economical and/or result in the same flexibility in adjusting to the jobsite requirements as an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters. Accordingly, we find that the factors of economy and efficiency favor an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Carpenters are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the Employer's collective-bargaining agreement with Carpenters; the Employer's preference, assignment, and past practice; relative skills; and economy and efficiency of operations. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Carpenters, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of SK Consultants represented by Carpenters District Council of Greater St. Louis are entitled to perform the installation of fixed and operable aluminum replacement windows at the St. Louis Public Library at 1301 Olive Street, St. Louis, Missouri.

2. Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glassworkers, Local Union No. 513 is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force SK Consultants to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glassworkers, Local Union No. 513 shall notify the Regional Director for Region 14 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

[3] While we have considered the memorandum of understanding in determining the dispute, we find that it is not controlling.

Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades Council, AFL–CIO and The Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation. Case 12–CC–1062

15 January 1985

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 30 September 1980 the National Labor Relations Board issued a decision in this proceeding[1] finding that the Respondent, Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades Council, AFL–CIO, did not violate Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act by distributing handbills urging a consumer boycott of a mall owner and all mall tenants. The Respondent had a primary labor dispute with H. J. High Construction Company (High), which had contracted to construct a store at the mall for H. J. Wilson Co. (Wilson's). Although the Respondent had no labor dispute with mall owner The Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation (DeBartolo), Wilson's, or any mall tenants, the Board reasoned that there was a "symbiotic" relationship between DeBartolo and its tenants and that they all would derive a substantial benefit from the "product" High was constructing for Wilson's. The Board concluded that High's contribution to the shopping center enterprise made it a "producer" within the meaning of that term as used in the publicity proviso of Section 8(b)(4) and therefore the proviso protected the Respondent's handbilling. The Board did not decide whether the handbilling constituted "coercion" or "restraint" within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4) or pass on the Respondent's contention that the first amendment protected it.[2] On 20 October 1981 the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit enforced the Board's decision.[3]

On 24 June 1983, after having granted certiorari, the Supreme Court rejected the Board's "symbiotic relationship" analysis and held that the Board erred in concluding that the handbills came within the publicity proviso's protection. The court declined to decide whether the first amendment protected the Respondent's conduct. Noting that the Board did not decide whether the handbilling fell within the "coercion" or "restraint" terms of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), the Court stated that, until that statutory question was resolved, review of the constitutional question was premature. Accordingly, the court vacated the court of appeals' judgment and remanded the case for further proceedings consistent with its opinion.

On 2 November 1983 the Board advised the parties of their right to file statements of position regarding the issues the remand raised. Thereafter, DeBartolo, the General Counsel, and the Respondent filed statements of position with the Board. The Associated General Contractors of America (AGC) moved for permission to file an amicus curiae brief.[4]

Pursuant to the Supreme Court's direction, we consider whether Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) prohibits the Respondent's conduct. We first briefly summarize the facts. High began building a store for Wilson's at East Lake Square Mall in late 1979. The Respondent claimed High paid substandard compensation to its employees. On 13 December 1979 the Respondent began distributing handbills to potential customers at all four entrances to the mall. The handbills stated:

> PLEASE DON'T SHOP AT EAST LAKE SQUARE MALL PLEASE
> The FLA. GULF COAST BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL, AFL–CIO is requesting that you do not shop at the stores in the East Lake Square Mall because of The Mall ownership's contribution to substandard wages.
> The Wilson's Department Store under construction on these premises is being built by contractors who pay substandard wages and fringe benefits. In the past, the Mall's owner, The Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation, has supported labor and our local economy by insuring that the Mall and its stores be built by contractors who pay fair wages and fringe benefits. Now, however, and for no apparent reason, the Mall owners have taken a giant step backwards by permitting our standards to be torn down. The payment of substandard wages not only diminishes the working persons's [sic] ability to purchase with earned, rather than borrowed, dollars, but it also undercuts the wage standard of the entire community. Since low construction wages at this time of inflation means decreased purchasing power, do the owners of East Lake Mall intend to compensate for the decreased purchasing power of workers of the community by encouraging the stores in East Lake Mall to cut their prices and lower their profits?

[1] 252 NLRB 702 (1980).

[2] Member Penello dissented on the ground that the Board should not have accepted the parties' stipulated record.

[3] 662 F.2d 264 (1981).

[4] We grant the AGC's motion and accept its brief.

> CUT-RATE WAGES ARE NOT FAIR UNLESS MERCHANDISE PRICES ARE ALSO CUT-RATE.
> We ask for your support in our protest against substandard wages. Please do not patronize the stores in the East Lake Square Mall until the Mall's owner publicly promises that all construction at the Mall will be done using contractors who pay their employees fair wages and fringe benefits.
> IF YOU MUST ENTER THE MALL TO DO BUSINESS, please express to the store managers your concern over substandard wages and your support of our efforts.
> We are appealing only to the public—the consumer. We are not seeking to induce any person to cease work or to refuse to make deliveries.

The Respondent continued handbilling until 4 January 1980, when the Thirteenth Judicial Circuit, Hillsborough County, Florida, enjoined its conduct.

Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) provides that a labor organization commits an unfair labor practice by threatening, coercing, or restraining any person engaged in commerce (the secondary employer), if an object is to force or require the secondary employer to stop dealing in the products of or to cease doing business with any other person (the primary employer).[5] We find that Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) proscribed the Respondent's conduct.

In Television Artists AFTRA Local 55 (Great Western Broadcasting), 150 NLRB 467 (1964), enfd. 356 F.2d 434 (9th Cir. 1966), in response to the Ninth Circuit's remand instructions to determine whether handbilling and other activity urging a consumer boycott constituted coercion, 310 F.2d 591 (1962), the Board held that such activity was coercive. In Typographical Union 37 (Hawaii Press), 167 NLRB 1030 (1967), enfd. 401 F.2d 952 (D.C. Cir. 1968), the Board cited with approval Great Western's statement that handbills appealing to the public not to patronize neutral employers constitute coercion violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). See also Service Employees Local 399 (Delta Air Lines), 263 NLRB 996 (1982); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 662 (Middle South Broadcasting), 133 NLRB 1968 (1961).[6]

In sum, we find that the Respondent, by distributing handbills requesting the public not to patronize mall tenants because High allegedly pays substandard wages and fringe benefits to its employees constructing a store for Wilson's, coerced the mall tenants, and that an object of the Respondent's conduct was to force the mall tenants to cease doing business with DeBartolo in order to force DeBartolo and/or Wilson's not to do business with High.[7] Having found that the Respondent engaged in conduct coercive within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii), we conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.[8]

The Respondent contends that the first amendment protects its handbilling and urges that we dismiss the complaint in order to avoid a conflict with the Constitution. We are persuaded, however, that the statute's literal language and the applicable case law require that we find a violation. We shall not consider the question whether the first amendment protects the Respondent's conduct because we find that the Act prohibits it. The court did not ask us to consider such an issue, and as a congressionally created administrative agency, we will presume the constitutionality of the Act we administer. We find that Congress, in enacting Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), intended to proscribe the Respondent's conduct, and we presume that this proscription accords with the Constitution.[9]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By distributing handbills urging potential customers not to shop at East Lake Square Mall, the Respondent has coerced the mall tenants with an object of forcing the mall tenants to cease doing business with DeBartolo in order to force DeBartolo and/or Wilson's to cease doing business with High, thereby violating Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

[5] The statute reads in relevant part: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents . . . to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof is . . . forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person."

[6] In Middle South Broadcasting, the judge reviewed the Taft-Hartley legislative history and concluded that the threats directed at secondary employers Congress intended to prohibit included, in addition to strikes and picketing, "other economic retaliation." Appealing to the public not to patronize secondary employers is an attempt to inflict economic harm on the secondary employers by causing them to lose business. As the case law makes clear, such appeals constitute "economic retaliation" and are therefore a form of coercion.

[7] We will not determine whether the Respondent's conduct coerced DeBartolo on a stipulated record in which the complaint does not so allege.

[8] The Respondent asked customers to forgo shopping at the mall entirely; it did not merely ask them not to deal with High. Thus, it did not limit its appeal to the "struck product," and its conduct does not fall within the privilege to engage in product boycotts recognized in NLRB v. Fruit & Vegetable Packers Local 760, 377 U.S. 58 (1964).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades Council, AFL–CIO, Tampa, Florida, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercing the mall tenants by distributing handbills urging potential customers not to shop at East Lake Square Mall, with an object of forcing the mall tenants to cease doing business with DeBartolo in order to force DeBartolo and/or Wilson's to cease doing business with High.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing the East Lake Square Mall tenants, with an object of forcing them to cease doing business with DeBartolo in order to force DeBartolo and/or Wilson's to cease doing business with High.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its offices and meeting places copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 12, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by DeBartolo and its mall tenants, if willing, at places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

15 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 7 November 1983 Administrative Law Judge Arline Pacht issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent, after bargaining to impasse with the Union, violated Section 8(a)(5) when it paid its striker replacements a higher hourly wage rate than that offered to the Union during negotiations. The judge noted that after impasse is reached an employer is free to change existing terms and conditions of employment if those changes are "reasonably comprehended" within its final offer. The judge found that the change in hourly wage rates here was inconsistent with the Respondent's final offer to the Union and thus was an unlawful unilateral change. The judge further found this conduct to have been inherently destructive of employee rights and thus also violative of Section 8(a)(3). The judge also found that by these acts the Respondent prolonged the strike and thereby converted it into an unfair labor practice strike. Consequently, the judge concluded that the Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by failing to promptly reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work.

We disagree. Contrary to the judge, we find that the actual wages paid to the striker replacements were consistent with those offered the Union in the Respondent's final proposal. Consequently, we find that the Respondent did not unilaterally change the terms and conditions of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(5). Consistent with this finding we also reverse the judge's further findings of 8(a)(1) and (3) violations set forth above, all of which were premised on the unlawful unilateral change.

The facts are as follows. The parties reached impasse on 27 July 1982 after six bargaining sessions had taken place. At the 27 July meeting the Respondent offered an hourly wage rate of $9.38 with the number of hours worked to be computed from what is known in the trade as the Factory Book.[1] Alternatively, the Respondent offered to continue the expired contract for 1 year. The contract guaranteed a minimum weekly wage of $310. It further provided for $8.85 per hour, with the number of hours worked to be computed from the Chilton Book. No agreement was reached and a strike ensued.

In August the Respondent hired permanent replacements for the strikers. In determining a wage formula, the Respondent reviewed its competitive position. In order to improve its efficiency, it decided to use the more economical Factory Book as it had proposed, and so to set an hourly rate of $9.75 per hour with a 35-hour-minimum weekly guarantee total of $341.25. Because the hourly rate and, more importantly, the guaranteed minimum were higher than that paid the strikers, the judge concluded that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) by paying the replacements that wage. The Respondent, however, excepts to this conclusion, arguing, as it did before the judge, that a violation should not be predicated on the formula used for determining wages, rather, the Board should examine actual earnings over the 6-month period to determine if the Respondent's implemented wage package was reasonably comprehended within its alternative proposals to the Union. We find the Respondent's exception persuasive, particularly where, as here, earnings can vary significantly based on the numbers of tasks performed, and the numbers of hours alloted to a task for purposes of calculating wages. Thus, contrary to the judge, we would not focus on the minimum guarantee, when we can examine actual earnings over a significant period of time.

Using this analysis the record shows that the actual wages received by the replacements over a 6-month period in 1983 were generally the same or less than the strikers had earned during a similar period in 1982 under the terms of the expired contract. Thus, while the replacements' hourly rate was higher than that of the expired contract, their actual earnings did not correspondingly increase because the number of hours paid was no longer calculated on the Chilton Book. Accordingly, the actual wages paid to the replacements were not higher than those offered to the Union but, rather, were consistent with one of the Respondent's alternative final offers, i.e., its offer to continue the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.[2] In these circumstances, we find that the wages paid the replacements were reasonably comprehended within the Respondent's final proposal to the Union and that the Respondent did not unilaterally change the terms and conditions of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(5).[3]

[1] The Factory Book and the Chilton Book are industry manuals each of which specifies time allotments for tasks performed. Mechanics' wages are based not on actual hours worked but on hours deemed to have been worked as set forth in the respective manuals. Generally, the Chilton Book has more generous time allotments.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I do not think that the Respondent's final proposals to the Union reasonably comprehended the wage package the Respondent unilaterally implemented for striker replacements.

The Respondent made two alternative offers to the Union: (1) $9.38 per hour calculated on the "Factory Book," with no minimum guarantee; and (2) $8.85 per hour calculated on the "Chilton Book," with a $310-per-week minimum guarantee (continuation of existing contract). The Respondent gave replacements $9.75 per hour calculated on the "Factory Book," with a $341.25 minimum guarantee. Thus, the "Factory Book" terms the Respondent gave the replacements were incontestably better than the "Factory Book" offer made to the Union in both hourly rate ($9.75 versus $9.38) and minimum guarantee ($341.25 versus nothing). In my view, this comparison alone establishes a violation; the Respondent was not entitled unilaterally to implement "Factory Book" terms more generous than the "Factory Book" offer it made to the Union. My colleagues argue, however, that the unilaterally implemented "Factory Book" terms proved to be no more advantageous to the replacements, in actual earnings, than the "Chilton Book" contractual terms had been to the strikers.

Assuming arguendo that the implemented "Factory Book" terms were lawful if they were no more generous than the contractual "Chilton Book" terms that the Respondent offered to continue, I nevertheless would find a violation. Here, because of the different time allotments in the two books, it is difficult to compare the implemented "Factory Book" hourly rate with the "Chilton Book" hourly rate. Minimum weekly guarantees can be compared, however, because they are stated in dollar amounts. The implemented minimum guarantee was $341.25, compared with $310 under the "Chilton Book" offer. Thus, the implemented minimum guarantee was better than either of the Respondent's alternative offers. Moreover, as the judge observed, the implemented terms yielded higher holiday, personal day, and sick leave pay rates than either of the Respondent's offers.

In looking to gross actual earnings over a 6-month period, my colleagues use the wrong measuring stick. The normal methodology in this type of case is to compare the terms that were implemented with the terms that were offered. The Board must judge the terms on their face (as the parties must do at the bargaining table), rather than look with hindsight at actual earnings experience.

The Union here might have chosen to accept the implemented "Factory Book" terms, as they appeared better on their face than the offered alternatives. Whether acceptance would have proven advantageous for the Union is unclear, because actual earnings depend on numerous variables, such as individual skill and productivity and the amount and type of work available to be performed. The strikers might have earned more than their replacements did, or they might not have. The critical point, however, is that the Respondent never gave the Union the opportunity to consider the implemented "Factory Book" terms, which had significant advantages over the terms the Respondent did offer. The Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (3), as the judge found.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARLINE PACHT, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in New York, New York, on August 1, 2, 3, and 10, 1983, pursuant to a charge filed on November 3, 1982, and amended on April 25, 1983. The complaint and notice of hearing, issued on June 31, 1983, and amended on July 20, 1983, alleges that Brady-Stannard Motor Co., Inc. (the Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Specifically the Respondent is alleged to have unilaterally offered and paid an hourly wage rate and a weekly minimum wage guarantee to replacement workers higher than that ever offered to Local 259, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (the Union) during contract negotiations. The complaint also alleges that when the Respondent's striking service department employees learned of this their economic strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike. The complaint further alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by failing to reinstate all of the striking employees after the Union forwarded on their behalf an unconditional offer to return. The Respondent denies the commission of any unfair labor practice, and contends that the wages paid to replacement workers were reasonably comprehended within its final bargaining proposals.

[2] Thus, contrary to the judge, it is not significant that the replacements' minimum weekly guarantee, holiday, personal leave, and sick pay were higher than the strikers' under the expired contract, because, even including these higher earnings, the replacements still did not average more than the strikers in terms of actual earnings. Accordingly, the terms implemented for the replacements were consistent with those offered the Union. In contrast, our dissenting colleague concludes that the terms implemented for the replacements "had significant advantages" over those offered the Union. In so doing, however, she ignores evidence of the replacements' actual earnings which effectively disproves her contention. Instead, she relies on the implemented terms "on their face"; however, our colleague does concede that it is "unclear" whether the implemented terms really are more advantageous than those offered the Union due to the many variables present here. Precisely because of these many variables, it is impossible to weigh the relative advantages of the implemented terms vis-a-vis those offered the Union merely by appraising those terms "on their face," and it is improper to conclude that one is better than the other based on such a superficial analysis. Thus, it is our dissenting colleague, rather than we, who uses "the wrong measuring stick." We prefer to rely on the clear facts which show that the replacements' actual wages were not higher than those offered the Union.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Respondent, have been carefully considered together with all the evidence in this case. On the entire record, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is, and at all times material herein has been, a New York corporation with an office and place of business in Brewster, New York, where it is engaged in the retail sale, service, and repair of new and used automobiles. Annually, in the course and conduct of its business operations, the Respondent derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000; sells and ships from its facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to firms located outside the State of New York; and purchases and receives at its facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from firms located outside the State of New York. Accordingly, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Union is now, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Operating under franchise, the Respondent sells new Cadillacs, Oldsmobiles, and Chevrolets, and services both new and used vehicles at its Brewster, New York facility. Its 32 employees are organized into four operating divisions: administration, sales, service, and parts. Since July 1979, the Union has represented the 17 employees in the service and parts division in the following unit:

> All service shop employees, including service writers, mechanics, "A" parts persons, "B" parts persons, drivers, polishers, foremen polishers, utility persons, tow truck drivers, and dispatchers employed by the Respondent at its facility, excluding office clerical employees, new and used car salesmen, guards, watchmen, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The unit employees were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement which was effective from July 16, 1979, to July 15, 1982. The agreement provided, among other things, that as of July 1981 mechanics, also referred to as Class A technicians, would be paid an hourly rate of $8.85 and guaranteed a 35-hour workweek. In other words, mechanics were assured of a minimum weekly wage of $310. Although the contract called for a 40-hour workweek, mechanics' wages were not calculated by simply multiplying their $8.85 hourly wage rate by the literal number of clock hours worked. Rather, wages were calculated on a flat-rate or productive-hour basis according to three different methods. First, for all work under warranty, the amount of time allocated to perform a particular repair was itemized by year and model of car in a trade manual referred to as the Factory Book. The amount of time provided to complete repairs which were not under warranty was specified in a separate reference work, the Chilton Book. As a general rule, the Chilton Book provided more time for a job than did the Factory Book. For example, whereas the Chilton Book prescribed 5.5 hours to overhaul a transmission in a 1980 Chevrolet, only 3.5 hours were allowed for the identical function in the Factory Book. However, it is not invariably true that the Chilton Book set more generous times than did the Factory Book. On some operations the manuals varied only slightly if at all. One witness with extensive experience in the trade suggested that for 90 percent of the jobs the Chilton Book allocated 30 percent more time for a given job than did the Factory Book. It also appeared true, however, that the Chilton Book differed more significantly from the Factory Book when the jobs were complex than when they were more simple.

To summarize then, the Chilton and Factory Books are identical in that each establishes specific amounts of time for the completion of given repairs in various types of cars. The books differ as to the length of time allocated for each repair. In addition, the Respondent established a third method of calculating an employee's productive time. It created a "menu" or list of common repairs not under warranty, and established flat-rate times which were generally less than the Chilton times for those jobs in order to reduce the cost to the customer.

A mechanic's weekly wage was calculated in the following manner: the employee entered a brief description of each assigned job on a timecard and indicated whether the job was under warranty, customer-paid, or on the menu. Management then determined the amount of time allowed for each job by referring to the appropriate manual or menu. The total productive hours accumulated during a 5-day week multiplied by the $8.85 hourly rate determined the employee's weekly wage, but only if the productive hours exceeded 35. If a mechanic's productive time fell below 35 hours, he would receive a guaranteed minimum wage of $310 (35 multiplied by $8.85).

In addition to wages being calculated on a flat-rate basis as described above, the contract also provided for certain wages to be earned on a straight-time basis. Thus, each year 11 paid holidays, 6 sick leave days, 2 personal days, school training days (typically 6 to 10 a year), bereavement, and call-in pay[1] all were determined by multiplying 8 clock hours by the $8.85 hourly wage rate.

B. Collective-Bargaining Negotiations

During the 2-month period of time prior to the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement, the parties conferred on six occasions in an effort to negotiate a new contract. Economic issues were the central concerns of both the Respondent and the Union. The Company, like others affected by the recession in the automobile industry, wanted far-reaching concessions from the unionized workers. Not unnaturally, the Union hoped to obtain increased benefits and wages. Joe Lewis, the Union's business agent and principal negotiator, conceded without hesitation that from the outset the Respondent's position was that all work should be calculated in accordance with the Factory Book, that the hourly wage rate should not be raised, that the weekly guarantee should be abolished, and that job classifications should be revised to provide for Class B mechanics. However, the Union sought an expansion of the guaranteed workweek from 35 to 40 hours and a 12-1/2-percent increase in wages with continued reliance on the Chilton Book. During the next several bargaining sessions, both sides made certain concessions. Although the record is somewhat obscure as to the parties' positions vis-a-vis the hourly weekly wage, it appears that at one of the meetings the Respondent agreed to retain the 35-hour guarantee, but failed to come to terms with the Union on an hourly wage rate. At a subsequent meeting, the Respondent agreed to retain the 35-hour guarantee, but attempted to tie it to a productivity clause. Thereafter, the Respondent agreed to a 5-percent increase in the $8.85 hourly rate and the Union retreated from its demand for a 12-1/2-percent increase and a 25-percent increase for the polisher and parts driver to a 10-1/2 percent increase over 2 years.

On July 27, the Respondent raised its offer to a 6-percent increase on the $8.85 hourly rate based on the Factory Book. The Union, in turn, trimmed its request to a 9-percent increase on the $8.85 rate with a retention of the Chilton Book. In a final effort to avert a strike, the Respondent alternatively offered to continue operations under the current contract for another year.

When the negotiating team presented the Respondent's alternative proposals to the members of the bargaining unit, they voted unanimously to reject them and to strike. Thus, on July 27, when the strike vote was taken, the parties had failed to agree on an hourly wage rate, on the exclusive use of the Factory Book, on revised job classifications, or on a weekly guarantee. The following day, the 17 service department employees went out on strike; picketers bearing placards began a vigil outside the Respondent's premises. Although bargaining continued after the strike commenced, the parties were unable to resolve their differences. In November, the Company raised its offer from 6 to 7 percent over the $8.85 hourly wage rate on the Factory Book. This proposal was unacceptable to the Union, although it did acquiesce to the establishment of a Class B mechanic position.

C. The Strike

In the latter part of August, as the strike persisted, the Respondent placed advertisements in several local newspapers for striker replacements. The Respondent's business manager Robert Murphy instructed the company's bookkeeper Robin Morgan to review the striking employees' wages during the preceding year as a means of establishing an appropriate wage which could be offered to the replacements. Pursuant to these instructions Morgan prepared an analysis, introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1, from which she concluded that the Class A technicians had earned an average hourly of $9.93.[2] On the basis of her analysis, management decided to offer replacement workers $9.75 an hour on the Factory Book with a 35-hour guaranteed workweek.

On September 10, a job applicant emerged from an interview with the supervisor of the service department and disclosed to Larry Devita, a striking technician walking the picket line, that he had been offered a hourly rate of $9.75 and a 35-hour guaranteed workweek. He agreed to allow DeVita to make copies of a piece of paper given to him by the supervisor on which these terms were written. DeVita left the picket line briefly and then returned with copies of the paper which he shared with his fellow strikers. By the account of several other mechanics who were on the picket line that day, the pickets became exceedingly angry on learning of the Respondent's offer. By the next day, all of the striking employees had knowledge of Brady-Stannard's terms. It became a source of constant comment on the picket line with strikers expressing anger and bitterness that the Respondent was willing to offer better terms to people "off the street" than to its own employees, many of whom had more than 10 years' seniority. As DeVita described it, the strikers were "fuming mad . . . . They were cursing up and down, they couldn't believe that after being there for so many years and their seniority . . . they could offer these guys more money."

[1] The call-in pay provision apparently guaranteed 8 hours' pay for an employee who reported to work when, in fact, work was not available.

[2] Although I have no doubt that Morgan made a good-faith effort to analyze the employees' weekly wages in order to derive an average hourly rate, her study builds on several generalized assumptions which make its conclusions imperfect and unreliable. For example, the entire analysis is based on the assumption that each mechanic spent 27 percent of his productive hours for a 6-month period on warranty work. Yet, the 27-percent figure was calculated on records for only 1 month. Moreover, that percentage was used to estimate the percentage of all employees' productive time spent on customer-paid work, rather than obtaining this figure from actual records for the months involved. Morgan also accepted as true the assumption that the amount of productive hours allocated for all customer-paid labor was uniformly 30 percent greater than for warranty work. Any slight variation in these broad assumptions could significantly alter Morgan's conclusion that the average hourly rate for mechanics was $9.93.

On the day after this revelation, Ronald Miller, another striking Class A mechanic and shop steward, contacted Business Agent Lewis about the Company's $9.75 offer. Early the next week, Lewis met with the strikers and promised to seek legal advice from the Union's counsel as to how to proceed. In the interim, according to employees who testified at the hearing, the Respondent's wage offer was a constant source of discussion and hostile comment among the union members. Although the strikers admittedly did not know whether the Respondent would use the Factory or Chilton Book to calculate the replacement workers' productive hours, they believed that with a $9.75 hourly rate the replacements would be earning more. However, they also voiced outrage that the Respondent offered a 35-hour guaranteed workweek at the higher hourly rate to the replacements, a concern which went beyond the question of which manual would be used. Thus, Shop Steward Miller was unable to predict whether mechanics would take home greater wages at a $9.75 rate on the Factory Book than an employee making $8.85 an hour on the Chilton Book because of all the variables involved, but he was certain that the weekly guarantee at $9.75 would result in a minimum weekly wage higher than anything offered to the strikers. Another mechanic, George Caimi, also had no doubt as to what the Respondent's offer entailed. He noted that the union members "had never been offered anywheres near that amount of money as an hourly rate." He then related that he had taken a scrap of paper and found that when he multiplied "9.75 times 35 comes out to be a greater number than 8.85 times 35. It comes out to more money." When Larry DeVita was asked whether he calculated the difference between the hourly rate offered to replacements and his own, he answered without hesitation: "You bet I did . . . $9.75 x 8 hours x 35 hours come out to about $31.60 more than I was going to get even with a 6% increase." Miller also pointed out that the higher wage rate offered to replacement increased the amount of pay earned for holidays, personal days, and school training days.

As promised, Lewis consulted with the Union's attorney and on November 3, an unfair labor practice charge was filed with the Board accusing the Respondent of violating Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by offering the higher hourly rate to the replacement workers when it had not previously been proposed to the Union. On November 10, Lewis again met with the strikers explaining the steps the Union had taken. New picket signs appeared shortly thereafter accusing Brady-Stannard of being unfair.

D. The Strikers' Offer to Return

After picketing for almost 7 months and with the onset of cold weather, the employees decided to offer to return to work. The Union telegraphed the Respondent on February 15 on behalf of the strikers stating that they were unconditionally prepared to return to work. In a telegram dated February 17, the Company responded that there were no current vacancies, but promised to recall the men if any openings arose. Beginning on March 2, the Respondent wrote to 8 of the 10 strikers offering them reinstatement. After conferring with one another, the employees realized that offers had not been extended to all of them. Consequently, they all agreed to reject the reinstatement offers and remain on strike. The strike and the picketing at the Respondent's facility still were in progress at the time of this proceeding.

E. Discussion

1. Positions of the parties

There is no allegation that the Respondent refused to bargain in good faith or that the strike was not economic in origin. Rather, the complaint is narrowly drawn and alleges only that the strike became an unfair labor practice strike when the Respondent unilaterally offered and paid to replacement workers a greater hourly wage rate and a guaranteed minimum workweek which exceeded any offer made to the Union during collective-bargaining negotiations in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. The complaint further alleges that the Respondent's refusal to reinstate all of the strikers after they tendered an unconditional offer to return also violated the Act and further prolonged the strike.

The Respondent's defense rests on its claim that the post-impasse wages paid to replacement workers were lower than those earned by Class A mechanics prior to the strike. Since these wage payments were reasonably comprehended by the Respondent's final bargaining proposals, no unfair labor practice was committed and the strike remained economic in nature. Therefore, the Respondent maintains, it was under no obligation to offer immediate reinstatement to all of the strikers pursuant to their offer to return.

2. Respondent's unfair labor practices

It is well settled that an employer may institute changes in existing terms and conditions of employment after impasse has been reached following good-faith negotiations, provided that the changes are "reasonably comprehended" in its final proposal. Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475 (1967), enfd. sub nom. Television & Radio Artists v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968). Put another way, any revisions in the terms which the employer puts into effect subsequent to impasse may not be "substantially different from, or greater than, any which the employer has proposed during its negotiations." NLRB v. Crompton Highland Mills, 337 U.S. 217, 225 (1949).

The parties do not disagree that an impasse occurred on July 27, 1982, after six bargaining sessions had taken place.[3] Although each side demonstrated flexibility and made concessions from its initial position, differences remained on economic issues, including the amount of the hourly wage rate, whether the Chilton Book would be retained, whether mechanics' job classifications would be expanded to include additional job categories, and whether the guaranteed 35-hour workweek would be maintained. Since good-faith bargaining did not bring about a resolution of these key issues, since the parties apparently understood that a rejection of the Respondent's final alternative proposals would precipitate a strike, and since neither party seemed committed to making additional concessions at the July 27 meeting, the conclusion is warranted that an impasse existed at that time. In addition, the employees' rejection of the Company's final proposals provides compelling evidence that they regarded negotiations at that time as deadlocked. The fact that bargaining resumed in August and continued on various dates in November and December is not inconsistent with a finding of impasse, for throughout the subsequent negotiations the parties drew no closer together on the issues which divided them on July 27.

The first critical question which must be resolved, then, is whether the Respondent's post-impasse offer and payment to striker replacement mechanics were "reasonably comprehended" within its final alternative proposals to the Union. For the reasons set forth below, I find that the Respondent unilaterally offered and implemented terms of employment for the replacements greater than those offered during collective bargaining and that such conduct violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

The Respondent stipulated at the hearing that in early September 1982 it offered and did, in fact, begin paying three newly hired Class A mechanics an hourly rate of $9.75 based on the Factory Book, accompanied by a guaranteed 35-hour weekly minimum wage. Moreover, the Respondent stipulated that it never offered the same terms to the Union throughout their negotiations, nor has it notified and offered to bargain with the Union about them. The Respondent further admitted that at no time during negotiations did it propose hourly rates and weekly guarantees to the Union which matched or exceeded those paid to the replacements.

Without belaboring the point, it is obvious that $9.75 is a greater hourly rate than $9.38 or $8.85, the final figures offered to the Union. By the same token, it is clear that the weekly guarantee of $341.25, the product derived by multiplying 35 hours times $9.75, exceeds both the minimum weekly wage guaranteed to the members of the bargaining unit under their expired contract or the $328.30 sum resulting from the Respondent's offer to increase the hourly wage rate to $9.38. It also follows that the $9.75 hourly rate led to other inequities when comparing the proposals to the bargaining unit employees to the offer and payments to replacement workers. Thus, the Respondent conceded that replacements would be eligible for holiday, sick leave, school training, and personal days at a wage rate calculated by multiplying a straight time of 8 hours by the higher $9.75 hourly rate.

The Respondent relies on a document submitted into evidence which compares the actual earnings of replacement workers during the first two quarters of 1983 with those of the strikers for the same time period in 1982, arguing that this exhibit proves that the replacements' earnings were less than those of the strikers.[4]

Numerous flaws inhere in the Respondent's arguments, the most serious of which stems from its reliance on the replacements' actual wages. By comparing their 6 months earnings to those of the bargaining unit members, the Respondent has apparently missed the essential thrust of the complaint. The harm alleged in the complaint is not directed to the maximum which might be earned under one hourly rate or the other; rather, it focuses on the minimum weekly wage guaranteed to replacements which exceeded that proposed for bargaining unit employees.[5]

This is a matter which has significance independent of whether or not the Chilton Book is eliminated. Thus, the Union's business agent and chief negotiator testified without controversion that the parties bargained about the guaranteed weekly wage as a separate item and that it continued to be a critical and unresolved issue throughout the negotiations. The strikers, too, expressed discontent not only about their perception that the replacements would earn greater wages, but also that the new formula for a weekly guarantee assured them a higher minimum wage rate than the Union was offered. Given Brady-Stannard's business decline, the strikers' concern as to a guaranteed weekly minimum wage was hardly academic. Indeed, the record shows that the replacement workers relied heavily on their guarantee. One of the newly hired mechanics drew on the minimum wage 30 out of the 41 weeks he worked, another resorted to the guarantee in 12 of 33 weeks, while a third drew on the guarantee for 12 of his 44 workweeks. It stresses the obvious to point out that, if the striking employees were to have invoked their guarantee at the rate offered to them by the Respondent during negotiations, they would have taken home $31.50 less per week than that paid to the replacements.

Even apart from the issue of the guaranteed weekly wage, it is not at all certain that wages calculated wholly on the Factory Book at $9.75 an hour would necessarily result in a reduction of mechanics' earnings, as the Respondent contends. There are, as one of the strikers suggested, too many variables between the circumstances which govern the wages earned by the bargaining unit members and those by the replacement workers to determine with any degree of accuracy that the elimination of the Chilton Book mandated a decrease in real earnings. It is true, as the witnesses conceded, that the Chilton

Strikers—1982
DeVita Sr.	$ 9,728.27
Miller	10,002.26
Palochick	10,362.83
DeVita Jr.	19,985.83
Caimi	13,602.87
McCarley	11,304.40
Romano	13,578.92
Replacements—1983
Hagley	$10,665.20
Schmidt	9,367.59
O'Connor	9,862.62

manual was more generous in times allotted to certain repairs and, therefore, generally more advantageous to the mechanic. Nevertheless, in determining whether or not the Chilton Book made a difference in calculating real earnings, it is important to bear in mind that only a portion, approximately 40 percent, of the mechanics' productive hours were calculated on the basis of Chilton timeframes. Moreover, for some of the repairs performed by the mechanics, no distinctions or only insignificant ones existed between the times allotted in either manual. Consequently, it is impossible to accurately predict whether calculating all productivity at a $9.75 hourly rate on the basis of the Factory Book would, in fact, produce a weekly wage less than that comprehended in the Respondent's final proposal to the Union.

There are other variables which make a valid comparison problematic. For example, it may be appropriate to make allowances for the fact that the replacements took longer to perform their tasks out of an unfamiliarity with a new workplace, to factor into the equation the continuation impact of a general decline in the automobile industry, or to acknowledge the loss of business occasioned by the strike. In addition, the Respondent unilaterally revised the menu after the strike commenced and also eliminated a $10.45 special hourly rate previously paid to mechanics for heavy-duty work on trucks. The Union was not notified of either of these actions and they were apparently never mentioned during collective bargaining. Therefore, they should not be taken into account in deciding the central issue in this case since it is impossible to state what position the Union would have taken had it been permitted to bargain over these matters.

Further, the record does not wholly support the Respondent's contention that the formula established to determine wages for the replacements necessarily produced decreased earnings. General Counsel's Exhibit 1 shows that one of the mechanics hired subsequent to the strike, Brian Hagley, earned a higher average weekly wage then did four of the bargaining unit technicians, while another new employee, O'Connor, earned more than the senior DeVita.

In sum, given all the variable circumstances which existed before the strike and afterwards, it requires a leap of faith to conclude that the wage package offered and given to replacement workers was less favorable overall than that offered to the Union during negotiations. There is one matter, however, which remains beyond speculation—that is, that the replacement mechanics were offered a higher hourly rate and a guaranteed workweek which had to produce income greater than that ever offered to the Union. There can be no doubt that $9.75 times 35 hours assures a greater minimum wage than does $8.85 multiplied by a 35-hour workweek, and that $9.75 multiplied by 8 hours straight time is greater than $8.85 per hour for holidays, personal days, or sick leave. By offering and granting to replacement workers these terms of employment, more desirable than any offered to the strikers, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Moreover, the Board has held, in somewhat parallel circumstances, that such actions have a potentially devastating impact on the right of employees to strike for they are inherently destructive of employees' rights. Therefore, Section 8(a)(3) of the Act is violated as well. Burlington Homes, 246 NLRB 1029, 1030 (1979); NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 226 (1963).[6]

3. The strike's conversion into an unfair labor practice strike

The next question to be considered is whether the Respondent's unlawful conduct in offering and paying a higher hourly wage rate together with a 35-hour weekly guarantee to replacement workers converted an economic strike into an unfair labor practice strike.

The resolution of this question turns on proof that the unfair conduct was causally connected to the continuation or prolongation of the strike. Compare Whisper Soft Mills, 267 NLRB 813 (1983), and Robbins Co., 233 NLRB 549 (1977), with Burlington Homes, supra at 1032, and Winter Gardens Citrus Products v. NLRB, 238 F.2d 128 (5th Cir. 1956). Here, there is convincing evidence to support the conclusion that the Respondent's unfair labor practices described above contributed in substantial measure to alienating the strikers and thereby prolonging the strike.

There is no dispute that striking employees learned of the Respondent's wage offer to a replacement mechanic on September 10. What the Respondent controverts is the contention that their knowledge contributed to a prolongation of the strike. In this regard, it could be argued that the strikers' testimony as to their hostile receipt of this information was self-serving.[7] But it is not possible easily to disregard the strong evidence of the workers' anger and their perception of their employer's conduct as unfair. Thus, the record shows that the union members took certain unambiguous actions. First, DeVita, swiftly reacting to what he perceived as an unjust offer, persuaded the applicant to accompany him while he made copies of the paper containing the damaging terms. Immediately thereafter, he shared the information with his fellow picketers. By the following day all the strikers were aware of the Respondent's action. On September 11, the shop steward sought the union business agent's advice as to how to proceed on this issue. Thereafter, the business agent met with the strikers and assured them that he would pursue the matter. He did so and within a reasonable time period the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge devoted exclusively to its protest of the Respondent's wage offer. Finally, the picket signs were changed to reflect the fact that the focus of the strike was to protest an unfair labor practice. There is no precise way to measure the degree to which the Respondent's unfair labor practices determined the employees' decision to see the strike to the finish, for motivation is not a matter which can be quantified with certainty, especially when the events which affected or changed their motivation occurred while the employees were on strike. It is unnecessary to divine subjective intent, however, for there is visible objective evidence here which provides ample proof that "the strikers' resolve to continue the strike was strengthened by what they perceived as another unfair labor practice committed by Respondent."[8] The fact that the strike continued without any sign of weakening until February 15 when the strikers unconditionally offered to return to work provides further proof of the intensity of the strikers' resolve.

[6] The Respondent contends that it chose the $9.75 hourly rate solely to attract applicants with a fair wage offer. However, specific evidence of discriminatory motivation is unnecessary since the Respondent's conduct "by its very nature contain[s] the implications of the required intent." NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra at 227. See also Radio Officers v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17 (1954).

[7] With some limited exceptions, the collective-bargaining agreement requires that a full investigation be made prior to a discharge. Other arbitrators, who have heard cases involving the Company, have held that the "full investigation" requirement may be met without the need to interview the employee affected.

To be sure, the strike continued to have economic objectives throughout its duration. However, a strike, such as the one at issue here, may be converted into an unfair labor practice strike "if only one cause, even if not the primary cause, was the employer's unfair labor practice, notwithstanding the presence of economic issues." Superior National Bank, 246 NLRB 721, 724 (1979), quoting National Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Co., 227 NLRB 2014 (1977), enf. denied on other grounds 565 F.2d 1331 (5th Cir. 1978). There is compelling proof that the unit members continued to strike against Brady-Stannard at least in part because of the Respondent's unlawful conduct in offering a higher hourly wage rate and a higher guaranteed weekly wage to striker replacements than was offered to the Union during negotiations. I conclude, therefore, that the strike became an unfair labor practice strike on September 10, 1982.

4. Respondent's obligation to reinstate strikers

When a strike which is economic at its inception is converted into an unfair labor practice strike, the strikers acquire the full reinstatement rights of unfair labor practice strikers on the date of conversion. See Carpenters Local 1780, 244 NLRB 277, 281 (1979). Accordingly, an employer is obligated to immediately reinstate any striker who was not permanently replaced prior to the date of conversion to his former or substantially equivalent position of employment on his unconditional application to return to work, even if striker replacements must be terminated to make way for the returning employee. NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333 (1938). As found above, a strike, economic in nature, became an unfair labor practice protest on September 10, and on February 15 the employees requested reinstatement without conditions. At this juncture, the Respondent was required to offer immediate reemployment to all bargaining unit employees who had not been permanently replaced prior to September 10.[9]

Instead, on February 17 the Respondent declined to reinstate any of its former employees claiming that there were no vacancies. In its brief, the Respondent denies that it had a legal obligation to offer reinstatement to all unreplaced strikers since the strike remained an economic one at all times. Having found to the contrary that it was converted to an unfair labor practice strike, the Respondent was obliged to promptly accept the returning workers even if it entailed dismissing replacements. The Respondent's refusal to do so violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act and clearly prolonged the strike. See Tufts Bros., 235 NLRB 808, 823 (1978).

Beyond this, the Respondent again violated the Act when it subsequently offered to reinstate most but not all of the strikers. Because of its failure to offer reemployment to the two service advisers, Strobino and Smith, the other striking employees rejected the reinstatement offers and chose to continue the strike. In these circumstances, the strikers were entitled to refuse to return to work and by doing so did not forfeit their status or reinstatement rights as unfair labor practice strikers. Condoning similar conduct by striking employees in Southwestern Pipe, 179 NLRB 364 (1969), modified 444 F.2d 340 (5th Cir. 1971), the Board ruled:

Thus, the mechanics' decision to remain on strike does not alter their right to reinstatement. However, the Respondent's subsequent offer of reemployment to some of the strikers limits its duty to compensate them for lost wages to a period from February 17 to the dates on which job offers subsequently were extended. As to the two service advisors to whom no reinstatement offers were made, the Respondent is obligated to promptly offer them their positions back and make them whole for any loss of earnings incurred as a result of its continuing refusal to reinstate them.

[8] See Member Jenkins' dissent in Burlington Homes, supra at 1033. The majority in that case disagreed with Member Jenkins' view that the strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike, since the strikers were unaware of the employer's wage offer and, even after the General Counsel learned of the employer's unlawful conduct during an investigation of the original charge, no amended charge was ever filed alleging that the wage offer to the replacements was unlawful. See Burlington Homes, supra at 1032 fn. 11. These factors distinguish Burlington from the present case.

[9] Striking employees who were permanently replaced prior to the September 10 conversion date are entitled to reinstatement to their former or substantially similar jobs as they become available before those jobs are offered to new employees. See Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99, 103–105 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970). Jt. Exh. 1 attempts to detail the employment history of the replacement workers but I find that document somewhat confusing. An examination of this exhibit suggests that only Ronald Morgan was permanently replaced by an employee hired prior to September 10. Should his position become available by the departure of the replacement, he must be recalled unless he has obtained regular and substantially equivalent employment elsewhere. Another new employee, J. Astrologo, was hired as a polisher on September 2 to replace David Churchill, but Astrologo was terminated a month later. At that point in time, Churchill was entitled to be recalled on offering unconditionally to return. Instead, the Respondent hired another replacement, Giordino, on June 30. Additionally, the General Counsel submits that Lyke, a parts driver, was permanently replaced. However, Jt. Exh. 1 shows that Lyke was rehired and terminated again in August. I leave the unraveling of Lyke's ambiguous employment status, as well as other questions affecting which employees may have been permanently replaced, to the compliance stage of this proceeding.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all times material herein, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All service shop employees, including service writers, mechanics, "A" parts persons, "B" parts persons, drivers, polishers, foremen polishers, utility persons, tow truck drivers, and dispatchers employed by the Respondent at its facility, excluding office clerical employees, new and used car salesmen, guards, watchmen, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. Since about September 1, 1982, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by unilaterally, without prior notice to and consultation or bargaining with Local 259, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, offering to pay and paying its replacement mechanics a greater hourly wage rate and a higher weekly minimum wage than was offered to the Union during contract negotiations.

5. The strike which began on July 27, 1982, was prolonged by the Respondent's unfair labor practices as described in paragraph 4 above, thereby converting the striking employees into unfair labor practice strikers on September 10, 1982.

6. Notwithstanding the Union's unconditional request for reemployment on behalf of the strikers, the Respondent denied them prompt reinstatement, thereby discriminating against Ronald Miller, Lawrence C. DeVita, George Caimi, William McCauley, Edward Palocnick, Vincent Romano, Timothy Jaczola, Lawrence J. DeVita, George Smith, and Edward Strobino, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. By failing at all times to offer reinstatement to two of the strikers, Edward Strobino and George Smith, notwithstanding their unconditional requests to return, the Respondent prolonged the strike in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

8. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. As found above, the Respondent unilaterally and without consultation with the Union granted an increase in the hourly wage rate and a higher guaranteed workweek to striker replacements without bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and such conduct unlawfully discriminated against the strikers. Accordingly, the Respondent shall be ordered to cease and desist from engaging further in such practices and, on request, the Respondent shall revoke all unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment in the aforesaid unit.

The Respondent also was found to have violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by denying reinstatement to the strikers after they unconditionally requested reemployment to their former or substantially equivalent positions. Subsequently, the Respondent offered reinstatement to eight of the strikers but failed to offer positions to the two service advisers. Consequently, I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to offer to the strikers who were not permanently replaced prior to September 10, 1982, immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights which they formerly enjoyed, discharging any replacements if necessary. Further, I shall recommend that the Respondent be required to make all strikers whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to reinstate them immediately on their tendering unconditional offers to return to work. Such compensation shall be computed from the date of the Respondent's refusal to return them to work to the date that offers of reinstatement may have been made in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Payroll and other records in the Respondent's possession shall be made available to the Board or its agents to assist the backpay computation.

While the unfair labor practice findings herein are not inconsequential, the record does not reflect any previous history of similar findings against the Respondent nor does it demonstrate union animus or bad faith in the negotiations. Under these circumstances, I find it appropriate to recommend the narrow injunctive language "in any like or related manner." See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

15 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 29 March 1983 Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act under NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), by preventing employee Lehman's union representative from participating in an investigatory interview of Lehman. As a remedy for the Weingarten violation, the judge, applying Kraft Foods, 251 NLRB 598 (1980), recommended that the Respondent be required to make whole employee Lehman for lost wages resulting from the Respondent's discipline of him for alleged insubordination. However, in our recent decision in Taracorp Inc., 273 NLRB 221 (1984), we overruled Kraft Foods and held that Section 10(c) of the Act precludes a make-whole remedy for Weingarten violations where the discipline of an employee is for cause.[4] Accordingly, consistent with Taracorp, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order to delete the make-whole and expunction remedies. We shall order the Respondent to cease and desist from depriving any employee of his right to union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes might result in disciplinary action, by requiring the union representative to remain silent throughout the interview. We shall further order the Respondent to post an appropriate notice.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Greyhound Lines, Inc., Phoenix, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragraphs 2(a), (b), and (c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] In its exceptions the Respondent contends that the Union waived the right of employees to have union representation at investigatory interviews by failing to file a grievance over the Respondent's written policy of requiring union representatives to remain silent at such interviews. Member Hunter notes that, although the judge did not address this issue, it is undisputed that such policy was not embodied in the parties' collective-bargaining agreement and that the Union did not otherwise expressly agree to the policy. Furthermore, he notes that the record contains evidence that the Union opposed the Respondent's policy in communications with the Respondent's corporate headquarters and by filing unfair labor practice charges. Without reaching the issue of whether a union can waive employees' Weingarten rights, Member Hunter finds that in the circumstances here the Union did not clearly and unmistakably waive such rights.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

At fn. 16 of his decision the judge referred to "Section 8(c)" of the Act, whereas it is clear from the context that he meant to refer to Sec. 10(c). This inadvertent error does not affect our decision.

[3] Member Hunter notes that at fn. 13 of his decision, the judge cited Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 262 NLRB 1048 (1982), a case in which Member Hunter dissented. Since the judge did not rely on that case to find a violation Member Hunter's disagreement with that case does not affect his view of the present case. Member Dennis finds it unnecessary to pass on Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co.

[4] As further explained in Taracorp, discipline is "for cause" within the meaning of Sec. 10(c) if the employee was not disciplined for union or other protected concerted activity and the reason for the discipline was not, itself, an unfair labor practice. Since it is clear in the present case that employee Lehman was not disciplined for asserting his right to union representation in the investigatory interview, but for alleged insubordination, his discipline was "for cause" within the meaning of Sec. 10(c) and a make-whole remedy is therefore precluded.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT deprive any employee of his right to union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes may result in disciplinary action, by requiring the union representative to remain silent throughout the interview.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

GREYHOUND LINES, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me in New York, New York, on December 16, 1982.[1] The charge in the case was filed on July 20, 1981, and the complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 2 of the Board on October 26, 1981.

In substance, the complaint alleges that on March 11, 1981, the Respondent conducted an investigatory interview with Harry Lehman, during which it did not allow Lehman's union representative to participate. As a consequence, the General Counsel contends that the Respondent is liable for the subsequent discharge of Lehman and is required to make him whole from the date of his discharge until the date that he was subsequently reinstated pursuant to an arbitration award.

The Respondent denies that it did not allow the union representative to participate in the aforesaid interview. It also asserts that the decision to discharge Lehman was made prior to the interview and that it did not base its decision upon any information received during the interview. Thus, according to the Respondent, even if it is concluded that the interview was not conducted in accordance with the standards set forth in NLRB v. J. Weingarten[2] the Respondent nevertheless is not liable for backpay because it would have discharged Lehman notwithstanding the interview.

Based on the entire record in this proceeding, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and upon the arguments of counsel, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Greyhound Lines, Inc. is a California corporation engaged in the business of providing interstate bus transportation. It has facilities and terminals throughout the United States, including the terminal involved, located at 625 Eighth Avenue, New York, New York. Annually, the Company derives gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the transportation of passengers, freight, and commodities from New York to points located outside the State of New York. It is conceded by the Respondent and therefore concluded that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is agreed by the parties that Local 1202, Amalgamated Transit Union, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

It appears that the Respondent has maintained a collective-bargaining relationship with the Amalgamated Transit Union for many years and that Local 1202 has been the local union recognized as the representative of certain of the Respondent's New York employees, including employees who work at 625 Eighth Avenue. Lehman, the Charging Party, is a member of Local 1202.

III. THE OPERATIVE FACTS

It seems that when the Supreme Court issued its decision in NLRB v. J. Weingarten, supra, the Company instituted a policy whereby at investigatory interviews an employee who requested union representation would be afforded that opportunity, but the representative would not be allowed to participate in the interview. Accordingly, the testimony in this case indicates that it was customary for management to ritually announce at the outset of all such interviews that, although a union representative was entitled to be present, the representative would be required to remain silent. In relation to this practice, it also appears that this came about not as a result of any agreement with the Union, but rather as a policy unilaterally promulgated by the Company.

On March 9, 1981, Harry Lehman had an altercation with his supervisor, Fred Perez. Basically, Lehman was asked to remove a sweater he was wearing and to put on the jacket which was part of his uniform. When Lehman refused, he got into an argument with Perez and made a few intemperate remarks to the latter. As a consequence, Lehman was told to punch out for the remainder of his shift and to report on March 10 to the office of the director of terminals, Robert Langan. On the same day, the Company made a check of Lehman's bank (cash register), but found everything to be in order.[3]

On March 10 Lehman went to the terminal but found that Langan was not in. He was told to go home and not to punch in. He also was told to report to Langan's office on the following day.

About 10 a.m. on March 11 Lehman called the Union and asked to have a representative accompany him to the interview scheduled for that afternoon. As none of the union representatives were available and, as the Company refused to postpone the meeting, an employee named Pierri (who formerly was a shop steward) was designated by the Union to represent Lehman. On the same morning, Langan notified Union Agent Axelrod that Lehman was going to need a representative for the interview.[4]

---

[1] Although previously consolidated with Cases 2–CA–18738 and 2–CA–18830, the General Counsel moved to sever those cases and have them remanded to the Regional Director in view of an agreement by the parties to have the issues therein submitted to arbitration. I granted this motion.

[2] 420 U.S. 251 (1975).

[3] Lehman had previously been suspended in December 1980 for failing to follow instructions.

[4] Apparently this was during a telephone conversation when Axelrod asked the Company to postpone the meeting because no union agents were available.

The meeting commenced about 1 p.m. and present for the Company were O'Toole and Langan. According to Pierri and Lehman, at the outset of the meeting they were told that, although Pierri could be present, he had to remain silent during the interview. From that point on Lehman was asked a series of questions based on reports previously submitted on March 10 by Perez and a Mr. Simpson. Lehman responded to the questions and to a large extent admitted the matters contained in the aforementioned reports. At one point during the meeting, Pierri started to ask a question, and was told that, although he normally would not be allowed to speak, he would be given some leeway because he had not been a union representative for some time.[5] Pierri testified that, although he did ask one question, he thereafter remained silent because he understood the Company's instructions and policy to mean that he was not permitted to participate in the interview. At the close of the interview, Lehman indicated that he might have been a little uptight on March 9, as his wife was sick and he was under a lot of pressure. At this point, the interview concluded and Lehman and Pierri were asked to leave for about 10 to 15 minutes. When they returned, Lehman was told that his employment was being terminated and he was handed a document called a "Form Six," which read as follows:

> On the above date you committed the below listed infractions.
> 1. You failed to comply with your supervisors instructions.
> 2. You used loud and abusive lanaguage and acted in an ungentlemanly like manner in front of Greyhound customers.
> 3. You showed gross disrespect towards your supervisor.
> Your record is hereby charged with the above listed infractions.
> Due to the seriousness of the infractions listed above, you are hereby discharged from Greyhound Lines Inc. effective 3-11-81.[6]

Respondent's witnesses, O'Toole and Langan, asserted that the decision to discharge Lehman was made on March 10, based on the reports submitted that day by Perez and Simpson. In essence, they assert that the interview was, in reality, a formality held in part because a few arbitrators had concluded, in agreement with the Union's contention, that such interviews were required under the collective-bargaining agreement as a precondition for discharge.[7] However, it is clear that at no time prior to the interview, and at no time during the interview itself, did O'Toole or Langan tell Lehman that either a decision to discharge him had been made or that such a decision was ever contemplated. Indeed, from Lehman's point of view (and mine), it seems that the Company's representatives were conducting a thorough and searching interrogation of Lehman so as to ascertain whether the latter contested or admitted the facts reported by Perez and Simpson. In fact, Lehman admitted most of the facts and it was only after the interview was concluded that he was told of the discharge decision. Also, it was only after the interview had ended that the form 6 was prepared and given to Lehman. Moreover, although Langan testified that the decision had been made before the interview commenced, he did acknowledge that he could have been persuaded to change his mind if the interview had adduced evidence of other mitigating circumstances. For example, Langan stated that if he had learned that Lehman was faced with a serious family illness he would have been "very sympathetic to him." As noted above, Lehman did refer to an illness to his wife, but the details thereof were not explored. Perhaps if Pierri did not feel inhibited by the Company's policy of barring his participation, this might have been an area in which he could have elicited facts in support of Lehman.

With respect to Pierri's involvement in the meeting, both Langan and O'Toole testified that when Pierri tried to interject, they told him that although they normally would not allow the representative to speak, they would make an "exception" in his case. In this regard, they conceded, however, that this exception was contrary to company policy as it existed at that time.

Subsequent to his discharge, Lehman filed a grievance on March 27, 1981, and an arbitration hearing was held on February 5, 1982. The issue presented for arbitration was solely whether the discharge of Lehman was for sufficient cause under the collective-bargaining agreement. The issue in this case, involving whether Lehman was denied his right to union representation at the interview on March 11, 1981, was neither presented to the arbitration forum nor decided.[8] It is noted that at the arbitration hearing the Company attempted to put into evidence the transcript of the March 11 interview, no doubt to show that Lehman had previously admitted the alleged acts of misconduct upon which the Company based its discharge decision. However, these notes were rejected by the arbitration panel and were not received into evidence.

On April 23, 1982, Arbitrator Thomas A. Knowlton issued a decision concluding that Lehman's conduct on March 9 was not sufficiently serious so as to warrant his discharge. Accordingly, the Company was ordered to reinstate Lehman to his former job and the Company complied. However, the arbitrator refused to grant Lehman any backpay for the period that he was unemployed.

[5] During the interview, Langan made handwritten notes which were typed up in the form of a transcript.

[6] Shortly thereafter, Lehman was given a corrected copy of the form 6 which changed the final sentence to, "Due to the seriousness of the infractions listed above, and your past work record, you are hereby discharged from Greyhound Line Inc. effective 3-11-81."

[7] With some limited exceptions, the collective-bargaining agreement requires that a full investigation be made prior to a discharge. Other arbitrators, who have heard cases involving the Company, have held that the "full investigation" requirement may be met without the need to interview the employee affected.

[8] The Respondent does not contend that this case should be deferred to the arbitrator's award under the standards of Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955).

IV. ANALYSIS

In NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), the Supreme Court held that an employee has a Section 7 right to request union representation at an investigatory interview where the employee reasonably believes that the investigation will result in disciplinary action. In reaching this conclusion the Court approved the Board's rationale and stated:

> The Board's construction also gives recognition to the right when it is most useful to both employee and employer. A single employee confronted by an employer investigating whether certain conduct deserves discipline may be too fearful or inarticulate to relate accurately the incident being investigated, or too ignorant to raise extenuating factors. A knowledgeable union representative could assist the employer by eliciting favorable facts, and save the employer production time by getting to the bottom of the incident occasioning the interview. Certainly his presence need not transform the interview into an adversary contest. Respondent suggests nonetheless that union representation at this stage is unnecessary because a decision as to employee culpability or disciplinary action can be corrected after the decision to impose discipline has become final. In other words, respondent would defer representation until the filing of a formal grievance challenging the employer's determination of guilt after the employee has been discharged or otherwise disciplined. At that point, however, it becomes increasingly difficult for the employee to vindicate himself, and the value of representation is correspondingly diminished. The employer may then be more concerned with justifying his actions than re-examining them.

While the Supreme Court dealt with the question of whether an employer may deny a request for union representation in investigatory interviews, it did not specifically address another and older line of cases where the Board had concluded that an employer violates the Act when it denies an employee union representation during a disciplinary interview.[9] Thus, it is settled that the right to union representation is held at an investigatory interview, but that such a right does not adhere to "run-of-the mill shop floor conversations, as for example, the giving of instructions on training or needed corrections of work techniques."[10]

Subsequent to the Board's decision in Certified Grocers, 227 NLRB 1211 (1977),[11] where it held that the Weingarten rights applied to disciplinary meetings, the Board reversed itself in Baton Rouge Water Works, 246 NLRB 995 (1979). In the latter case, a majority of the Board drew a distinction between those meetings where the sole purpose was to notify an employer of disciplinary action already decided and those meetings where the purpose was otherwise. As to the former, the Board concluded that an employee had no right to union representation whereas such a right existed in the context of investigatory meetings. Yet even here, the distinction was narrowly drawn and the Board noted (246 NLRB at 997):

> We stress that we are not holding today that there is no right to the presence of a union representative at any "disciplinary" interview. Indeed, if the employer engages in any conduct beyond merely informing the employee of a previously made disciplinary decision, the full panoply of protections accorded the employee under Weingarten may be applicable. Thus, for example, were the employer to inform the employee of a disciplinary action and then seek facts or evidence in support of that action, or to attempt to have the employee admit his alleged wrongdoing or to sign a statement to that effect, or to sign statements relating to such matters as workmen's compensation, such conduct would remove the meeting from the narrow holding of the instant case, and the employee's right to union representation would attach. In contrast, the fact that the employer and employee thereafter engaged in a conversation at the employee's behest or instigation concerning the reasons for the previously determined discipline will not, alone, convert the meeting to an interview at which the Weingarten protections apply.
> In summary, as long as the employer has reached a final, binding decision to impose certain discipline on the employee prior to the interview, based on facts and evidence obtained prior to the interview, no Section 7 right to union representation exists under Weingarten when the employer meets with the employee simply to inform him of, or impose, that previously determined discipline. To the extent that the Board has in the past distinguished between investigatory and disciplinary interviews, in light of Weingarten and our instant holding, we no longer believe such a distinction to be workable or desirable. It was this distinction which Certified Grocers abandoned, and to that extent we still believe the decision was correct. Thus, the full purview of protections accorded employees under Weingarten apply to both "investigatory" and "disciplinary" interviews, save only those conducted for the exclusive purpose of notifying an employee of previously determined disciplinary action.[12]

Following the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Weingarten, supra, there existed some confusion as to precisely what role a union representative would play during the course of a meeting and it appears that some companies, like Greyhound, took the position that the union representative should remain silent. On August 27, 1980, the Board issued two decisions which dealt with this issue, each of which concluded that an employer could not insist or require a union representative to remain silent at an interview at which the employee had the right to have his representative present. Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 251 NLRB 612 (1980), and Texaco, 251 NLRB 633 (1980).[13] In the former case the Board stated:

> In agreeing with the Administrative Law Judge's findings and conclusions on this issue, it is our view that the Supreme Court, in the course of its Weingarten decision, intended to strike a careful balance between the right of an employer to investigate the conduct of its employees at a personal interview, and the role to be played by a statutory representative who is present at such an interview. It is clear from the Supreme Court's decision that the role of the statutory representative at an investigatory interview is to provide "assistance" and "counsel" to the employee being interrogated. However, the Supreme Court made it equally clear that the presence of the statutory representative "need not transform the interview into an adversary contest," or indeed, any type of collective-bargaining confrontation. Clearly, then, an employer's right to regulate the role of the statutory represntative at an investigatory interview is limited to a reasonable prevention of such a collective-bargaining or adversary confrontation with the statutory representative.
> In the instant case, the Respondent, by demanding the silence of Gottschalk's union steward until after Gottschalk had confessed to the charges, did not engage in a reasonable prevention of a collective-bargaining or adversary confrontation with the statutory representative. Rather, the Respondent attempted from the very outset of the interview to stifle any participation by the union steward during the intervew. At the time that Hubbard demanded McQuiller's silence, there was no indication that McQuiller had sought or would seek to turn the interview into a collective-bargaining or adversary confrontation.
> We note, further, that the interview itself, as well as its outcome, demonstrates the critical need for the rights granted to employees under Weingarten. For as the Supreme Court stated in Weingarten, often "an investigative interview is conducted by security specialists; the employee does not confront a supervisor who is known or familiar to him, but a stranger trained in interrogation techniques." Similarly, Gottschalk was confronted at the interview by Hubbard, a security supervisor and former FBI agent who was trained in interrogation techniques and who used those techniques to procure a total written confession from Gottschalk. Obviously, the mere silent presence of Gottschalk's union steward at the interview was insufficient to alter the imbalance which the Supreme Court sought to alleviate in its Weingarten opinion.

In enforcing the Board's decision in Texaco, supra, the court, in NLRB v. Texaco, 659 F.2d 124, stated:

> The more novel and significant contention advanced by Texaco is that the right to a union representative at an investigatory interview does not encompass any right to have the union representative speak. Texaco cites language from Weingarten, in which the Court, after noting that the employer has no duty to bargain with the union representative at an interview, stated:
> > "The representative is present to assist the employee, and may attempt to clarify the facts or suggest other employees who may have knowledge of them. The employer, however, is free to insist that he is only interested, at that time, in hearing the employee's own account of the matter under investigation." Brief for Petitioner, at 22.
> 420 U.S. at 260, 95 S.Ct. at 965. We agree with the Board here that this language (taken by the Court from the Board's brief in Weingarten) is directed toward avoiding a bargaining session or a purely adversary confrontation with the union representative and to assure the employer the opportunity to hear the employee's own account of the incident under investigation. The passage does not state that the employer may bar the union representative from any participation. Such an inference is wholly contrary to other language in the Weingarten opinion which explains that the representative should be able to take an active role in assisting the employee to present the facts.
> In refusing to permit the representative to speak, and relegating him to the role of a passive observer, the respondent did not afford the employee the representation to which he was entitled. The Board properly found that Texaco violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In relation to these types of cases, another problem has had to be dealt with, namely the question of remedial relief. In this respect, the problem arises because there are circumstances where even though an interview was conducted in violation of the employees' Section 7 rights, it nevertheless is apparent that the discipline was justified and not issued for discriminatory reasons.[14] In Kraft Foods, 251 NLRB 598 (1980), a Board majority (Member Jenkins dissenting in part) reversed the recommendation of an administrative law judge to the effect that the employee be reinstated with backpay, because it

[13] The Board's decision in Texaco was enforced in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals on October 16, 1981, 659 F.2d 124.

It is noted that in Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 262 NLRB 1048 (1982), the Board concluded that the Company violated the Act when it refused to permit employees to consult with their union representatives prior to interviews which they had reason to believe would result in discipline.

[14] Sec. 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act provides, inter alia, that "[n]o order of the Board shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause."

was shown that the employer's decision was not based on any information obtained during the unlawful interview.[15] In this respect, the Board announced the following standard to be applied:

> In determining the appropriate remedy for a respondent's violation of an employee's Weingarten rights, the Board applies the following analysis. Initially, we determine whether the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that a make-whole remedy such as reinstatement, backpay, and expungement of all disciplinary records is warranted. The General Counsel can make this showing by proving that respondent conducted an investigatory interview in violation of Weingarten and that the employee whose rights were violated was subsequently disciplined for the conduct which was the subject of the unlawful interview.
> In the face of such a showing, the burden shifts to the respondent. Thus, in order to negate the prima facie showing of the appropriateness of a make-whole remedy, the respondent must demonstrate that its decision to discipline the employee in question was not based on information obtained at the unlawful interview. Where the respondent meets its burden, a make-whole remedy will not be ordered. Instead, we will provide our traditional cease-and-desist order in remedy of the 8(a)(1) violation.[16]

There is no question in my mind that when Lehman was notified to report to Langan on March 10 and 11, after his altercation with Supervisor Perez on March 9, 1981 (and after his bank had also been checked), that he had a reasonable basis for believing that the forthcoming interview might lead to disciplinary action. Also, the facts show that on March 10 Lehman asked to have a union representative accompany him to the interview, a request which was communicated to Langan on that date by Union Agent Axelrod who asked for a postponement due to the unavailability of any current union officials. In fact, during a conversation between Axelrod and Langan on March 10, the latter specifically stated that Lehman was going to need a representative for the upcoming interview.

I am also of the opinion that at the commencement of the interview on March 11, the Company, as per its policy and practice, advised Pierri (designated by the Union to represent Lehman) that although he could be present as a witness he would have to remain silent and not participate. The fact that this instruction is not contained in the notes made of this meeting by Langan does not alter my conclusion in this respect as it appears that this was, at the time, the Company's policy, was invariably expressed at the outset of such interviews and was, in a sense, a form or ritualized notice made preliminary to these kinds of meetings. As such, a preliminary notice of this nature would not likely be written down in a set of notes which, on their face, deal with the substantive discussion that took place. As I am of the opinion that Pierri and Lehman were honest and credible witnesses, I therefore conclude that such a notice was given to Pierri at the outset of the interview. In addition, although O'Toole and Langan testified that during the meeting they told Pierri that they would make an exception to his participation in the meeting, Langan's notes merely reflect that Pierri on one occasion was told that he would be allowed some leeway. Apart from asking one question, Pierri did not otherwise participate. Given the initial notice, and the admitted company policy to preclude union representatives from participating in investigatory interviews, I do not believe that the Company's statement that it would allow Pierri some "leeway" was sufficient to lead him to reasonably conclude that his participation would be unfettered. In fact, Pierri credibly testified that, although he may have asked one or possibly two questions, he essentially remained silent becaue he was aware that it was the Company's policy to preclude union representatives from participating in investigatory interviews, and that this policy was reiterated at the outset of the meeting.

In view of the above, it therefore is concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling Lehman's union representative that he could not participate in the interview, such notification not being sufficiently mitigated by the statement that he would be allowed some leeway.

Notwithstanding my conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, it seems to me that the issue as to whether to order backpay in this case is not free from doubt. Recognizing that some of the circuit courts (the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth) have refused to enforce such remedies in similar cases, I am nevertheless constrained to follow Board precedent.[17] Yet even [15] In Kraft Foods, the employee denied, at the interview, that he was involved in a fight. The employer's decision to discharge the employee was based on interviews with other witnesses who had observed the fight.

It is noted however that some of the circuit courts have taken a somewhat different approach from the Board regarding the remedy. In NLRB v. Potter Signal Co., 600 F.2d 120 (8th Cir. 1979), that court held that even where an employee was denied his right to representation, a backpay and reinstatement order was precluded by Sec. 8(c) of the Act, if the discharge was motivated by misconduct and not because the employee insisted on his representational rights. See also Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB, 664 F.2d 1095 (8th Cir. 1981); General Motors Corp. v. NLRB, 674 F.2d 576 (6th Cir. 1982); and NLRB v. Kahns & Co., 694 F.2d 1070 (6th Cir. 1982).

Also, in NLRB v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 674 F.2d 618 (7th Cir. 1982), it appears that the court disagreed with the Board regarding its apportionment of the respective burdens of proof. The court stated:

> In order to balance the need of the Company to maintain an honest and efficient workforce, with the duty to enforce the policies of the Act, we believe that Illinois Bell is entitled to show that its discharge of Hatfield was not solely dependent upon evidence obtained from her during the unlawful interview, but that that discharge is and was supported by other independent evidence which was available to the Company at the time of the discharge. Upon this record, we can not say that there is substantial evidence to support a finding that Hatfield's discharge stemmed solely from the Company's unfair labor practice of forcing her to participate in an interview without representation.

applying Board precedent to the facts herein is not unambiguous.

On one hand, there is no dispute that Lehman was admittedly involved in misconduct which was reported to the Company by witnesses prior to the interview. It also seems evident that, based on those reports, the Company's representatives made at least a tentative decision to impose some sort of discipline on Lehman. If I were convinced that a final and binding decision to discharge Lehman had been made prior to his interview, based solely on the reported allegations of misconduct, I would not recommend that he be made whole, notwithstanding my conclusion that he was denied his rights of representation.[18]

On the other hand, I am not convinced by the evidence that such a final or binding decision was made before the interview began. Nor am I persuaded that the information elicited from Lehman during the interview did not play a part in the final decision to discharge him. As noted above, Langan conceded that had Lehman offered a sufficient explanation for his conduct (by way of offering mitigating circumstances) he might have been persuaded to change his mind. Also it is clear that the discharge notice was not prepared until after the interview had ended, thereby tending to support the conclusion that no final decision had been made before its commencement. Additionally, it is clear that, during the interview itself, the Company did obtain vital information to support a decision for discharge, namely, Lehman's admission of the acts alleged.[19] While it cannot be said with absolute certainty whether the Company would have discharged Lehman if he had simply denied the allegations, it may also be surmised that these admissions were construed as being significant before making the decision to discharge him. Indeed, this is shown, at least in some degree, by the Company's attempt to offer into evidence, before the arbitrator, the notes of the interview containing Lehman's admissions. Thus, it may be implied that by seeking and obtaining such admissions, the Company recognized that a decision to discharge Lehman would likely be upheld in any subsequent arbitration proceeding. By the same token, had Lehman denied or adequately explained away the alleged misconduct, the Company might not have discharged him because of a perception that its chances of winning a subsequent arbitration case would be significantly reduced.

Recognizing that there exists a degree of uncertainty as to whether the Company's decision to discharge Lehman was based on information obtained during the interview or whether that decision was based solely on other independent evidence of his misconduct, it seems to me, pursuant to the authority of Kraft Foods, that the burden of persuasion is placed on the Respondent. As I am not sufficiently persuaded that the Respondent has met its burden in this respect, it is concluded that a make-whole remedy is appropriate in this case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Greyhound Lines, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 1202, Amalgamated Transit Union, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By instructing employee Harry Lehman's union representative to remain silent during an investigatory interview which Lehman was required to attend, the Respondent unlawfully deprived Lehman of his right to his union representative's counsel and assistance during the interview, thereby interfering with his rights under Section 7 of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As I have concluded above, that Respondent has not met its burden of proof for establishing that the decision to discharge Lehman was made prior to the investigatory interview and that the decision was not based solely on information received as part from the interview, it is recommended that Lehman be made whole for the period when he was unemployed[20] and that the Respondent expunge and remove from its records and files any and all reference to the interview with Lehman on March 11, 1981. As to Lehman's loss of earnings, the amount of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, Greyhound Lines, Inc., Phoenix, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

It has been the Board's consistent policy for itself to determine whether to acquiesce in the contrary views of a circuit court of appeals or whether, with due deference to the court's opinion, to adhere to its previous holding until the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled otherwise. But it is not for a Trial Examiner to speculate as to what course the Board should follow where a circuit court has expressed disagreement with its views. On the contrary, it remains the Trial Examiner's duty to apply established Board precedent which the Board or the Supreme Court has not reversed. Only by such recognition of the legal authority of Board precedent will a uniform and orderly administration of a national act, such as the National Labor Relations Act, be achieved.

[20] As Lehman already has been reinstated pursuant to an arbitrator's award, a reinstatement remedy is not required.

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Depriving any employee of his right to union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes might result in disciplinary action, by requiring the union representative to remain silent throughout the interview.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole Harry Lehman for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discharge of him on March 11, 1981, as set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Expunge from its records and files the notes of the interview conducted on March 11, 1981, with Harry Lehman as well as any references to any disciplinary action taken against him as a result of that interview.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

15 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 14 February 1983 Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached supplemental decision.[1] The General Counsel and the Respondents filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondents filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent Mead Products had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally ceasing to provide certain contractual benefits to a union officer who was on a union-related leave of absence. He also found, however, that the provision of such benefits to union officers beyond the contractually established maximum time periods for union-related leaves of absence discriminated in favor of employees elected to, or selected for, union office. He recommended, therefore, that the 8(a)(5) allegations regarding Respondent Mead Packaging's unilateral cessation of similar benefits to three other union officers be dismissed since these three had been on leaves of absence longer than permitted by the applicable collective-bargaining agreements.

The Respondents except to the judge's failure to dismiss the complaint in its entirety. They contend that these contractual benefits (a) constituted "payments" to the union officers which were proscribed by Section 302 of the Act and/or (b) unlawfully discriminated against employees who were not union officers. The Respondents contend, therefore, that their unilateral discontinuance of such assertedly unlawful payments did not violate Section 8(a)(5). For the reasons set forth below, we agree with the Respondents that the complaint should be dismissed in its entirety.

Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(b)(2) of the Act prohibit employers and unions, respectively, from discriminating against employees "in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization . . . ." Absent appropriate justification, employer or union policies are unlawful if they treat employees disparately according to their level of union activity.[2] In addition, the Board has held that collective-bargaining agreements which discourage or encourage union activities through a disparate grant of benefits are unlawful unless providing the benefit on such a basis serves legitimate statutory purposes and indirectly benefits all unit employees. Thus, in Dairylea Cooperative, 219 NLRB 656 (1975),[3] the Board found contract clauses which provided union stewards with superseniority for purposes of layoff and recall to be lawful because this extra benefit helped assure the presence of stewards on the job to process grievances and otherwise police the collective-bargaining relationship. On the other hand, the Board found similar clauses unlawful to the extent that they accorded stewards other job benefits which were unrelated to their on-the-job steward activities.

Recently, in Gulton Electro-Voice, 266 NLRB 406 (1983), enfd. sub nom. Electrical Workers UE Local 900 v. NLRB, 727 F.2d 1184 (D.C. Cir. 1984), we reaffirmed Dairylea, but overruled cases decided subsequent to it in which the Board had expanded the Dairylea holding to allow clauses which gave superseniority to union officials who do not perform steward or other on-the-job contract administration functions. We rejected the rationale set forth in those cases that superseniority for nonsteward union officers was lawful because it promoted "the effective and efficient representation of employees by their collective-bargaining representatives." Gulton, supra at 408, quoting Electrical Workers UE Local 623 (Limpco Mfg.), 230 NLRB 406, 407 (1977), enfd. sub nom. Anna M. D'Amico v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 820 (3d Cir. 1978). In sum, we found, in agreement with former Members Jenkins' and Penello's dissent in Limpco, that "the Board should not be in the business of assuring that a union has an efficient and effective organization to conduct collective bargaining where this results in the linkage of job rights and benefits to union activities . . . . To broaden the proper objective of super-seniority; i.e., to protect the whole process of collective bargaining . . . discriminatorily tips the balance against individual employee rights." Gulton, supra at 409 quoting 230 NLRB at 409.

[1] On 26 January 1982, the judge withdrew his initial decision in this proceeding, dated 12 January 1983. His supplemental decision supersedes his initial decision for all purposes.

[3] Enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Teamsters Local 338, 531 F.2d 1162 (2d Cir. 1976).

Under the Respondents' collective-bargaining agreements with the Union as implemented by the Respondents' supplemental related policies, employees may take leaves of absence for up to 4 years in order to accept employment as officers of the Union. During these union-related leaves, they continue to receive coverage under the Respondents' group insurance programs as well as contractual increases in pension benefit multipliers.[4] In contrast, employees who take other types of leave are limited to considerably shorter time periods, do not receive insurance coverage and/or pension multiplier increases for as long a time, and are prohibited from engaging in gainful employment while on leave.

As of 31 March 1981, union officers Meers, Moss, and Currie had been on union-related leaves of absence from their employment with the Respondent Mead Packaging for periods ranging from 10 to 16 years. Union Officer Turner had been on a similar leave of absence from his employment with Respondent Mead Products for nearly 4 years. While on leave, these four individuals were employed by the Union and acted as the representatives of employees of the Respondents and other employers. They engaged in contractual negotiations and arbitrations and generally monitored the employers' compliance with applicable collective-bargaining agreements. Until 31 March 1981, when the Respondents unilaterally ceased providing these benefits, they received coverage under the Respondents' group insurance programs and contractual increases in the pension multipliers.

It is apparent that the Respondents provided benefits to union officers which were not available to other employees. In order to be found lawful, this disparate treatment must "further the effective administration of bargaining agreements on the plant level by encouraging the continued presence of the steward on the job." Dairylea, supra at 658. We find that the Respondents' provision of these extra benefits to union officers did not meet this standard and, therefore, that the discriminatory impact on nonunion officer employees is much more than simply an incidental side effect of a more general benefit accorded all employees. Ibid.[5]

The General Counsel contends that these benefits were provided legitimately to the union officers because, if the benefits were unavailable, individuals would be unwilling to serve as union officers for extended periods. The Union thus would lose continuity and experience in its leadership and effectiveness as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. As noted above, however, we rejected this position in Gulton, where we found that "assuring that a union has effective and efficient organization" was insufficient justification for linking job rights and benefits to union activities.

In light of the above, if the issue were before us, we would find that the Respondents' provision of additional benefits to union officers under their collective-bargaining agreements with the Union violated Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(b)(2) of the Act. Since the Respondents merely declined to continue to provide a benefit to the union officers which, as discussed above, had an unlawful disparate impact on employees, we find that they did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by doing so without bargaining with the Union. See Interstate Paper Supply Co., 251 NLRB 1423, 1424 (1980).[6] Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[4] Under the Respondents' pension plans, employees receive a flat dollar benefit for each year of credited service. For example, an employee with 20 years of credited service and a pension benefit multiplier of $10 per month would receive $200 per month in retirement benefits. The pension benefit multiplier has increased periodically over the years.

[5] See Radio Officers v. NLRB, supra, and Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423 (1969).

[6] In light of our decision herein, we find it unnecessary to reach the Respondents' contention that these additional "payments" to the union officers were unlawful under Sec. 302 of the Act.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE[1]

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on October 13, 1982, in Atlanta, Georgia, based on charges filed by Printing Specialties & Paper Products Union, Local 527 (the Union), on April 9 and 10, 1981, and complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 10 of the National Labor Relations Board on May 22, 1981. The complaints allege that Mead Packaging and Mead Products (Respondents) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by unilaterally, without notice to or consultation with the Union, ceasing coverage under group insurance plans and pension plans for certain employees on leave of absence. Respondents' timely answers deny the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard. The parties stipulated all facts and introduced joint exhibits. In addition each party submitted a brief. Both briefs were duly considered.

On the entire record in this case, I make the following

[1] On January 12, 1983, my decision, JD-(ATL)-120-82 issued. The decision contained a substantive error and on January 26, 1983, I requested that the decision be remanded to me for correction and reissuance. This supplemental decision supersedes for all purposes that prior decision.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaints allege, Respondents admit, and I find that Mead Packaging and Mead Products, Divisions of the Mead Corporation, an Ohio corporation, are engaged in the manufacture of school and office supplies and paper cartons in Atlanta, Georgia. Jurisdiction is not in issue. Mead Packaging and Mead Products in the past 12 months, in the course and conduct of their business operations, shipped products from their Atlanta, Georgia facilities valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points located outside the State of Georgia. I conclude and find that Mead Packaging and Mead Products are employers engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaints allege, Respondents admit, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ISSUES

A. Whether Respondent Mead Packaging's cessation of providing pension benefits to employees Ralph Meers, Wilbert Currie, and Charles Moss was a violation of its statutory duty to bargain.

B. Whether Respondent Mead Packaging's cessation of group insurance coverage to employees Ralph Meers, Wilbert Currie, and Charles Moss was a violation of its statutory duty to bargain.

C. Whether Respondent Mead Products' cessation of providing pension benefits to employee Albert Turner Jr. was a violation of its statutory duty to bargain.

D. Whether Respondent Mead Products' cessation of group insurance coverage to employee Albert Turner Jr. was a violation of its statutory duty to bargain.

III. FACTS

A. Admissions in Pleadings

1. Respondent Mead Packaging, Case 10–CA–16871

All production and maintenance employees employed at its packaging and container manufacturing plants located at 950 and 1010 West Marietta Street, Atlanta, Georgia, and all auxiliary warehouses in Atlanta, Georgia, including warehouse employees, plant clerical employees, city truck drivers, leadmen, laboratory technicians; but excluding office clerical employees, planning and scheduling employees, production art employees, production control employees, professional and technical employees, guards, mail room employees, office janitors, chauffeurs, over-the-road drivers, lithographic production employees, sample makers and tracers (and assistants), inventory clerks, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

Respondent and the Union are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement, effective from March 28, 1981, until February 15, 1984, covering the employees of Respondent in the unit described in the paragraph above.

At all times since about February 15, 1979, the Union has been, and is, the representative of a majority of the employees in the unit described in the paragraph above for the purpose of collective bargaining and, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is, the exclusive representative of all employees in said unit for the purpose of collective bargaining.

2. Respondent Mead Products, Case 10–CA–16878

All production and maintenance employees and truck drivers, employed at its Atlanta, Georgia plant, including plant clerical employees and employees who work in the store-for-employees, but excluding office clerical employees in the industrial engineering department, professional employees, guards, manufacturing manager, personnel director, traffic manager, superintendents, foremen, stock control supervisor, and all other supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

Respondent and the Union are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement, effective from March 1, 1980, until February 27, 1983, covering employees of Respondent in the unit described in the paragraph above.

At all times since about March 1, 1980, the Union has been, and is, the representative of a majority of the employees in the unit described in the paragraph above for the purposes of collective bargaining and, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is, the exclusive representative of all employees in said unit for the purposes of collective bargaining.

B. Stipulated Facts

At all times since about January 1, 1960, the Union has been the representative of a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit at Respondent Mead Packaging, for the purpose of collective bargaining and, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been the exclusive representative of all employees in this unit for the purpose of collective bargaining.

At all times since about January 1, 1970, the Union has been the representative of a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit at Respondent Mead Products, for the purpose of collective bargaining and, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been the exclusive representative of all employees in this unit for the purpose of collective bargaining.

At all times material here, pursuant to the applicable labor agreement, Respondents Mead Packaging and Mead Products have each maintained a group insurance program covering employees in their respective bargaining units.

At all times material here, pursuant to the applicable labor agreement, Respondents Mead Packaging and Mead Products have each maintained a pension plan for employees in their respective bargaining units. Under these pension plans, employees receive a flat dollar benefit for each year of credited service (e.g., $10 per month x 20 years of credited service = $200 per month retirement benefit). The pension benefit multiplier (e.g., $10 per month) has periodically increased over the years through negotiations with the Union.

Ralph Meers, Wilbert Currie, Charles Moss, and Albert Turner Jr. are, and at all times material here have been, agents, officers, representatives, and employees of the Union. At all times material here, these individuals have acted on behalf of the Union in dealing with the Respondents and other employers, including acting as representatives of employees of Respondents and other employers, and being involved in negotiations and in arbitrations, and otherwise overseeing the Respondents' and other employers' compliance with the applicable labor agreements.

Since about October 4, 1965, Ralph Meers has been on leave of absence from Respondent Mead Packaging to hold a full-time position as president of the Union. During this time, Meers has been employed full time by the Union, has been compensated for his employment by the Union, and has performed no work for Respondent Mead Packaging. Prior to October 4, 1965, Ralph Meers was employed by Respondent Mead Packaging in the bargaining unit.

Since about January 11, 1971, Wilbert Currie has been on leave of absence from Respondent Mead Packaging to hold full-time positions as vice president and then secretary-treasurer business agent of the Union. During this time, Currie has been employed full time by the Union, has been compensated for this employment by the Union, and has performed no work for Respondent Mead Packaging. Prior to January 11, 1971, Wilbert Currie was employed by Respondent Mead Packaging in the bargaining unit.

Since about November 1, 1965, Charles Moss has been on leave of absence from Respondent Mead Packaging to hold full-time positions as secretary-treasurer business agent and then secretary-treasurer representative at the district level of the Union. During this time, Moss has been employed full time by the Union, has been compensated for this employment by the Union, and has performed no work for Respondent Mead Packaging. Prior to November 1, 1965, Charles Moss was employed by Respondent Mead Packaging in the bargaining unit.

Since about May 2, 1977, Albert Turner Jr. has been on leave of absence from Respondent Mead Products to hold a full-time position as vice president of the Union. During this time, Turner has been employed full time by the Union, has been compensated for this employment by the Union, and has performed no work for Respondent Mead Products. Prior to May 2, 1977, Albert Turner Jr. was employed by Respondent Mead Products in the bargaining unit.

Prior to April 1, 1981, while on leave of absence, Ralph Meers, Wilbert Currie, Charles Moss, and Albert Turner Jr. were covered under the respective group insurance programs. During this period, Respondent Mead Packaging paid all group insurance premiums for Meers, Currie, and Moss, as it did for active bargaining unit employees. During this period, Respondent Mead Products partially paid Turner's group insurance premiums, as it did for active bargaining unit employees. In the year 1980, for example, Respondent Mead Packaging paid monthly insurance premiums of $133.15 per individual for Meers, Currie, and Moss. In 1980, Respondent Mead Products paid monthly insurance premiums of $29.47 for Turner.

Prior to April 1, 1981, while on leaves of absence, Ralph Meers, Wilbert Currie, Charles Moss, and Albert Turner Jr. received the negotiated improvements in the pension benefit multiplier.

About April 1, 1981, Respondent Mead Packaging, by letter, individually informed Ralph Meers, Wilbert Currie, and Charles Moss that their participation in Respondent Mead Packaging's group insurance program would be discontinued effective April 30, 1981, and that their pension benefits under Respondent Mead Packaging's pension plan would be frozen as of March 31, 1981, with no future increases in the pension benefit multiplier. Respondent Mead Packaging notified the above individuals that this action was being taken upon advice of legal counsel that continuation of these benefits, while they were on leaves of absence for full-time employment with the Union, violated the provisions of Section 302, Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C., § 186. This was the first notification to these individuals of the intended action. The Union, through Meers, responded in writing to the Company on April 14.

About March 31, 1981, Respondent Mead Products informed Albert Turner Jr. that his participation in Respondent Mead Products' group insurance program would be discontinued effective April 30, 1981, and that his pension benefits under Respondent Mead Products' pension plan would be frozen as of March 31, 1981, with no future increases in the pension benefit multiplier. Respondent Mead Products notified Turner that this action was being taken upon advice of legal counsel that continuation of these benefits, while he was on leave of absence for full-time employment with the Union, violated the provisions of Section 302, Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C., § 186. This was the first notification to Turner of the intended action. The Union, through Meers, responded to the Company in writing on April 14, 1981.

Other than for union employment as elected or appointed union officials, Respondents Mead Packaging and Mead Products never allow a leave of absence to take another job.

Under the Mead Products labor agreement, leaves of absence, other than for union employment as elected or appointed union officials, are limited to 2 years. Mead Products employees on leave of absence, for any reason other than union employment as elected or appointed union officials, cannot continue and have not continued to participate in the group insurance program or to receive negotiated improvements in the pension benefit multiplier for a period longer than 2 years.

At all times material here, the policy of Respondent Mead Packaging, and the practice under that policy, has been as follows: personal leaves of absence are less than 1 year; individuals on medical leaves of absence are not permitted to continue participation in the group insurance program for more than 18 months and medical leaves of absence are less than 3 years. Mead Packaging employees on leave of absence for any reason other than union employment as elected or appointed union officials cannot continue, and have not continued, to participate in the group insurance program for longer than 18 months or to receive negotiated improvements in the pension benefit multiplier for longer than 3 years. This specific policy was not established through negotiations with the Union.

Participation in Respondent Mead Packaging or Respondent Mead Products' group insurance plan, even if the individual pays the full premium, is a substantial benefit and thing of value to the individual. Premiums under either of Respondents' group insurance plans are much lower than premiums for equivalent coverage under an individual policy. For example, the full premium cost per individual under Mead Products' group insurance plan is $84.50 per month. However, the premium cost if an individual converts from Mead Products' group plan to an individual policy of comparable, but less inclusive, coverage is $169.70 per month.

Analysis and Conclusions

In order to prove a violation of Section 8(a)(5), the General Counsel must prove that a company unilaterally changed conditions of employment either embodied in the collective-bargaining agreement or established as a past practice. It is undisputed that a change was made by the Respondents and without notice to, or consultation with, the Union. However, whether the admitted unilateral change constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is another matter.[2]

The General Counsel contends that because pension plans and health insurance benefits are mandatory subjects of bargaining and because employees on leaves of absence can participate in such benefits through the Respondents' past practices, any change in benefits received must be negotiated between the parties. To support its contention, the General Counsel quotes Board language, "the bargaining representative is entitled to an opportunity to present arguments to the employer, to dissuade him from effecting the change, and also an opportunity to propose alternatives or compromises which might moderate the change so as to accommodate the interests of the employees as well as the employer." (Emphasis added.) The General Counsel argues that to allow the Respondents to alter the benefits received by employees on leaves of absence would dissuade employees from serving their Union because they would be unwilling to sacrifice their pension and health benefits which in turn would cause unions to lose continuity and experience of leadership.

Respondents contend that the change was made to correct what had progressed into a violation of Section 302, thus requiring the Respondents to discontinue the benefits or be liable for a Section 302 violation.

The General Counsel correctly states that the Board does not possess jurisdiction to construe substantive provisions of Section 302 and has in the past declined to do so.[3] However, the Board cannot and does not ignore the language nor the intent of Section 302 when deciding unfair labor practices. As in the Metal Workers case there is a balance to be struck.

Respondents would tip this balance toward immunity for unilateral changes resulting in a refusal to bargain, citing the Boyle case.[4]

In my view, both the Sheet Metal Workers case and the Boyle case are distinguishable from the instant case. The Sheet Metal Workers case turned on the Board's refusal to analyze a trust agreement in terms of compliance with Section 302. Thus, the Board would not determine that an agreement was valid under Section 302 and enforce compliance therewith. In Boyle, the Board simply acknowledged the expressed language of Section 302 and determined that it could not force an employer to affirmatively perform under a contract where the conduct would not conform to Section 302. In neither case was the Board dealing with past affirmative conduct that in itself constituted an alleged refusal to bargain. Here, admitted conduct in the past has been changed and that change is alleged as a refusal to bargain.

The facts of this case, albeit simple, do not lessen the paradoxical nature of the circumstances.

All parties acknowledge and claim the dual capacity of the individuals involved supports their respective contentions. In my view, such dual capacity presents the real issue to be resolved. I find the single identity of Meers as a claimant for benefits and the spokesman of the Union arguing for enforcement of the contract and past practices to be instructive to my determination. I find further support for this instruction in the General Counsel's contention (supported by facts) that, failing an unfair labor practice finding, unions could not get employees to serve as officers because the officers would not be allowed preferential treatment.

The parties negotiated terms for leaves of absence for employees. The terms in the contracts place limitations and restrictions on such employee leaves of absence. The past practice of implementing the leave clauses of the contracts also enforces limitations on employees granted a leave of absence. The maximum leave of absence which can be granted is 4 years for employees elected or appointed to official positions with the Union. Clearly, the parties contracted that an employee on leave of absence to serve the Union could only do so for 4 years.[5] At the end of the 4 years the employee could either return to his employment classification with no loss of seniority and other benefits, or the employee could continue with the Union and sever his employee relationship. No other purposes could be served for a 4-year limitation.[6] Additionally, only employees granted union-related leaves of absence can be employed while on leave from Respondent. Under the contracts' terms and preexisting practices, employee leaves of absence for reasons unrelated to the Union were more restricted in that leaves were not allowed in excess of 3 years with some leaves limited to less than 1 year. In all nonunion employee leaves of absence, the maximum enjoyment of contractual benefits, including group health insurance and pension benefits, was for 3 years.[7]

[6] The contracts state that the leave is restricted to 2 years, but can be extended for an additional 2 years by agreement.

[7] Thus, all leaves of absence would have the same effect under the contracts.

Of the four individuals involved only one, Turner, had been on a union-related leave less than 4 years at the time of Respondent's unilateral change in benefits. The other three, Meers, Moss, and Currie, have exceeded the 4-year restriction considerably. In each case the group insurance benefits and the pension benefits have continued as if each was an active employee on the Respondents' payrolls or otherwise entitled to such benefits by past practices or by contract.

Respondents recognized the continued receipt of employee benefits as an error and corrected it by ceasing benefits for all. The General Counsel and the Union view the cessation as a violation since the Respondent did not bargain over the cessations but rather unilaterally ceased the benefits.

The General Counsel's case is based upon the contract terms respecting leaves of absence which the Union negotiated with Respondent and the past practices employed under the negotiated contract. One thing is crystal clear. The Union and the Respondent could not negotiate a leave of absence clause that would dictate loss of benefits for nonunion employee leaves of absence while allowing union-related employee leaves of absence to continue enjoying contractual benefits ad infinitum. Such attempts would be proscribed because the receipt of benefits would be discriminatory in favor of employees elected or selected to union offices. Albeit terms of union leaves can, by contract, be in excess of any other leaves of absence, the ultimate employment relationship cannot be jeopardized or favored depending upon any employee's union affiliation. Likewise employees granted union-related leaves of absence can engage in outside employment (for the Union) throughout the term of the leave but at its termination the employee must make an election to return to the bargaining unit or remain in the Union's employ. All employees must be treated equally with regard to the contractual benefits received as a result of the employment relationship. To allow otherwise would place a greater emphasis upon serving the union in an official capacity and would unnecessarily involve the employer in encouraging union participation at expense of the employee work force. I find no probative support for the General Counsel's case in the fact that Meers and Moss have received contractual benefits from Respondent Packaging for the 16 years that each has been an officer of the Union pursuant to a union-related leave of absence begun in 1965. Nor is Turner's similar situation since 1977 and Currie's since 1971 any different. The General Counsel's argument in brief that any cessation of benefits for the union officials would be detrimental to the Union's administration of its affairs is unavailing on two counts. The Union could not demand in negotiations preferential treatment for prounion employees, resulting in greater benefits for the prounion employees, than for employees in the bargaining unit who have no desire to serve the Union. Additionally, Respondents are not required to negotiate aid for administration of the affairs of the Union. Contract terms are negotiated for the benefit of employees in the bargaining unit and must be uniform for all employees without regard for individual desires to serve the Union outside the workplace.

Respondents cite Kaiser Steel Corp. v. Mullins, 109 LRRM 2268, 92 LC ¶ 13,128 (1982), reversing 642 F.2d 1302 (1982), for the proposition that the Federal court must consider an 8(e) defense, notwithstanding the National Labor Relations Board's special jurisdiction of Sections 7 and 8 of the National Labor Relations Act. The high court stated that a Federal court has a duty to determine whether a contract violates Federal law before enforcing it. The court acknowledged the general rule that illegal promises (contract terms) will not be enforced in cases controlled by Federal law.

No less of a duty exists for the Board when substantive terms of a contract are subject to scrutiny. Particularly, where the illegality raised in defense is cognizable by Section 7 and 8 of the National Labor Relations Act. A contract which on its face or in practice is contrary to the stated violative provisions of Section 8 cannot be enforced by the Board. To put it another way, an employer cannot be made to perform under a contract when the performance itself constitutes an unfair labor practice or protracts a prior error which tends to coerce, restrain, or interfere with employees' basic Section 7 rights.

I therefore conclude and find that the contractual group insurance benefits and pension accrual benefits for employees in the bargaining unit should have ceased for Meers, Moss, and Currie when each had amassed 4 years on their extended leaves of absence as such benefits would have ceased for any other employee not returning to the bargaining unit at the termination of any leave of absence. Only in this way can the rights of all employees in the bargaining unit be protected by the negotiated terms of the contract. No employee should be allowed to receive greater benefits under the contract simply because he or she chooses to request a leave of absence to serve the Union in an official capacity, particularly in view of the fact that employees serving the Union in an official capacity have access to union-sponsored group insurance plans and union-sponsored pension plans for those employed by the Union on a full-time basis. Bargaining unit employees on leaves of absence unrelated to union business have no such access to group insurance or group pension plans and must, by the contracts' terms, forgo further benefits if they choose not to return to employment upon the termination of their leaves of absence. In my view, Respondent has the right to correct the obvious wrongs relating to the leaves of absence of Meers, Moss, and Currie.

Accordingly, I conclude and find that Respondent Mead Packaging has not refused to bargain with the [7] Contractual benefits for employees on leaves of absence are generally ceased at some point in time by practical considerations which are no less obvious than in the instant case.

Union nor has Respondent's conduct related to Meers, Moss, or Currie violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

Respondent Mead Products' contract is silent with regard to any limitations on receipt of pension benefits for employees on leaves of absence. The parties did stipulate that the past practice for employees on leaves of absence for any reason other than union employment disallowed receipt of negotiated pension benefits for a period longer than 2 years. In effect this practice was an implementation of the contract terms relating to leaves of absence (not for union employment) and the pension plan. Union-related leaves of absence have a specified term of 4 years which exceeds the stipulated past practice for terms of other leaves of absence thereby creating a different period of time for cessation of the employment relationship. In my view, it is clear that the past practice of limiting receipt of negotiated pension benefits to 2 years for employees on leaves of absence unrelated to union employment does not apply to employees on a union-related leave of absence whether the employee is within the first 2-year term or in the extended 2-year term. The stipulated past practice obviously relates directly to the unspecified terms of personal and medical leaves of absence and is an attempt to coincide the receipt of benefits with the term of the leave of absence and the cessation of employment.

Since Turner's group insurance benefits and pension benefits were terminated by Respondent Mead Products on March 31, 1981, 2 months before his leave of absence would terminate under the contract, such termination was premature and violates Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. By contract, Turner was entitled to receive the benefits up to and including May 1, 1981. At that time Turner would have completed the allowable 4 years of his leave of absence. He would have at that time an election to continue in the employ of the Union or return to the bargaining unit with no loss of seniority or contractual privileges. Respondent must give Turner this prerogative as of May 1, 1981.

Additional Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent Mead Products, by terminating group insurance benefits and pension benefits of Albert Turner Jr. on March 31, 1981, has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

2. Respondents have not, other than found above, violated the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Remedy

Having found that Respondent Mead Products has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Mead Products to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. In view of the fact that payments have been made to the insurance carrier on behalf of Meers, Moss, and Currie for the past years and pension credits have been assessed to Meers, Moss, and Currie for this same period, which included several years of payments outside the contractual terms and the past practice under the contract, but at the same time the excess payments were inadvertent with no apparent intent to deceive the bargaining unit employees, I shall not order any restitution of those past payments.

Respondent Mead Products must, however, reinstate the group insurance benefits payments and pension benefits credits to Albert Turner Jr. to continue until the stated times and conditions found above.

District 1199E, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO (Greater Pennsylvania Avenue Nursing Center, Inc.) and Fred Punch. Case 5–CB–2173

16 January 1985

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 7 September 1978 the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order in this proceeding,[1] in which it adopted the administrative law judge's finding that Respondent District 1199E, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO, violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by refusing to bargain with Olympic Management Services, Inc. Upon a petition for review and a cross-application for enforcement of the Board's Order, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit remanded the case to the Board for the purpose of determining the effect, if any, on the Board's original findings of fact and conclusions of law of both the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and Greater Pennsylvania Avenue Nursing Center, Inc. and a 6 June 1977 arbitration award pursuant thereto.[2]

After receiving statements of position from the parties, the Board thereafter remanded the case to the administrative law judge to reopen the record to admit the collective-bargaining agreement and the arbitration award, and for further findings consistent with the court's remand.

On 15 February 1983 Administrative Law Judge Herzel H.E. Plaine issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The relevant facts are as follows:

Greater Pennsylvania Avenue Nursing Center, Inc. (Greater Pennsylvania) and the Respondent entered into a collective-bargaining agreement in September 1975 which expired 30 June 1978. In October 1976 Greater Pennsylvania notified the Respondent of its intention to subcontract its dietary, housekeeping, and laundry services to Olympic Management Services, Inc. (Olympic). When the Respondent failed to request bargaining, Greater Pennsylvania signed an agreement with Olympic.

Olympic retained all of Greater Pennsylvania's former employees. It also agreed to abide by the terms of the Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement, except for the health and welfare provisions. The Respondent, however, insisted that Olympic accept the entire agreement, including health and welfare provisions. When Olympic refused, the Respondent sought arbitration under its agreement with Greater Pennsylvania on whether Greater Pennsylvania's subcontracting had breached the collective-bargaining agreement.

Prior to the issuance of the arbitration award, Olympic filed the unfair labor practice charges which are the subject of this proceeding. On 6 June 1977, after the hearing before the judge but before a decision, the arbitrator issued an award in favor of the Respondent, in which he concluded that Greater Pennsylvania's subcontracting of the dietary, housekeeping, and laundry services during the term of an existing collective-bargaining agreement constituted a breach of contract.

The judge thereafter issued a decision on the unfair labor practice. He found that Greater Pennsylvania had given proper notice of its willingness to bargain, and the Union had not responded. He therefore concluded that the subcontracting was lawful under Board law, and that the Respondent's subsequent insistence that Olympic abide by all of the terms of the agreement with Greater Pennsylvania was an unlawful refusal to bargain under Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

With respect to the arbitration award, the judge found deferral inappropriate because Olympic was not a party to the award; the award did not consider the unfair labor practice; and, in the opinion of the judge, the award was contrary to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964). The Board adopted the judge's decision with a minor modification of the Order.

On review, the court found that the Board "did not give adequate consideration to the Union's defense based on the collective bargaining agreement and the Arbitrator's interpretation of it."[3] The court therefore remanded the case to the Board to determine if the collective-bargaining agreement applied to subcontracting and, if so, if the subcontracting violated the agreement. In remanding the case, the court disagreed with some of the administrative law judge's findings with regard to the inap-propriateness of deferral. The court stated that it "would probably have approved NLRB deference to the award because Greater Pennsylvania and Olympic were completely in privity by operation of the November, 1976 contract. Greater Pennsylvania 'fully and adequately defended' Olympic's position in the arbitration."[4]

The court further found that the arbitrator was competent to decide the subcontracting question. Finally, the court concluded, contrary to the Board, that Fibreboard was distinguishable because in Fibreboard, "unlike the case before us . . . there was no suggestion . . . that the contracting out violated any collective bargaining agreement (613 F.2d at 1108)."

As noted before, we accepted the court's remand and thereafter remanded the case to the judge for further findings of fact and conclusions of law consistent with the court's decision. The judge recommended that the Board reaffirm its denial of deference to the arbitrator's award and readopt the finding of the violation. Contrary to the arbitrator, the judge found on the record before him that there was substantial evidence of a business justification for the subcontracting. Furthermore, he reiterated his finding that the Board should not defer to the award because Olympic was not a party to the arbitration.

The Respondent excepts to the judge's findings. It argues that the judge failed to resolve the contractual question, and that the reasons advanced by the judge for refusing to defer are not substantial. In particular, it asserts, in agreement with the court, that the absence of Olympic as a party does not render deferral inappropriate because Greater Pennsylvania and Olympic were in contractual privity, and nothing in the record suggests prejudice to Olympic because it was not a party. We find merit to the Respondent's exceptions.

In agreement with the court, but contrary to the judge, we conclude that we should defer to the arbitration award on the question of whether Greater Pennsylvania breached its collective-bargaining agreement by subcontracting certain work to Olympic during the term of the agreement. Thus, as found by the court, the proceedings were fair and regular, the parties agreed to be bound, and the result was not clearly repugnant to the purposes of the Act. Thus, deferral is appropriate under the standard established by the Board in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), and in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984). Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that its previous Decision and Order in this case be revoked and the complaint dismissed in its entirety.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

HERZEL H. E. PLAINE, Administrative Law Judge. This is on remand of the Board decision in the case, 238 NLRB 9 (1978), by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, 613 F.2d 1102 (1979), requesting further explication of denial of deference to an arbitrator's award.

In an order dated June 6, 1980, the Board ordered the record to be reopened for the purpose of admitting into evidence copies of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent Union and Greater Pennsylvania Avenue Nursing Center, Inc. (Greater Pennsylvania), and an arbitrator's award of June 6, 1977, on a subcontracting issue raised by the Union against Greater Pennsylvania. Neither the contract nor the award was a part of the record of this case when it was made on May 2 and 3, 1977, and when I issued my decision April 7, 1978.

The Board futher remanded the case to me to consider the effect, if any, of the collective-bargaining agreement and arbitrator's award on the findings of fact and conclusions of law in the case, and to prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision in light of the court's remand and consideration of the additional evidence.

The Additional Evidence

By stipulation of the parties, dated January 5, 1981, I have placed in the record of the case the following three exhibits, which will be identified as Exhibits A–1, A–2, and A–3:

Exhibit A–1, a letter of agreement, dated September 22, 1975, by which Greater Pennsylvania assumed all the terms and conditions of a prior existing agreement (Exh. A–2) between the Union and Community Health Corporation covering the employees of the nursing home, and extending its duration to June 30, 1978.

Exhibit A–2, the previous existing agreement assumed by Greater Pennsylvania[1]

Exhibit A–3, award of Arbitrator Herbert N. Bernhardt, dated June 6, 1977, in arbitration between the Union and Greater Pennsylvania.[2]

[1] In establishing the original record in this case, the Union failed to comply with my request that it produce and introduce the collective-bargaining contract which, as now appears, comprised Exhs. A–1 and A–2, see 238 NLRB at 13.

[2] The further delay in dealing with the remand was caused largely by efforts, at my suggestion, that counsel for the General Counsel explore and try to achieve settlement of the case among the Respondent Union, the subcontractor Olympic Management Service, Inc. (Olympic), and the General Counsel. Over a period of time an oral settlement was achieved, other matters concerning the same three parties was sought, but finally abandoned with a report to me that no settlement could be achieved.

Summary of Board Decision

In the decision affirmed by the Board, 238 NLRB 9 (1978), it was found that Respondent Union, which had represented 33 nursing and 17 dietary, housekeeping, and laundry employees of the Greater Pennsylvania nursing home, violated Section 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to bargain in good faith with Olympic, the subcontractor of Greater Pennsylvania. The subcontractor had undertaken to provide dietary, housekeeping, and laundry services of the nursing home, and had hired the 17 dietary, housekeeping, and laundry employees formerly with Greater Pennsylvania to do these services under Olympic's management. To remedy the unfair labor practice the Board issued a bargaining order.

In connection with the subcontracting, Greater Pennsylvania had given advance notice to the Union of its intention to subcontract with Olympic in October 1976, and offered to meet and to discuss the matter with the Union. Receiving no answer from the Union, Greater Pennsylvania signed the subcontract with Olympic.

Olympic started its operations for the Greater Pennsylvania nursing home partially in November and fully in December 1976. Olympic hired the 17 former Greater Pennsylvania dietary, housekeeping, and laundry employees and their immediate supervisors, without interruption of their work, adding 2 employees later.

As successor employer to Greater Pennsylvania, Olympic recognized the Union as the representative of its employees and gave effect to the terms of the Greater Pennsylvania collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, including giving a wage increase on January 1, 1977. However, Olympic indicated that it would not accept the Union's benefit plan without a separate labor agreement, because the benefit fund was in difficulties, including litigation. Olympic requested bargaining of its own agreement with the Union, as successor employer, largely to deal with the subject of the benefit fund.

The Union refused to bargain with Olympic unless Olympic would accept all existing terms of the collective-bargaining agreement between Greater Pennsylvania and the Union, and unless all outstanding disputes involving a second nursing home, Lafayette Square (owned and operated by the owner of Greater Pennsylvania), whose auxiliary services had also been subcontracted to Olympic, were first resolved in resolution of the total issues.

After the Union refused to bargain, Olympic provided its employees with another form of benefit coverage. The Union's response was that it was taking Greater Pennsylvania to arbitration for violating its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union in subcontracting the housekeeping, dietary, and laundry operations to Olympic. Olympic notified the Union it was filing a refusal-to-bargain charge under Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

Dealing with the unfair labor practice complaint, it was held that the Union had imposed unlawful conditions upon the bargaining of a collective-bargaining agreement with subcontractor Olympic, in violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act. And the Union was ordered to bargain in good faith with Olympic.

In the course of arriving at this result, the decision disposed of two claims of the Union, resulting in findings that the subcontract with Olympic was not a sham or subterfuge to circumvent the previous direct relationship between the Union and Greater Pennsylvania as employer of the dietary, housekeeping, and laundry employees; and that Charging Party Punch was not disqualified to represent Olympic as bargaining representative because of, or for any alleged misuse of, his former position as a union official.

The holding, to which the remand relates, was the determination that it was inappropriate for the Board to defer to the arbitration award which the Union obtained against Greater Pennsylvania declaring that the subcontract to Olympic was invalid under the collective-bargaining contract between the Union and Greater Pennsylvania.

The arbitration and award came after the Union had initially accepted Olympic as employer of the employees performing the auxiliary services at Greater Pennsylvania but balked at bargaining with Olympic, as successor employer, over the Union's benefit fund which was in trouble, and instead imposed illegal conditions on bargaining. The award itself was issued after the trial was held in this case and, as the arbitrator indicated, he was well aware of the Board proceeding, but declined to defer his decision on the ground he was capable of settling all the issues between the parties.[3]

Three reasons were given in the Board decision for not deferring to the arbitrator's award of June 6, 1977 (now Exh. A–3), 238 NLRB at 14.

First, an important party to the dispute, subcontractor Olympic was not party to the collective-bargaining agreement or to the arbitration, and the Board has held that deferral to arbitration is not warranted where all the parties who have important interest at stake in the unfair labor practice are not parties to the labor contract and therefore not represented in the arbitration.

Second, the alleged unfair labor practice of the Union involved in the case at bar was not considered by the arbitrator.

Third, the decision of the arbitrator on the subcontracting appeared to rest on grounds at variance with the holdings of the Board and of courts under the Act construing rights and duties of employers in subcontracting under labor agreements similar to the Greater Pennsylvania agreement.

The Court's Remand

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit remanded the case to the Board for further analysis of the collective-bargaining agreement, the arbitrator's award, and the administrative law judge's opinion "in light of the strong policy favoring deference to the Arbitrator's interpretations of collective bargaining agreements." 613 F.2d at 1109.

[3] Actually, the award was first made known to me, and to the parties to the Board case, as an attachment to Respondent Union's posttrial brief. I provided opportunity for all parties to file additional briefs concerning the question of giving deference to the award.

In particular the court requested that the Board explicitly discuss the implications of the collective-bargaining agreement as interpreted by the arbitrator. Ibid.

The Arbitrator's Award

The arbitrator's award identifies article 3, section 3-1, "Management Functions" of the labor contract between the Union and Greater Pennsylvania, as the contract provision governing subcontracting by Greater Pennsylvania (see Exh. A-2). It reads:

> ARTICLE 3—MANAGEMENT FUNCTIONS
> Section 3.1—All management functions and responsibilities which the Home has not expressly modified or restricted by a specific provision of this Agreement are retained and vested exclusively in the Home. More specifically, the Home reserves the right to establish and administer policies and procedures related to patient care, research, education, training, operations, services and maintenance of the Home; to reprimand, suspend, discharge or otherwise discipline employees for cause, including, but not limited to, excessive absenteeism and/or lateness, insubordination, mistreatment of patients, neglect of work, theft, being under the influence of liquor, leaving the job station without permission, and violation of medical confidence; to hire, promote, transfer, lay off and recall employees to work; to determine the number of employees and the duties to be performed; to maintain the efficiency of employees; to establish, expand, reduce, alter, combine, consolidate, or abolish any job classification, department, operation or service; to determine staffing patterns and areas worked; to control and regulate the use of facilities, supplies, equipment and other property of the Home; to determine the number, location and operation of divisions, departments and all other units of the Home, the assignment of work, the qualifications required and the size and composition of the work force; to make or change rules, regulations, policies and practices not inconsistent with the terms of this Agreement; and otherwise generally to manage the Home, attain and maintain full operating efficiency and optimum patient care, and direct the work force, except as expressly modified or restricted by a specific provision of this Agreement. None of the above-mentioned Management Functions shall be exercised in an unreasonable manner.

While the management functions article does not use the word subcontracting as such, the language is so broad as to embrace subcontracting within the authority reserved to the Employer (Greater Pennsylvania). Key Phrases are: The Home reserves the right to determine the number of employees and the duties performed; to maintain the efficiency of employees, to establish, expand, reduce, alter, combine, consolidate or abolish any job classification, department, operation, or service; to determine the number, location and operation of divisions, departments, and all other units of the Home, the assignment of work, and the size and composition of the work; to attain and maintain full operating efficiency and optimum patient care. As the arbitrator said, section 3.1 is indeed a broad management-rights clause.

The clause concludes with the words that none of the above-mentioned management functions shall be exercised in an unreasonable manner.

However, as the arbitrator points out, the limitation of reasonableness would exist under the interpretations of arbitrators, without specific statement of it in the labor contract. As he said, "The general position of arbitrators is that the right to subcontract depends upon reasonableness; and when a substantial portion of the regular work of employees is subcontracted, substantial business justification must be shown."

In this case, said the arbitrator, the Employer (Greater Pennsylvania) offered no evidence of substantial business justification, hence the Employer acted unreasonably, and violated the collective-bargaining contract by subcontracting the laundry, dietary, and housekeeping services to Olympic.

Comparison with Record Before the Board

Whereas the arbitrator's award alleged that Greater Pennsylvania gave the arbitrator 'no reasons" for the subcontract (Exh. A-3) and that there was "no advantage to the Employer" in making the subcontract apparent on the record, ibid, and therefore no substantial business justification, there was considerable testimony in the record of the case before me, provided largely by Owner Gershowitz of the nursing home and Charging Party Punch, giving the reasons for, and the advantages of, the subcontract, summarized in the decision at 238 NLRB 11 and 13.

There was, first, the preliminary discussion of reasons between Mrs. Gershowitz and Charing Party Punch, as labor relations consultant, on the view, demonstrated by the practice of other nursing homes, that nursing home administrators could provide better nursing care if they were relieved of responsibility for the chore of auxiliary operations, such as housekeeping, laundry, and preparation of food. Coordinately, Mrs. Gershowitz was interested in acquiring and operating still another nursing home (Lafayette Square) and because existing subcontractors of auxiliary operations elsewhere in the area were expensive, Punch came up with the idea of putting Mrs. Gershowitz in touch with people he knew with experience in food preparation and maintenance services for health care facilities, which turned out to be Olympic. 238 NLRB at 11.

Second, Mrs. Gershowitz testified (after operation under the subcontract had begun) that the advantage to Greater Pennsylvania in subcontracting was that the administrator of the nursing home did not have to deal with the routine of the kitchen, the laundry, and housekeeping, and could concentrate on nursing care. She further testified that since meals are part of patient care, she had on her staff a dietician, who prepared menus and special diets and saw to it that food came out properly prepared and served, and a purchasing agent responsible for purchase of food and other supplies. The dietician worked with the purchasing agent and with Olympic's food supervisor, in making menus to keep costs in line. The food service supervisor was employed by Olympic and had the responsibility for seeing that the right menus were dispensed to the patients, for cleanliness of the kitchen, and for staffing patterns. Likewise, the housekeeping supervisor was employed by Olympic and had responsibility for seeing to the cleaning and maintenance of the nursing home rooms.

Mrs. Gershowitz further testified that while Greater Pennsylvania's cost for auxiliary services were increased by the $100-per-week management fee paid Olympic (this was a cost-plus-fixed fee contract as described elsewhere in the testimony) and by the net increase (by two) in employees, there was also a decrease in costs as a result of more efficient management. She added that Olympic was doing an excellent job at her facilities. In response to questioning by Respondent, she pointed out that she could not reverse the decisions or just step out of or terminate the subcontract without subjecting Greater Pennsylvania to the consequences of breach of contract.

Third, the subcontract with Olympic was not the only or first subcontract of Greater Pennsylvania. According to Mrs. Gershowitz, building maintenance and fire prevention were being done by a subcontractor; and special professional services, including those rendered by psychologists, dietician, and speech therapist, were being provided to Greater Pennsylvania by Chai Management, a company owned by Mrs. Gershowitz, that provided consulting services of this kind on a fee basis to other companies as well. 238 NLRB at 13.

This testimony, concerning the business reasons and advantages to Greater Pennsylvania, or the reasonableness of its practice of subcontracting necessary functions in this case and prior situations, was not contradicted by the Union. It was plausible testimony, it was credible testimony.

Also part of the record in the case before me, which was not part of the record before the arbitrator and not considered by him, was the evidence of the job security of the affected employees arranged for beforehand and carried out by the subcontractor Olympic. All of the affected employees were hired by Olympic without any break in employment or loss of pay; a pay raise, provided by the union contract with Greater Pennsylvania, was put into effect; and the Union was recognized by Olympic as the representative of the transferred employees. Additionally, because the Union's health-welfare-pension plan was in litigation and therefore a major reason for Olympic not acceding to existing contract terms and seeking collective bargaining of its own, Olympic provided for enrollment of its employees in another such plan. There was no evidence of any adverse effect on the job security of the transferred employees.

Under "arbitrator's law," while an adverse effect on job security could result in limitations on subcontracting, such limitations would be reduced or eliminated where the effect on job security was minimal or nonexistent. See, for example, City of Hamtramck, 71 LA 822 (1978). Again, the arbitrator's record was lacking in material facts that were present and useful to the decision. Indeed, the arbitrator declined to become acquainted with the job security situation of the affected employees, indicating that he could provide a decision without it.

It is not improbable that the deficient record upon which the arbitrator's decision rested, developed concurrently with the record before the Board, may be attributed at least in part to the absence of the Charging Party Punch and the subcontractor, Olympic, in the arbitration proceeding. The result suggests the wisdom of the Board rule in not deferring to arbitration where all the parties, who have important interest at stake in the unfair labor practice determination, are not parties to the labor contract and not represented in the arbitration, 238 NLRB at 14.

An earlier example of this wisdom is reflected in the Court of Appeals' opinion in NLRB v. Horn & Hardart Co., 439 F.2d 674–679 (2d Cir. 1971), affirming the Board's decision to refuse to defer to arbitration. Quoting from the Board decision, the Court explained:

> In Raley's the Board based its decision, in part, on a finding that, although the Petitioner was not represented at the arbitration hearing, its position was identical with that of the Employer and the Employer "vigorously" asserted its position in the arbitration proceeding. As in Raley's the Petitioner herein did not participate in the arbitration proceeding and as in Raley's the Employer in the instant case asserted a position in the arbitration proceeding which is identical with the Petitioner's position herein, namely that the present contract does not cover cashiers. The record is unclear as to how vigorously the Employer asserted this position. [Citation omitted.] However, it is clear from the testimony at the hearing and from a reading of the arbitration award that not all of the pertinent evidence was made available to the arbitrator. The two primary deficiencies are the failure to provide the arbitrator with information concerning the long history of Intervenor's attempts to organize the Employer and the consistent exclusion of cashiers from these attempts, and the failure to provide him with a clear understanding of the duties of the employees in question. In these circumstances, we do not think it would effectuate statutory policy to defer to the arbitration award. [Remaining footnotes omitted.] [Emphasis added.]

In accord: Retail Clerks Local 1100 (White Front San Francisco), 203 NLRB 548 fn. 2 (1973), and 206 NLRB 1431 fn. 3 (1973), holding that the Board will not defer to an arbitration award when the employer's licensee, a party affected by the arbitration award, was not party to the arbitration proceeding. Cf. NLRB v. Plasterers Local 79 (Texas Tile & Terrazzo), 404 U.S. 116 (1971), where in context of a 10(k) proceeding, employers who were not parties to the private dispute resolution procedure, but who had substantial financial status in the outcome of the proceeding, were considered parties necessary to the dispute's resolution.

To suggest, as appears in the remand 613 F.2d at 1107, that Greater Pennsylvania represented Olympic in the arbitration and "fully and adequately defended" Olympic's position is not sustained by the comparative records of the arbitration and the unfair labor practice trial, already analyzed. Moreover, in the cited cases, referred to as exemplifying that the party excluded from the arbitration was fully and adequately represented or its position defended, the excluded party stood on a different footing in relation to the arbitration from that of Olympic. In those cases, such as Associated Press v. NLRB, 492 F.2d 662, 664 (D.C. Cir. 1974), or Haynes v. United States Pipe & Foundry Co., 362 F.2d 414, 416–417 (5th Cir. 1966), the excluded party was an employee and union member, who enjoyed the statutorily based assurance that his collective-bargaining representative would fairly represent his interest in the arbitration process. Subcontractor Olympic was not in any such protected category and had no such assurance respecting the arbitration.

I see no great or useful purpose served in denying to a bona fide subcontractor his Board remedy against a recalcitrant union, which has denied the subcontractor good-faith bargaining, by our giving credit in the proceeding before us to an arbitrator's decision that rests on a deficient record in light of the record established contemporaneously in the only forum open to the subcontractor.

Spielberg does not require it. Indeed Spielberg, as refined by the Board, forbids giving credit to such an arbitrator's award that did not encompass all the parties to the controversy before the Board, and that did not deal with the unfair labor practice.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 11 February 1983 Administrative Law Judge Burton Litvak issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party[1] filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] as modified below and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Edna Hayes. However, we do not pass on his finding that she was engaged in concerted activity, and we find the violation based solely on the following analysis.[4]

Hayes worked for the Respondent as a maid for 32 years. She had not openly indicated herself to be a union supporter prior to the events surrounding her discharge. On 4 June 1982 she entered the linen room and interrupted a conversation between Supervisors Grimes and Morrow in which both were criticizing the Union. Hayes indicated her disagreement with such criticism and asked them if they had seen "the article" in the previous night's newspaper which said that the Respondent had not remitted any money to the Union since February. Both Grimes and Morrow expressed disbelief. The Respondent suspended Hayes that afternoon and later discharged her for telling "numerous employees that the hotel had not paid dues or other money to the Union since January." The Respondent told Hayes this information was not true and that her conduct was violative of employee conduct rule 11. Rule 11 proscribes "making or publishing false, vicious, or malicious statements concerning any employee, supervisor, the Company, the Hotel or any other service establishment or individual directly or indirectly related to the conduct of Company or Hotel business."

A decertification election had been held about 10 months before Hayes' discharge and objections to the election were pending. The Respondent clearly demonstrated animus toward the Union by the unfair labor practices committed in the months after the election. In this context, Hayes, by her comments to the two supervisors, identified herself for the first time as a union supporter. We find that the Respondent discharged Hayes because of her support of the Union and that the discharge therefore violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

We also agree with the judge's rejection of the Respondent's contention that Hayes was lawfully discharged because she violated employee rule 11. The judge correctly found that merely false utterances and writings constitute union or protected concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act and the maintenance and enforcement of a rule prohibiting them is a violation of Section 8(a)(1).[5] While it is true that false statements that are knowingly false and therefore malicious are unprotected, the burden is on an employer who maintains such a rule to show that the employee in question intended to circulate knowingly false information. The Respondent has not satisfied that burden.

[1] The Charging Party withdrew its exceptions on 6 July 1983.

[2] The Respondent asserts that the judge's credibility resolutions, findings of fact, and conclusions of law are the result of bias. After careful examination of the record, we are satisfied that this allegation is without merit. There is no basis for finding that bias and partiality existed merely because the judge resolved important factual conflicts in favor of the General Counsel's witness. As the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659 (1949), "[T]otal rejection of an opposed view cannot of itself impugn the integrity or competence of a trier of fact." Furthermore, the Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 363 (3d Cir. 1951). We find no basis for reversing his findings.

[3] The judge inadvertently referred to William C. Speidel as William E. Speidel. He also incorrectly found that Supervisor Reggie Williams was wearing a brass name tag instead of a red name tag. We hereby correct these errors.

We agree with the judge's refusal to order that discharged employee Grimes be reinstated and made whole because we provide only a cease-and-desist order in situations where an employer interviews an employee in violation of the requirements set forth in NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), except in cases where an employee is discharged for asserting his Weingarten rights or where the reason for the discharge is itself an unfair labor practice. See our recent decision in Taracorp Inc., 273 NLRB 221 (1984).

Chairman Dotson agrees with the judge that the Respondent's refusal to process grievances to arbitration is unlawful, but he does not rely on the judge's citation of Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). Member Dennis, who agrees with the judge that Dresser was prospective only and therefore would not apply to the instant case, finds it unnecessary to intimate any views regarding the issues Dresser presents.

In agreeing with the judge's conclusion that the discharge of union steward Grimes was not violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) we find it unnecessary to rely on fn. 44 of the judge's decision.

[4] Member Hunter finds that Hayes' conduct in telling two supervisors about a newspaper article which reported that the Respondent had not remitted dues to the Union for several months constituted protected concerted activity. See Atlanta Newspapers, 264 NLRB 878, 879 (1982).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Radisson Muehlebach Hotel, Kansas City, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BURTON LITVACK, Administrative Law Judge. These matters were tried before me on September 14, 15, and 16, 1982, in Kansas City, Kansas. On August 24, 1982, the Regional Director for Region 17 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), issued a consolidated complaint, based on unfair labor practice allegations in Case 17-CA-10704 filed by Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO, Local 64 (the Charging Party) on November 5, 1981, and amended on December 11, 1981; in Case 17-CA-10782 filed by the Charging Party on January 11, 1982, in Case 17-CA-11045 filed by the Charging Party on June 17, 1982, and in Case 17-CA-11079 filed by the Charging Party on July 8, 1982, alleging that Radisson Muehlebach Hotel (Respondent) engaged in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. Respondent filed an answer, denying the commission of any unfair labor practices. At the hearing all parties were permitted to offer into the record any relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue their positions orally, and to file posthearing briefs. Based on the entire record, including the posthearing briefs, which have been carefully considered, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is an employer engaged in the operation of a hotel, restaurant, and lounge at 12th and Baltimore Streets, Kansas City, Missouri. The parties stipulated that Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations described above, annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and annually purchases goods ands services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources located outside of the State of Missouri. The parties further stipulated that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Edward L. Miller, who is employed by Hotel & Restaurant and Bartenders International Union as an International representative, testified that he is currently the International trustee of the Charging Party and in overall charge of its affairs. To this end, he further testified that he negotiates collective-bargaining agreements with various employers, files and processes employee grievances, and conducts membership meetings and that employee-members participate in collective bargaining, grievance processing, and membership meetings. Therefore, it appears that the Charging Party is an organization in which employee-members participate and which exists for the purpose, wholly or in part, of collective bargaining. Accordingly, I find that the Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Memphis Furniture Mfg. Co., 259 NLRB 401, 402 (1982).

III. ISSUES

1. At all times material herein, has Respondent maintained a rule concerning the publication of "false, vicious, or malicious statements" in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act?

2. About December 16, 1981, did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with discipline if they continued to engage in activity on behalf of the Charging Party?

3. About September 15, 1981, did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by reprimanding employee James Grimes?

4. About September 25, 1981, did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by reprimanding employee Beatrice Edwards?

5. About October 6, 1981, did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by conducting an interview with employee James Grimes after denying his request for union representation and notwithstanding the fact that Grimes had reasonable cause to believe that interview would result in disciplinary action?

6. About October 6 and 9, 1981, did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3 of the Act by initially suspending and subsequently terminating employee Grimes?

7. About June 4 and 8, 1982, did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by initially suspending and subsequently terminating employee Edna Hayes?

8. Since about January 8, 1982, and continuing to date, has Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to process certain grievances, filed by the Charging Party, through the applicable arbitration procedures of an existing collective-bargaining agreement?

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Background

Respondent operates a hotel in Kansas City, Missouri; encompassed within it are various facilities including a coffee shop known as the Greenery. William E. Speidel is the managing director of the hotel and in charge of its entire operations, and Ronald C. Juneman is the director of personnel. Respondent has had a longstanding collective-bargaining relationshio with the Charging Party—until 1980 as an employer-member of the Kansas City Hotel Association and, since withdrawing from the aforementioned multiemployer bargaining association in 1980, on a single employer basis. Both as a member of the association and as a single employer, Respondent's current collective-bargaining agreement with the Charging Party as the collective-bargaining representative of certain of its employees[1] is for a term of 5 years, effective from June 16, 1978, through June 16, 1983. Pursuant to the terms of article XXXI thereof, either Respondent or the Charging Party was permitted to request negotiations on changes in the wages and health and welfare provisions of the contract in the spring of 1981. By a letter dated April 7, 1981, the secretary-treasurer of the Charging Party, Clarence Owens, made such a request and, as a result, negotiations on such changes and other matters[2] between Respondent and the Charging Party occurred from May 18 through July 14, 1981. In the midst of these discussions, the event which is alleged to be the catalyst behind Respondent's conduct herein occurred—the filing of a decertification petition, in Case 17-RD-824, on June 18, 1981, by Beulah A. Bass, a waitress in the Greenery coffee shop. The preelection campaign continued throughout the summer of 1981[3] and culminated with the holding of a decertification election on September 11, 1981. The Charging Party prevailed, receiving a majority of the ballots cast.[4]

2. The Beatrice Edward reprimand

The record establishes that the Greenery coffee shop is open from 6 a.m. until 8 p.m. every day and that in September 1981 Douglas Brown was the manager. Beatrice Edwards, who worked as a waitress at Respondent's hotel for 25 years and who was an overt advocate for the Charging Party during the election campaign, testified that, at approximately 9 a.m. on September 25, 2 weeks after the election, while waiting on the tables in her assigned area,[5] she passed by a table in Beulah Bass' work station, and two gentlemen, whom she recognized as union officials Harold Hamilton and James Meyers, beckoned to her, asking for coffee. "I had a pot of coffee in my hand so I stopped and poured some. A few minutes later they asked me if I would give them some cream and I did." Thereupon, she went back to the kitchen in order to refill her coffeepots and observed Reggie Williams, who was the agri-business club manager for Respondent and acting as the Greenery manager that morning,[6] and Bass "standing by the timeclock smoking and talking." Noticing Edwards in the kitchen, Williams spoke and "told me not to work Beulah's station." When she attempted to explain what occurred, Williams said, "Shut up. I don't want to hear it." Approximately an hour later, Edwards received a reprimand from Williams for the incident in the form of a notice called "communication to employee."[7] The document accused Edwards of "working another waitress' station" without being instructed to do so and of "being insubordinate to manager."

Harold Hamilton, an official of the national AFL-CIO, testified that he was in Kansas City on September 25 in order to attend a Missouri manpower conference and that he had an appointment to meet James E. Meyers, an official of the Missouri AFL-CIO, in the Greenery that morning for breakfast. According to Hamilton, he arrived at the coffee shop a few minutes after 8 a.m. and observed Meyers already seated at a booth near the kitchen door. There was no waiting line, and Hamilton walked over to the booth and sat down.[8] Approximately 6 minutes passed until a black man who was wearing a suit and a brass name tag[9] approached their tables. Meyers said that they desired breakfast, and the individual gave each a menu. Another 4 or 5 minutes passed without any further service whereupon Meyers beckoned to a passing waitress, who was Beatrice Edwards, and requested coffee; the latter brought a coffeepot to the table and poured coffee for the two men. Edwards left the table; however, 5 minutes later Meyers stopped her and requested cream; Edwards placed cream

[1] The bargaining unit includes all employees employed by Respondent at its hotel; excluding executives, superintendents, department heads having the authority to hire and fire, supervisory employees having the authority to hire and fire and having an executive status, supervisory employees having an executive status with the right to effectively recommend hiring and firing, accounting or control employees, timekeepers, security officers, office employees, sales personnel, desk and mail clerks, checkers, cashiers, typists, stenographers, secretaries, supervisory stewards, storeroom and wineroom personnel, and all extra employees who have not worked at least an average of two functions (6 hours) per week for the period January 1, 1981, to July 24, 1981.

[2] Edward L. Miller, who attended the negotiations on behalf of the Charging Party, testified that the only matters discussed were wages and fringe benefits and denied that the contract provisions relating to individuals, known as extra banquet personnel, were discussed. As to the latter, Miller identified R. Exh. 18 as an unfair labor practice charge which he filed on behalf of the Charging Party on June 30, 1981, alleging that Respondent was bargaining in bad faith in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (5) by attempting to force the Charging Party to bargain over matters other than wages and fringe benefits. The charge was dismissed and Miller identified R. Exh. 19 as the letter he received from the Board's General Counsel in which the latter's representative sustained the dismissal, writing that Respondent had made proposals as to extra banquet personnel and the Charging Party had engaged in "meaningful" bargaining on the subject. In addition, Respondent offered into evidence Juneman's notes, which he recorded at each bargaining session. These indicate substantial discussions regarding the matter of extra banquet waiters and waitresses. No rebuttal evidence was offered as to this.

[3] There is scant record evidence as to the conduct of the preelection campaign. However, the record does disclose that Speidel and Juneman held a series of meetings with employees on or about September 9 and that supporters of the Charging Party, including another waitress in the Greenery, Beatrice Edwards, formed a campaign committee known as the Save-Our-Contract committee.

[4] Respondent filed timely objections to the conduct of the election; these were heard by a hearing officer of the Board who found merit in two of the objections; on December 6, 1982, the Board reversed the decision of the hearing officer and certified the results of the election. This decision of the Board is reported at 265 NLRB 634 (1982).

[5] In September 1981, according to Edwards, the Greenery waitresses were assigned to permanent areas, or stations, whereby each was required to wait on specified tables and no others. Under this system, which was designed to ensure the waitresses their tips, they were not permitted to actually wait on customers in other work stations. However, Edwards testified, it was permissible for waitresses to pour coffee or water for such diners.

[6] Respondent admits that Williams was a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[7] These disciplinary notices are placed in employee personnel files and are utilized in assessing the necessity for harsher discipline if such is warranted in the future.

[8] Hamilton testified that his identity and affiliation was known to Respondent's employees as he had previously been in the hotel and at employee meetings in connection with the election campaign.

[9] There is no dispute that the black individual was Reggie Williams and that he, indeed, took the food orders of Hamilton and Meyers that morning. There is a dispute as to the type of name tag he wore but I deem this of little significance given the aforementioned.

on the table. Hamilton testified that another 4 or 5 minutes elapsed before the black individual returned and took their breakfast orders. Thereafter, Beulah Bass brought their meals from the kitchen. According to Hamilton, he was acquainted with Bass and, after asking how she was doing, introduced her to Meyers.

Beulah Bass, who filed the petition for the decertification petition and who, according to Douglas Brown, was constantly being harassed by other employees because of her actions, testified, "Mr. Hamilton and two more union [people] come in and sat down in my booth. And so I took them their coffee and was going to take their order and went ahead and asked the host to take the orders because I didn't know if they were going to ask me some questions or not." After the meals were prepared, she served them to the union officials. What upset Bass that morning and allegedly caused her to complain to Reggie Williams was that Beatrice Edwards "was at that table four different times. . . . she refilled their coffee or picked up their plates, and each time that she would go over there, they would have a little conversation. What they said, I don't know." The significance of Edwards' conduct, according to Bass, was that "you keep going over to somebody's table and doing things for them, it cuts down on your tips." As stated above, she ultimately complained to Acting Manager Williams; I told him they were in my station and [Edwards] was not suppose[d] to be. And he called her aside and talked to her. Usually we've suppose[d] to ask if we need help, we'll go to the host. . . . I hadn't gone to him. . . . She really did not have any business over there."[10] During cross-examination, Bass' testimony became contradictory. Thus, while initially testifying, "I took them their coffee and water and menus," she later stated that Williams poured coffee for the union officials and that when she first observed them in a booth, the men already had coffee, water, silverware, and menus on the table. Further, as to the number of times she observed Edwards at the union officials' table, Bass initially testified four or five times, with the former serving coffee and bringing cream to the table prior to Bass serving their food; later contradicting herself, Bass stated that Edwards was at the union officials' table four or five times after she served the food. Respondent offered no further evidence as to this incident.[11] Finally, Hamilton testified that during the approximately 25 minutes which elapsed until Bass served food to Meyers and him, he observed Bass on several occasions walking to and from the kitchen, never carrying anything.

3. James Grimes

The record reveals that James Grimes worked for Respondent from 1966 until about October 9, 1981, as a regular banquet waiter and that during this time period he served as a union steward for the Charging Party.[12] At all times material herein, he was supervised by Mary Moore, the banquet manager for Respondent.[13] With regard to the performance of his duties as a union steward, Grimes testified that he conferred with other employees concerning work-related problems "most times in the dressing rooms or at lunch time . . . in the lunch hall." Aware that the union stewards were prohibited from discussing union business with employees in public areas of the hotel or while working,[14] Grimes consistently maintained that his practice, whenever confronted by an employee with a problem in such an area or during work, was to refuse to discuss the matter.[15] According to Grimes' uncontroverted testimony, he was constantly "right on [Juneman's] back" about employee-related matters, and in early August 1981 as he passed by Juneman in a hotel hallway, the latter, with a smile, said "It seemed like you're running the place." At approximately the same time, Grimes was called to Juneman's office and informed by the latter that the two restaurants, the Greenery and La Carrousel, were "off limits" to him from that day on and that in order to report to his work station, he was required to utilize the rear stairway. Grimes testified that Juneman gave him no reason for this restriction and that prior to this conversation, Grimes had always taken a short cut (through the Greenery kitchen and up an elevator) to his reporting area. During his testimony, Juneman said nothing about, nor gave any justification for, Grimes' area restriction. Mary Moore testified that he never had any valid reason for being in the Greenery kitchen as the catering department possessed its own kitchen equipment and that the restriction was related to the sexual harassment of Beulah Bass by Grimes, a point not corroborated by Bass.[16]

[10] Bass admitted that it was common for another waitress to pour coffee or water if a customer so requests as that waitress passes by—"They're naturally going to pour it."

[11] There is no record evidence as to what, if anything, constituted Edwards' alleged insubordination to Williams that morning. The latter did not testify, and Respondent offered no reason for not calling him as a witness.

[12] As union steward, Grimes was responsible for representing the hotel's kitchen help, waiters, and waitresses. There was only one other steward, Thelma Glover, who was responsible for all other employees. Grimes testified that in Glover's absence he discussed work problems with employees within her jurisdiction.

[13] It was admitted that Moore is a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[14] Art. XIV of the current collective-bargaining agreement states that the Charging Party's business agents "shall not transact union business in public rooms, and shall not interfere with work being performed." While not specifically concerned with the Charging Party's shop stewards, Grimes testified that he understood that the same restrictions applied to his conduct of union business, and no contrary evidence was offered by the General Counsel or the Charging Party as to the conduct of union business by the stewards.

[15] During cross-examination, Grimes testified that he never violated the contractual provisions—"I was a busy man at all times and I could not stop my work to perform no business." While unable to recall being warned in March 1981 about conducting union business while working, Grimes admitted receiving and executing R. Exh. 6, a memorandum to Grimes from Ronald Juneman, dated March 13, 1981. This document, after quoting from the above-quoted art. XIV of the existing contract, reminds Grimes, "You are not to conduct union business while on duty. We have recently received several complaints from your membership regarding harassment from union officials. We request you follow the collective bargaining contract as written." There is no evidence that Grimes ever filed a grievance over receiving this document or that the Charging Party ever challenged its accuracy.

[16] Grimes admitted that the restriction did not inconvenience him and that it did not prevent him from having access to Greenery employees in either the employee locker room or cafeteria.

Two days before the decertification election, on September 9, 1981, Grimes was called into Mary Moore's office and met with the latter and Gordon Bell, Respondent's catering manager.[17] According to Grimes, Bell "asked me how I was going to vote and I told him for the union. And when I told him that he replied to me, 'I hope you do this in the future of your family and yourself.' I . . . said, 'I've been in this union for many—I worked in this hotel for many years and I've taken care of my own business for 40 years. I didn't need you to help me take care of my family.' That's all I said. And walked out." Gordon Bell testified that he was instructed to meet with employees prior to the election "to make sure they had all the facts" and to answer their questions and that he requested that Grimes speak to him in Moore's office with the latter being present. "What I said to James was that if he had any questions or anything that was on his mind or that he was not sure of, I was there to try and clarify the matters. And James didn't say anything, so I just said, 'well, just vote the way you really feel inside would be the best for you and your family.'" Moore said nothing about this meeting during her testimony. The election took place on September 11, and Grimes was the Charging Party's observer during it.

There is no dispute that, despite his aforementioned work restriction, Grimes was in the Greenery kitchen between 5:30 and 6:30 a.m. on September 15 and that, while there, he walked past past Beulah Bass, who was standing near the coffee shop timeclock, and greeted her. According to the testimony of Grimes during the General Counsel's case-in-chief, he was in the kitchen that morning, preparing for a buffet breakfast in the La Carrousel restaurant, which is located in close proximity to the Greenery. Mary Moore, who, as previously stated, testified that there was no need for Grimes ever to be in the Greenery kitchen as the banquet department possessed its own kitchen equipment, further testified that on September 15 just a few individuals were scheduled to work the buffet breakfast in La Carrousel and Grimes was not one of them and that he was assigned to other functions that day. As support, Moore identified a series of documents (R. Exh. 22) as Grimes' work vouchers[18] for September 15; these show him working five separate functions during that day—two in the Imperial Ballroom, two in the Grand Ballroom, and one in Room 1111. Further, Moore was certain that Grimes was not in the La Carrousel restaurant that morning for, as the supervisor in charge of that facility, she was in the area "off and on" that morning and did not see Grimes—"I know Mr. Grimes was not scheduled for that room and he was not in that area or come up and have anything to do with La Carrousel."[19] Moore also denied pulling Grimes off a function in La Carrousel that morning, asserting she would never do that. Testifying during rebuttal, Grimes contradicted Moore, stating that, as scheduled, he reported for work at 6 a.m. in the Imperial Ballroom but that the captain, Alex Naliviko, ordered him to report, instead, to the La Carrousel "because everybody was late" to help set up. Accordingly he accompanied Naliviko to the La Carrousel, which was open because a steward had previously opened the room,[20] and assisted in preparing the buffet table, rearranging and setting up the guest tables, and serving the food. Grimes testified that Moore arrived at 7:30 a.m., noticed him working that meal, and after stating that he had no business there, ordered Grimes to return to the Imperial Ballroom.[21]

With regard to his greeting to Bass, Grimes testified that "I said 'Good morning, Beulah baby" and that Bass returned his greeting, did not appear to be angry, upset, or irritated and did not complain about his manner of speaking. He further testified that he greeted "everybody" in that manner and that he used the same greeting to Bass prior to that morning and, also, subsequent to September 15. Beulah Bass, on the other hand, testified that Grimes "usually did not speak to me," that he said, sarcastically, "'Well, good morning, Beulah baby,'" and that she neither smiled nor responded in any way. According to Bass, Grimes, in the past, "might" have greeted her with a hello but never in such a manner or in the same tone of voice as that morning. Inasmuch as "it just upset me the way he talked to me is all," Bass immediately went to the Greenery manager, Douglas Brown, and requested permission to complain directly to the personnel office regarding Grimes' conduct.[22] Douglas Brown corroborated Bass in this regard—"Beulah approached me and stated James Grimes concerned her and said 'Hi Beulah, baby,' or words to that effect. She was very livid, she was very upset. She asked if she could go to personnel and talk to Ron Juneman. I said 'Of course.'"[23]

[17] The parties stipulated that Bell is a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[18] According to Moore, a banquet waiter must receive a voucher in order to be paid for working a particular meal, and there would be no occasion when a waiter would not receive one after working a meal. Contrary to Moore, Grimes testified that it was not unusual for him not to receive a voucher after a meal because he was a leadman, was hourly paid, and did not expect a voucher for everything.

[19] Moore testified that she could recall the events of September 15 with particular clarity because of the Beulah Bass incident and because it was Grimes' first day back at work after being off for a while—"I know exactly where he worked on the 15th. . . . I kinda picture myself—picture things back in my mind, and I can kinda remember that"—while denying that her memory of Grimes' schedule for September 15 was based on his vouchers for that day, she had no recollection as to where Grimes worked on September 14 or 16 because she did not have Grimes' work vouchers for those dates.

[20] Moore asserted that only she was authorized to open the La Carrousel restaurant for banquet employees to work there; however, she admitted that a steward could open the room for employees of another department to work.

[21] Grimes acknowledged that he did not receive a voucher for working the buffet breakfast in La Carrousel.

[22] Asked why it was so important that she report the incident to the personnel office, Bass answered, "I don't know why I did." She asserted that she complained to personnel in the past about similar incidents but could give no examples and later admitted this was the first such occasion. Bass denied that Respondent Personnel Director Juneman asked her to report any incidents involving union supporters.

[23] Brown testified that although he normally accompanies employees to the personnel department, he did not do so on this occasion as Bass "was so upset and so livid, in fact incoherent to the point she was in tears almost . . . ." Brown further testified that he was not surprised how Grimes' greeting affected Bass "because she was taking a lot of verbal harassment from fellow employees around that hotel, before . . . and after the election." He continued, "It was probably a day where she just finally broke. . . ."

As a result of this incident, Grimes was given a "communication to employee" notice dated September 15, 1981. The disciplinary notice was authorized by Juneman and signed by Gordon Bell, and two reasons for the action are set forth therein: "You were observed in an unauthorized area of the hotel [Greenery kitchen]. You have been previously warned"[24] and "Sexual harrassment — Beulah Bass (called her Beulah Baby in a vulgar way)." The notice was given to Grimes by Gordon Bell; the former denied the contents of the document and refused to sign it. Ronald Juneman testified that Grimes' greeting to Bass was considered as constituting sexual harassment and, as such, violative of Respondent's persistent[25] campaign against such conduct.[26]

On Sunday evening, October 4, 1981, Grimes was scheduled and worked three dinners, two on the mezzanine level and the last, a group of Catholic priests, in a room on the Trianon level,[27] which is located one level above the hotel lobby. Grimes testified that he served the latter dinner and cleared the dishes from the tables onto carts between 7:30 and 8:30 p.m. and that he was resting in the employee hallway when William French, a houseman, came through the swinging doors and approached him. French began scooping uneaten food off the dinner dishes, which were stacked on the carts, and eating it.[28] French turned to Grimes and, according to the latter, said, "'When are you folks going to get—you people going to get our back time and raise?' And I looked at him and I said, 'As soon as we can get this back to the table, French.' And after that I replied to him, 'I'm sure the union ain't never did nothing for you.' And then this was the end of the conversation. He turned and went back into the Trianon area." Grimes further testified that he was not scheduled for work on October 5 (Monday) and that when he reported for work on Tuesday, October 6, he was ordered to report to Personnel Director Juneman's office where he found Mary Moore and Juneman waiting for him. According to Grimes, he had no idea why he was ordered to report to the personnel office.

William French[29] testified that he reported for work at approximately 7 p.m. on Sunday and that after cleaning the lobby and the public restrooms on that level, he moved up to the Trianon level. According to French, he had finished cleaning the ladies' restroom, which is located off the public hallway on said level, and was emerging from it when James Grimes, who was standing next to the swinging doors which lead to the employee hallway, beckoned for French to come over to where he was standing. French did so, and Grimes "said he wanted to see me because that was the only time he had to talk to me. . . . he said he wanted to know if I was one of the guys, the people who was against the union." French did not reply, and Grimes said that the "only thing I wanted to talk to you so I'd know who was against the union so I can put it in the union report." French further testified that another, unidentified waiter was standing nearby and that Grimes had been "sitting" by the double doors. As to the time of the incident, French placed it as occurring at approximately 8 p.m., shortly before his lunchbreak in the "middle" of his shift that night. The next day,[30] according to French, he bypassed his immediate supervisor and reported on what had occurred the night before directly to Ronald Juneman as "I figured he would need to know what happened." French added that Mary Moore was present and that neither Juneman nor Moore asked him any questions about his account.

Contradicting French, Juneman testified that Executive Housekeeper Kay Sullivan, French's supervisor, telephoned him during the morning of October 5 and said that French wished to speak to him. Having requested that Mary Moore be present, Juneman and the former thereupon listened to French's version of the incident of the previous night. According to Juneman, French said that he had been cleaning the men's bathroom in the public area of the Trianon level and that "he was cornered by Mr. Grimes and he was threatened to be put on a list with the union, and he was just basically intimidated by the whole thing."[31] Again contradicting French, Juneman testified that he thereupon questioned French regarding the incident and asked him to return to work. After French departed, Juneman asked Moore to have Grimes report to his office.

James Grimes testified that when he arrived in Juneman's office, the latter immediately handed him a two-page document dated October 5, 1981 (G.C. Exh. 18), [24] With regard to the restriction from entering the Greenery kitchen, Mary Moore stated that it was based on Grimes doing union business there at unauthorized times and upon previous harassment of Beulah Bass. The latter, of course, stated that Grimes hardly spoke to her prior to September 15 and not as he did that day.

[25] Juneman testified that Respondent terminated two employees, one of whom was a managerial employee, for sexual harassment of female employees prior to the Bass incident.

[26] Lisa Helvey, the assistant personnel director, testified that Respondent's parent corporation, the Radisson Hotel Corporation, instructed Respondent to post notices throughout the hotel, informing employees of the corporation's policy against any form of sexual harassment. Upon receipt of these notices, R. Exh. 12, Juneman instructed her to post copies on employee bulletin boards, and Helvey did so in February 1981. Beulah Bass testified that copies of the notice were posted on the Greenery kitchen bulletin board and by the back door. James Grimes admitted that he was aware of said notices but asserted that he first observed one subsequent to receiving his reprimand for "greeting" Beulah Bass. As to Respondent's campaign against sexual harassment, Grimes admitted knowledge of the policy from the employee newspaper and from the holding of employee seminars regarding sexual discrimination.

[27] On this level, there is a public hallway, off which are some banquet rooms. An employee hallway is located to the rear of the banquet rooms and is reached from the public areas through two swinging doors.

[28] Such was a violation of Respondent's work rules; however, according to Grimes, he always "looked the other way" when employees did this.

[29] Grimes denied knowledge of French's attitude toward the Charging Party, while Juneman asserted that not only did he assume French was against the Charging Party but also French's sympathies were well known to other employees.

[30] French exhibited utter confusion as to when he reported the incident to Juneman. Initially, he testified that he spoke to Juneman on Monday at 8 a.m. Later, he testified that the time was 6:30 p.m.—just before he commenced work. Under intensive questioning on this point, French admitted, "I don't know what time it was." Finally, French placed the timing of his report to Juneman between 6 and 6:30 p.m. "I reported it the next day at the time when I came in."

[31] During cross-examination, Juneman asserted that the "conversation took place in two areas, outside the public restrooms where Mr. French was about to clean and then back in the service corridor."

and ordered Grimes to read it. It reads, inter alia, as follows:

According to Grimes, after reading and returning the document to Juneman, he said that "it was just pure harassment." Thereupon, believing he needed a representative from the Charging Party present, Grimes said "that I would need a representative" and specified Edward Miller. Juneman responded that Grimes did not need the presence of a representative of the union as he was a union steward. Thereafter, Juneman "went on through to ask me my side of the story of this particular paper," and Grimes related his version of what occurred on the previous Sunday evening. During cross-examination, Grimes denied admitting to either Juneman or Moore that he accosted French in a public area of the hotel.

Ronald Juneman testified that after Grimes arrived at his office, "we asked [Grimes] about the different facts in the case as relayed to us, and James confirmed the fact that he did stop and talk with Mr. French the day before and he had talked to him about various union matters, and he did talk to him in the public area as was described by Mr. French." Next, according to Juneman, he told Grimes what hotel rules had been violated by the latter and he would be suspended while Juneman investigated the facts more thoroughly. Grimes responded, ". . . yeah, I did those things but I didn't think I was doing wrong." Juneman continued, "James said that Mr. French approached him and he didn't approach Mr. French. Everything else pretty well agreed verbatim." Juneman asserted that Grimes admitted threatening to place French's name on a union list but said, "I didn't mean any harm by it or anything like that." Juneman further testified that he and Moore discussed the suspension immediately after Grimes left his office; that as a result of the meeting with Grimes, Respondent's Exhibit 14, which is identical to General Counsel's Exhibit 18, was passed around for the signatures of the meeting participants, including Grimes; and that Grimes signed the document. Finally during cross-examination, Juneman averred that a major reason underlying his reaction to the incident of October 4 was that French appeared to be "honestly visibly shaken. He was scared. He feared for his physical well-being."

Mary Moore, whose recollection of the events of October 6 was hardly a model of clarity, testified that she had no idea why she was asked by Juneman to come to his office that day but that she met with Juneman, Grimes, and French. She said that the latter spoke first and said that "James Grimes approached him and kind of like on some threatening remarks about something that happened to the union. . . . Frenchy said he was cleaning the halls. . . . And James Grimes was down there a little earlier, he was to work a function, but he was there earlier than he should have been. . . . And he said something about James, they were talking about the union. . . . They had some words about it. . . . And Frenchy said that Mr. Grimes said . . . somebody was going to get him . . . and they would get him one way or another." After French related his version of the October 4 incident, Grimes spoke, and, according to Moore, he admitted speaking to French that night: "Mr. Grimes said—well, something that they both had said something to that effect, that someone was out to get him.. . . And Mr. Grimes said that . . . both of them was talking about the incident, about the union." Moore further testified that, at this point in the interview, French left Juneman's office. Grimes remained and continued talking about the incident, "saying something, that he was a man and felt like a man had his opinion to say what he wanted to say. And, you know, he just went on and on." As to the document (marked as G.C. Exh. 18 or R. Exh. 14), Moore says it was given to Grimes "on a different occasion" most likely on October 7 and that at this meeting, which she, Grimes, and Juneman attended, Juneman asked if Grimes desired having a representative there; the latter "stated that he was a steward and he did not need anyone to represent him, he was his own representative because he was a steward at the hotel." Grimes was suspended after this meeting. Later, during direct examination, Moore recalled that the meeting during which Grimes and French spoke occurred on Monday, October 5, and that the meeting at which Grimes was suspended occurred the next day.[33]

There is no dispute that Grimes was terminated on October 9. According to Moore, "We kind of like investigated some other things in the past that had happened, including past write-ups against Grimes such as the Beulah Bass incident and being in unauthorized areas of the hotel, interfering with other employees doing their jobs. It was just a series of things. . . . I can't remember all of them, improper service . . . if you gave him one way of doing it, he had his own way he wanted to do it." Moore testified that she had observed Grimes' work, and "he had gotten very sloppy." Also, she mentioned two arguments which Grimes had with Respondent's supervisors: a fight with an individual named Bennie Barrera in 1968 and an incident involving Respondent's sous chef on August 4, 1981.[34] During cross-examination, Moore asserted having written up Grimes "several times" for sloppy work including the dropping of trays (she could recall neither the dates or dispositions) and the serving of food, wrapped in cellophane, during a dinner in June 1981.[35] Finally, Moore recalled an altercation between Grimes and an unidentified Greenery manager but could not recall when it occurred or what happened.

Ronald Juneman testified that he, Moore, and Helvey jointly made the decision to terminate Grimes during the period of his suspension. "We investigated . . . to determine all the facts regarding James Grimes' service record at that point and time . . . in an effort to determine whether or not he had been notified on previous occasions about various violations of company policy. We had to find out how we handled other individuals in like situations. . . . And based on gathering all our information . . . we made the determination to terminate." According to Juneman, who denied that Grimes' position as shop steward was a factor in his decision, the entire contents[36] of Grimes' personnel file, including [33] Moore testified that the suspension was "based on being in unauthorized areas. There are a series of things, not just one."

[34] Grimes readily admitted almost having an altercation, during which he was prepared to utilize a knife in apparent self-defense, with the sous chef, Martin Dickey, involving Grimes eating food which the sous chef had prepared and which Grimes should not have eaten. A fight between the two was narrowly averted; however, both men received disciplinary notices giving each a 1-week suspension without pay. Also, both were warned that for any further violation of hotel policy, ". . . you will be immediately terminated."

[35] With regard to the cellophane incident, Grimes admitted its occurrence but asserted that a hotel steward brought the cellophane-wrapped dishes into the room and that the cellophane should have been removed in the kitchen. As a result, Grimes received from Moore a reminder notice that he was not to serve food in such a manner again. Grimes asserted that Moore was also disciplined for the incident. Moore denied this, saying her involvement concerned correcting his conduct.

[36] There is no dispute that 2 days before the decertification election, on September 9, William Speidel held a series of meetings with employees during which he made a show of ripping up documents which were to be expunged from employees' files. In this regard, Grimes quoted Speidel as saying "that all reprimands in your file, regardless . . . which way the voting went . . . he would discontinue. And he took one up and tore it up." Thelma Glover, who was the other shop steward and who also attended such a meeting, testified that Speidel discussed documents in the personnel files, "and he said that anybody had a clean record as of now, and he had a piece of paper in his hand and he just ripped it loose." Approximately 2 weeks later, in a letter to all employees dated September 25, Speidel wrote the following: "Have you checked your personnel file? Many employees have and were pleased to learn that WE KEEP OUR PROMISES. All of those old communications were removed. Let's make sure we keep our files clean." Two questions arise from the foregoing—to what documents did Speidel refer on September 9 and in the September 25 letter and should all disciplinary notices have been removed from Grimes' personnel file prior to October 1981. As to the first question, Speidel testified that during the week of September 9, he instructed Lisa Helvey to remove all existing employee communication notices from employees' files; that all these documents were placed in a box; and that in his speeches to employees it was to these that he referred. "I announced to the employees at each of those meetings [that] we were going to tear up, destroy the communications notices. . . . I took the forms and ripped a few of them up and we ultimately destroyed them all." Speidel further testified that he did not direct that anything else be removed from employees files and that G.C. Exh. 10 is the type of document which was removed. Corroborating Speidel, Helvey testified that in the first week of September 1981 she was instructed to remove all "communications to employees" from the personnel files. She did so, removing all pink, yellow, or white copies of such. With regard to the effective date of the removal of these notices, Speidel gave it as September 11, all communications after this date would remain in the files. Finally, as to the September 25 letter, Speidel says it was sent "to confirm that we live by our promises."

Regarding the pre-September 11, 1981 disciplinary documents in James Grimes' personnel file, Speidel testified that neither R. Exh. 6 (the March memo from Juneman to Grimes warning him about conducting union business during work hours) or R. Exh. 10 (the memo from Moore to Grimes concerning the cellophane-wrapped food) should have been expunged from Grimes' file as neither is on a "communication to employees" type form. However, Speidel conceded that the latter's content is such that it should have been removed.

communication notices, were considered in arriving at the aforementioned decision. Among the documents examined, as to Grimes' past behavior, were the March memorandum from Juneman (R. Exh. 6) concerning the unauthorized conduct of union business,[37] the July memo concerning the cellophane-wrapped food, and the August 1-week suspension letter over the sous chef incident. Helvey, whom Juneman identified as participating in the discharge decision, said nothing about this during her testimony.

4. The Thelma Glover letter

The record establishes that Thelma Glover works for Respondent as a "linen runner," is supervised by George Mills, and, as stated above, is a union steward for the Charging Party. She testified that on December 15, 1981, employee Jim Barber approached her and said that he was sick, that he had seen a doctor, and that he was required to go to a hospital. Glover produced a hospital card and showed it to Barber, saying that most of the older employees had them. Barber said that he did not have one, and Glover told him to go to the personnel office and inquire about the card during his break period. Later, Barber informed Glover that he had gone to the personnel office and had spoken to Ronald Juneman, who told Barber that Respondent had nothing to do with insurance matters and said that Barber should not ask the hotel about such problems. Shortly after this second conversation with Barber, Glover's supervisor Mills told her to report to Juneman's office at approximately 2:15 p.m.; Glover did so. ". . . Mr. Juneman . . . says, 'Thelma, I don't want you telling anybody else about this insurance because it's no good and you know it.' And so I say, 'Well, Mr. Juneman, I can't say it about the insurance because I went in the hospital . . . and was in there for six days. . . . It paid my hospital bill.' And he said, 'Well, we got a better insurance to offer, the insurance is no good.'" At this point, according to Glover, Juneman raised the subject of employee Katherine Relms and said the employees' health insurance did not cover her entire hospital bill, and she had trouble paying the difference. Glover responded that she had nothing to do with it and that the insurance company paid her bills. Juneman raised the matter of the hospitalization cards and said Respondent did not "give them anymore." He continued, saying he would write her up over the matter of the cards. Glover replied, "Well, I been doing it, I've been coming down her seeing if you all had the little hospital card.'" A day or two later, Glover received in the mail a copy of a letter, dated December 16, from Juneman to Clarence Owens, the Charging Party's secretary-treasurer. This letter concerns a meeting the previous day between Glover and Juneman during which, according to Juneman, they initially discussed a problem with an unpaid doctor's bill owed by Glover since December 17, 1980. The letter continues:

> In addition we informed Ms. Glover that we, the personnel office, is [sic] victim to the Union's faulty insurance handling practices. Further, Ms. Glover was under the impression that we are suppose [sic] to pass out hospitalization cards and other union materials.
> We do not have such cards and therefore we are not responsible for handling your administrative deficiencies.
> Lastly, we informed Ms. Glover in our meeting that she is misinforming our employees as to what the union benefits (or lack of) are.
> We respectfully request that the union, through its officers, officials, and agents stop misinforming our staff in the Health and Welfare benefits. Please meet with Thelma to inform her as to what your benefits include.
> Future information distribution by Thelma Glover either verbally or in writing which misrepresents our hotel or operating practices will be considered misconduct. Misconduct of this nature will be subject to our standard disciplinary procedures.[38]
> Glover testified during cross-examination that she received no disciplinary notices concerning this matter.

Director of Personnel Juneman testified that in December 1981 he learned from his assistant that Glover was encountering difficulties in processing health claims through the Charging Party's insurance carrier. According to Juneman, he spoke to Glover and informed her that Respondent handled only the preliminary paperwork and that, if the problems continued, she should have representatives of the Charging Party speak to its insurance agents. Thereafter, Glover appeared back in Juneman's office with similar questions, and, after speaking to her, Juneman wrote a letter (G.C. Exh. 13) to Clarence Owens, advising him to speak to Glover on the matter. He further testified that no discipline was given to Glover, and nothing was placed in her personnel folder.

5. The discharge of Edna Hayes

The record reveals that Edna Hays had been employed by Respondent as a maid for 32 years until her discharge on June 8, 1982. She worked in the housekeeping department wherein Kay Sullivan is the executive housekeeper, Lena Grimes, the wife of alleged discriminatee James Grimes, is the assistant to Sullivan, and John Monroe is the head houseman.[39] Hayes, who admitted that she was not an active supporter of the Charging Party during the 1981 election campaign, testified that she reported for work at 8:30 a.m. on Friday, June 4, that she commenced working on her assigned rooms on the 11th floor, and that at approximately 9:15 she went [37] Juneman considered it highly significant as it involved Grimes' conduct as union steward.

[38] Juneman continued, writing that Glover's statements were violative of, among others, Rule 11 of Respondent's "Standards And Conduct." Said rule proscribes: "Making or publishing false, vicious, or malicious statements concerning any employee, supervisor, the Company, the Hotel or any other service establishment or individual directly or indirectly related to the conduct of Company or Hotel business."

[39] It was admitted that Grimes, Morrow, and Sullivan are supervisors within the meaning of the Act.

down to the "linen room," a combination office and supply area for the housekeeping staff, wherein she encountered Grimes and Morrow. The former was sitting on a desk near the edge and Morrow was seated behind it, and they were in the midst of a conversation. Grimes was relating to Morrow how the Charging Party had mistreated her husband, saying that she advised him to stay away from it as "they didn't do nothing for you when you needed help." Morrow said that he agreed with everything Grimes said. Closing the room door behind her, Hayes walked over to the desk and interrupted the conversation, asking Grimes why she would talk like that. After Grimes repeated that the Charging Party was no good, Hayes asked if Grimes had seen "the article" in the previous night's newspaper regarding relations between Respondent and the Charging Party. Grimes responded, "What articles?" and Hayes announced that Clarence Owens ("Squeaky" to Hayes) and another had been fired and that "a statement was there where they said they had not received tax money or the money for the taxes since February." Both Morrow and Grimes professed disbelief; Hayes said the story was in the newspaper and on television, gathered her supplies, and returned to work.[40]

Hayes reported back to the linen room after lunch and discovered that the newspaper article to which she had referred "was plastered up beside the timeclock. . . . It wasn't the original. It was a certified copy but it was out there." Morrow approached and asked Hayes to go into Sullivan's office. Hayes knocked on the door and entered. Sullivan said, "Why, Edna, I am just surprised at you. I am just shocked. I am just shocked." Hayes asked what was wrong, and Sullivan replied, "It was brought to me by four different people that you put it out on the hotel that we hadn't paid the union money." Hayes announced surprise, asked Sullivan to identify the four individuals, and said she should not speak for unidentified witnesses. Sullivan replied that she was "furious" at Hayes, that Speidel was "just spitting fire," and that Juneman was "so upset." Thereupon, Sullivan said that Hayes was suspended and should report to Juneman on the following Tuesday, her next scheduled day. Moments later, Grimes entered with a suspension notice for Hayes. The document stated "today you were making comments to numerous employees that the hotel had not paid dues or other money to the union since January. This is not true information" and alleged that such conduct was violative of, among others, Respondent's aforementioned employee conduct rule 11.

Lena Grimes testified that at 7:45 that morning she and John Morrow were working on the maids' schedules in the linen room when Hayes entered and asked if either had seen the morning paper. Both said no, "and she said they had an article that read in there, stating the hotel had not sent the union any money since February 5th. I said I don't believe that. So she went around and got her supplies and I started talking to her about a conversation that had happened at home over the telephone between my husband and the guy they work over to Local 64." Thereupon, Hayes left the room.[41] According to Grimes, she assumed,[42] without any proof, that other maids had overheard what Hayes reported inasmuch as maids normally congregate outside the linen room and as Hayes speaks in a loud voice. Thereafter, Grimes reported the incident to Sullivan and, approximately an hour and a half later, Grimes further testified, maid Elizabeth Santos entered Sullivan's office and said she wanted her union dues returned. Neither Grimes nor Sullivan replied, and Santos departed. Almost immediately, Sullivan telephoned Juneman who instructed Sullivan to prepare a communication to employee notice for Hayes because the latter seemed to be repeating the same story to other employees and had gotten Santos disturbed enough to demand the return of her dues money.

On Tuesday, June 8, 1982, Hayes reported to Ronald Juneman's office as directed and was informed by Lisa Helvey that because she had acted in violation of Respondent's rules she was terminated. Other than to Lena Grimes and John Morrow, Hayes denied discussing the contents of the newspaper article with any hotel employee on June 4. Finally, no evidence was offered as to whether Hayes' report of the contents of the newspaper article was false.

6. The refusal-to-arbitrate grievances

The record reveals that the existing collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Charging Party contains a provision, article XXVII, entitled "Definition of Employees." Within this article, paragraph 28.4 states, "An extra employee is an individual who works at an Employer Hotel from time to time, who is not an employee of any particular hotel and who is not a full-time employee, part-time employee or a banquet extra employee." The agreement gives as examples of such individuals: extra bartenders, extra housemen, and cash bar cashiers. The record further reveals that, with regard to extra banquet personnel, paragraph 10 of Exhibit A to the collective-bargaining agreement provides that none shall be employed except as provided by the Charging Party—unless the latter is unable to furnish a sufficient number. The paragraph also provides that the Charging Party must submit the names of prospective banquet employees to employers regardless of their union membership or lack thereof; that the employer may accept or reject such applicants; and that the Charging Party must give 24 hours' notice to the employer of the names of said individuals if the employer's request is made 48 hours in advance. There is no dispute herein that Respondent utilized, at all times material herein, extra banquet waitresses in order to supplement its regular employees at the numerous functions held at the hotel.

The collective-bargaining agreement also contains a grievance and arbitration provision, article V. As set [40] According to Hayes, at approximately 11:35 that morning, her floor supervisor, Lilly Ramey, passed by the room in which she was working, and said, "Hey, baby. What is all this about the union I'm hearing?" Hayes replied, asking if Ramey read the newspaper the previous night. Ramey said no, and Hayes told her to purchase a copy and read it herself.

[41] During cross-examination, Grimes admitted that the door was closed, that Hayes merely reported what was written in the newspaper article and was not giving her own opinion.

[42] "If she told me, she had told someone else."

forth therein, the grievance procedure consists of successive steps, the last being arbitration if grievances cannot be "satisfactorily" settled earlier. The article further provides that either party can request arbitration merely by giving the other notice of same within predetermined time restrictions. During the time period, November 12, 1981, through May 24, 1982, six individuals (Maurine Donnelly, Marguerite C. Stimac, Clara Walker, Tony Poke, Evelyn Anderson, and Rachael Dominquez), who work as extra banquet waitresses, filed individual grievances against Respondent, the underlying reasons and merits of which are not pertinent to this decision. Each grievance was filed on the Charging Party's standard grievance form and, in all respects, seems[43] to have complied with the contractual requirements. Moreover, it appears that Respondent processed each grievance through the various steps of the grievance procedure up to, but not including, arbitration. With regard to this last stage, the record establishes that the Charging Party's attorney requested arbitration of each grievance; that he notified Respondent of such; that the attorney sent letters to counsel for Respondent, requesting that he join taking steps to "strike" the arbitration panels and stating that, if the counsel did not respond, he (the Charging Party's attorney) would assume that Respondent would refuse to arbitrate; and that Respondent's counsel did not respond. The foregoing was uncontroverted.

B. Analysis

1. The Beatrice Edwards reprimand

The consolidated complaint alleges that the reprimand, in the form of a communication to employee notice, given to Beatrice Edwards by the acting manager of the Greenery restaurant, Reggie Williams, on September 25, 1981, was violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In support, counsel for the General Counsel argues that such was "nothing but a pretext to cover . . . Respondent's harassment of a known Union supporter." On the other hand, counsel for Respondent contends that the discipline was justified inasmuch as Edwards had violated restaurant policy by, on at least four occasions, serving customers at a table in Beulah Bass' service area and, thereby, depriving her of an opportunity to wait on said table.

At the outset, I note that Edwards had been an overt and known supporter of the Charging Party during the decertification election campaign, which had culminated in the NLRB-conducted election 2 weeks earlier; that the individuals who were seated at the table in Bass' station were union officials; that Bass was the employee who filed the decertification election petition and was aware of the identities of the two aforementioned individuals; that Bass admittedly refused to take their breakfast orders; that the two union officials waited in excess of 20 minutes for Bass to finally bring their meals; and that while it was contrary to established policy for a waitress to wait upon tables in another's station, it was a common practice, as Bass admitted, for a passing waitress to pour coffee or cream or water for a customer in another waitress' area. While there is no dispute that Edwards did wait upon the union officials that morning, Edwards and Harold Hamilton, both of whom testified candidly and forthrightly and are credited herein, insisted that the former did so only to the extent of pouring coffee on one occasion and cream on another. In contrast, Bass testified that she observed Edwards at the union officials' table at least four times; however, I found her account replete with inconsistencies and therefore not credible. In particular, I note that while initially asserting she took the officials their coffee, water, and menus, Bass later testified that when she first noticed them, they already had coffee, water, silverware, and menus in front of them and that after initially asserting that Edwards was at the union officials' table four or five times before she served them, Bass later testified that Edwards was at that table four or five times after she served the food.

While it seems obvious that Bass did, indeed, register with Williams, a complaint, regarding Edwards' conduct, I believe it likely that, based on the foregoing, such was greatly embellished to imbue the occurrence with more significance than it deserved. That Acting Manager Williams recognized the inherent triviality of the conduct is clear from the fact that he sought to justify the resulting discipline with what appears to be an entirely spurious allegation—that Edwards was "insubordinate" to him. Not a scintilla of evidence exists in the record in support thereof, and Respondent offered no explanation for the failure to utilize Williams as a witness in order to explain the basis for this allegation. In sum, the extent of whatever insubordination Edwards may have engaged—and I am not prepared, and do not, find that she engaged in any—appears to have been grossly and unjustifiably exaggerated to the point that such seems to be utterly pretextual. Thus, I believe Respondent, through Williams, acted to punish a known supporter of the Charging Party for said support and, perhaps, to protect Beulah Bass, an individual who was an antagonist of the Charging Party—in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

2. James Grimes

The consolidated complaint alleges that both the reprimand, in the form of a communication to employee notice, given to Grimes on September 15, and his subsequent suspension and ultimate discharge on October 9, 1981, were violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In support, counsel for the General Counsel asserts that these actions were in retaliation for Grimes' activities as a union steward[44] and for his support for the [43] Respondent's attorney argues in his posthearing brief that these grievances were not in compliance with art. V but is not specific as to how. I can find no facts to substantiate noncompliance.

[44] It is well established that an employer violates Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act when he disciplines employees solely because of their status as shop stewards (Precision Castings Co., 233 NLRB 183, 184 (1977); United Aircraft Corp., 188 NLRB 633 (1971)), or as a result of their conduct as union stewards in processing grievances, policing collective-bargaining agreements, or engaging in other such activities. Charging Party. Also, it is alleged that the interview which was conducted with Grimes by Juneman and Moore subsequent to the October 4, 1981 incident with William French was contrary to the rules set forth in NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), and, thereby, violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. With regard to his discharge, counsel for Respondent argues that Grimes had a long history of misconduct; therefore, his discharge was warranted and not motivated by unlawful concerns.

Initially, I note that resolution of the foregoing issues depends, to a great extent, upon a determination of the credibility of the various witnesses, most particularly Grimes, Moore, and Juneman. While finding that none of the three testified entirely candidly concerning the instant matters, I was least impressed with the demeanor and memory of Mary Moore. I found her recollection of the events of September and October 1981 to be clearly deficient and believe that, based on the aforementioned contradictions, both internally with other points in her testimony and externally with the testimony of other witnesses, she attempted to fill the gaps in her memory with fabrications. I credit Moore not at all herein. James Grimes also impressed me as being an inherently incredible witness and believe that, in most areas, he testified in a manner calculated to support his allegations. Except when in conflict with Mary Moore or where uncontroverted, I do not rely on Grimes' testimony. Evaluation of his testimony convinces me that Ronald Juneman engaged in the odious practice, which seemed to be endemic to several of Respondent's witnesses, of embellishing significant aspects of his testimony in order to bolster Respondent's case. Nevertheless, while testifying, he impressed me as being more candid than either Moore or Grimes. Accordingly, while I recognize the obvious problems with, and deficiencies in, his testimony, and do not rely on what I consider to be greatly exaggerated portions, Juneman will be credited herein.

The critical issue, of course, in determining the legality of the disciplinary actions taken against Grimes is whether the September 15 reprimand and the suspension and subsequent termination were motivated by his support for the Charging Party and by his activities as union steward. In cases such as herein, where motivation is the determining factor, the Board requires "that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected activity was a 'motivating factor' . . . . [then] the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980).[45] As to whether there exists evidence in the record of unlawful motivation, I initially note that the restriction prohibiting Grimes from being in the area of the Greenery kitchen was given to him in August 1981—in the midst of the decertification election campaign. In this regard, Grimes consistently denied speaking to employees about union business while passing through that area; Juneman, who issued the restriction, failed to offer any explanation for it during his testimony; and Mary Moore's assertion that one reason for the restriction was Grimes' harassment of Beulah Bass was not corroborated by the latter (Bass, in fact, said that Grimes rarely spoke to her and that such was one reason Grimes' September 15 "greeting" so upset her). These factors certainly support the inference that the area restriction was related to Grimes' status as a union steward and intended to somehow keep him away from, or at least inhibit his ability to meet, the Greenery employees during the decertification election campaign.[46] As further support for the existence of required unlawful motivation is the fact that Juneman failed to controvert Grimes' testimony regarding a meeting between the two in a hotel hallway also in early August during which Juneman accused the union steward of "running the place." The fact that Juneman smiled while he spoke does not detract from the impact of his words.[47]

Bearing in mind the foregoing, I turn to a consideration of whether the reprimand given to Grimes over his "greeting" to Beulah Bass on September 15 was violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. What immediately strikes me with regard to this discipline is its similarity, in terms of cause and reaction, to that given Beatrice Edwards 10 days later. Thus, as with Edwards' conduct in serving the two union officials coffee and cream, Grimes' "Good morning, Beulah baby" comment appears to have been of a trivial nature and, notwithstanding his undoubtedly caustic tone of voice, not particularly menacing or abusive. That Respondent seems to have embellished the necessity for its reaction to Grimes' conduct is clear from Douglas Brown's characterization of Bass after the incident—incoherent to the point of tears. Bass herself did not corroborate this, describing herself merely as upset. Further illustrative of Respondent's effort to exaggerate the seriousness of Grimes' action is the rationale for the discipline, alleging him to have been in an unau-

Motors Corp., 233 NLRB 47 (1977)). However, a union steward may remove himself from the protection of the Act if his conduct as steward exceeds acceptable bounds of conduct such as forming a strike in violation of a contractual no-strike clause (J. P. Wetherby Construction Corp., 182 NLRB 690 (1970)), instructing employees not to follow work orders (Stop & Shop, Inc., 161 NLRB 75 (1966)), refusing to follow instructions and influencing other employees to so act (Riviera Mfg. Co., 167 NLRB 772 (1967)), and deliberately violating established grievance-handling procedures (Rickel Home Centers, 262 NLRB 731 (1982)). Further, as any employee in a collective-bargaining or labor relations context, stewards may lose the protection of the Act if they engage in clearly opprobrious, disruptive behavior. Container Corp. 255 NLRB 1404 (1981); Chrysler Corp., 249 NLRB 1102 (1980); Consolidated Freightways Corp. 242 NLRB 770 (1979).

[45] In concluding that a prima facie violation of the Act has been established, the Board will not "quantitatively analyze" the effect of the unlawful motive. The existence of such is sufficient to make a discharge a violation of the Act. Wright Line, supra at 1089, fn. 14.

[46] As such, of course, it failed, for Grimes did have access to the Greenery employees during nonwork hours.

[47] Counsel for the General Counsel contends that Gordon Bell's alleged comments to Grimes during their short conversation in Moore's office—2 days before the decertification election—likewise exhibited Respondent's animus towards Grimes. However, between the two, I credit Bell as to this conversation and find no evidence of animus. Bell's demeanor was that of a truthful witness, and I find it odd that apparently the only reported instance of such alleged remarks would be to a union steward, who would certainly be a union supporter and who would be more knowledgeable about employer-employee relations than the average employee.

thorized area that morning. Assuming arguendo the validity of the restriction, I do not believe Grimes was not supposed to be in the Greenery area at that time. Thus, crediting Grimes over Mary Moore as I have, I believe he had been instructed to work a buffet breakfast in the La Carrousel restaurant by the catering captain and it was not until after the incident, when Moore arrived at work, that Grimes was ordered away from the area. In short, I conclude that Respondent justified the communication to employee notice with a blatant fabrication and that the other asserted reason for the discipline (sexual harassment)[48] was merely a pretext to disguise Respondent's real motivation—Grimes' union activities as steward. The reprimand was, therefore, violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

With regard to the suspension and eventual discharge of Grimes on October 9, it is initially necessary to examine the precipitating cause—the William French incident on Sunday evening, October 4. Initially, counsel for the General Counsel does not dispute the fact that French did, in fact, complain to Ronald Juneman the next day about what had occurred the previous evening. Close scrutiny of the record[49] convinces me that not only did French truthfully testify as to his version of the incident but also he truthfully reported the event to Juneman. Thus, if one were to credit Grimes' account of his meeting with French, there simply would have been no reason for the latter to have complained to Juneman. Moreover, he would have admitted a violation of a strictly enforced work rule prohibiting the eating of banquet food by employees. Further, I did not believe Grimes' statement, disclaiming knowledge of French's union sympathies. To the contrary, illustrated by his sarcasm to the antiunion Beulah Bass, Grimes, I believe, was undoubtedly quite capable of intimidating another union foe, French, in the manner alleged. However, while I find, as French testified, that at approximately 8 p.m. on October 4 Grimes beckoned to French to speak to him in the public hallway near the swinging doors on the Trianon level and that Grimes, after inquiring if French was one of those against the Union, said he would place said information "in the union report" and that French accurately reported the facts to Juneman, the record justifies the inference, as with the previously discussed reprimands to Edwards and Grimes over the Beulah Bass incidents, that Respondent embellished the facts in order to inflate the seriousness of alleged misconduct toward an antiunion employee. Thus, while French testified that he reported the incident to Juneman merely because "I figured he would need to know what happened" the latter characterized French as being "honestly visibly shaken. He was scared. He feared for his physical well-being" and asserted that such was an important consideration in his decision to discipline Grimes. Further, Respondent's account of the facts in the suspension notice (G.C. Exh. 18), implies that Grimes accosted French clearly in a public area (on an escalator) and coerced and intimidated him during their conversation. In light of the foregoing, and of the evidence of unlawful animus in the record, counsel for the General Counsel contends that the suspension and discharge of Grimes for the French incident was pretextual and that the real reason was his status as union steward. I believe that a prima facie case has been established in this regard.

The burden of proof, thus, shifted to Respondent to demonstrate that it would have reached the same decision and taken the identical actions notwithstanding Grimes' activities and status as a union steward. In establishing its defense, Respondent relies on the testimony of Moore and Juneman. As discussed above, I place no reliance on that of the former; however, I do rely on and credit the testimony of Juneman concerning the reasons for the discharge of Grimes as, I believe, such is corroborated by the record as a whole. I do so cognizant of the fact that, while testifying and in documents, Juneman utterly exaggerated the seriousness of the French incident. Two factors are crucial to my conclusion. Initially, notwithstanding Respondent's embellishment, it does appear that Grimes, in fact, did engage in misconduct on the evening of October 4. Thus, Grimes violated a work rule by, without permission, speaking to French about ostensible union business during worktime in a public area. While counsel for the General Counsel argues that article XIV of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement applies only to outside business agents, Grimes admitted that he understood said rule or an identical rule applied to his conduct as a union steward. Further, while one may dispute the level of coercion, certainly the only logical purpose behind Grimes' conduct was to intimidate a fellow employee who had not supported the Charging Party during the recently concluded decertification election campaign. Next, Grimes' previous record of misconduct, which record, Juneman testified, was crucial to the decision to terminate the union steward, supports Juneman's credibility. In particular, I note the March 13 "reminder" to Grimes and his August 10 1-week suspension letter. As to the former, it was issued to Grimes as a result of complaints from employees regarding his penchant for discussing union business while on duty. Grimes admitted the factual basis for the document and his receipt of it. As to the latter, what is significant is Respondent's admonition that another violation of Respondent's employee rules and regulations would result in immediate termination. Further, there is no record evidence that either disciplinary action was unlawfully motivated or that Respondent's reliance on them was in bad [48] I accept as accurate the seriousness of Respondent's policy prohibiting the sexual harassment of employees and do not mean to disparage it herein. However, I agree with counsel for the General Counsel that the surrounding circumstances support the conclusion that such was a pretext for the disciplining of Grimes, an act which was occasioned by Bass' convenient complaint about Grimes' rather innocuous comment to her. In this regard, it appears that his comment was not unlike that common in a restaurant environment and that previous incidents of punishment for sexual harassment were for far more serious conduct, such as propositioning a female employee.

Finally, that Respondent was not above harassing the Charging Party's stewards is further demonstrated by its conduct toward Thelma Glover, as described infra.

[49] I have previously discussed the lack of credibility exhibited by Grimes during his testimony. Likewise, French was not a particularly impressive witness, exhibiting inconsistencies and contradicting other witnesses.

faith.[50] In these circumstances, given the similarity between the French incident and the March and August 1981 conduct, it would appear that Respondent has established that Grimes would have been terminated notwithstanding Respondent's demonstrated unlawful animus.[51]

Taking the position that disciplining a steward for speaking to other employees concerning their union sympathies chills communications between stewards and employees and discourages employees from becoming stewards, counsel for the General Counsel asserts that "while an employer who has problems resulting from a steward's conversation with other employees may discuss this matter with the steward or the Union, the Employer may not lawfully suspend or discharge the steward for this reason." No case support is cited for this assertion of steward immunity and to suggest that a steward, who violates an employer's rules and regulations, may not be disciplined by suspension and/or termination is a misstatement of Board law. Thus, in Rickel Home Centers, 262 NLRB 731, a steward, in attempting to resolve a work problem, engaged in conduct violative of a collective-bargaining agreement and the employer's work rules. Concluding that the steward's discharge was for "legitimate cause" and not motivated by his status or other union animus, the Board noted that the steward was insubordinate and violated established procedures and stated such conduct was "unprotected by the Act and for which his status as union steward provided no immunity." Id. Likewise, in Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., 240 NLRB 710 (1978), a steward engaged in insubordinate conduct—refusing to work scheduled hours. The Board concluded that "[h]is status as shop steward should not furnish the basis for immunity from his acts of insubordination." Id. at 713. Herein, Grimes, who 2 months earlier had been warned that another act of insubordination would result in his discharge, violated both contractual and employee work rules when he spoke to William French on October 4, 1981. His status as union steward can offer no immunity for this misconduct. Finally, it makes no difference that Juneman may have been desirous of being rid "of a thorn in his side." For, "if an employee provides an employer with a sufficient cause for his dismissal by engaging in conduct for which he would have been terminated in any event, and the employer terminates him for that reason, the circumstances that the employer welcomed the opportunity to discharge does not make it discriminatory and therefore unlawful." Klate Holt Co., 161 NLRB 1606, 1612 (1966). Based on the foregoing, I shall recommend that the consolidated complaint paragraphs pertaining to the discharge of James Grimes be dismissed. Rickel Home Centers, supra.

It is next alleged that the October 6 interview of James Grimes by Juneman and Moore was conducted in violation of the Supreme Court's Weingarten decision. As to this, Grimes testified that immediately upon entering Juneman's office that day, he was given a copy of his suspension letter and that, after reading it, he requested the presence of the Charging Party's official Edward Miller According to Grimes, Juneman denied the request because Grimes was a union steward. Grimes further testified that he was then asked for, and he related, his version of the meeting with French, never admitting the latter's version. Contrary to Grimes, Moore asserted that Juneman inquired as to whether Grimes desired the presence of a representative and the latter refused, saying he was a steward; that Grimes admitted that French's version of the Sunday night incident was correct; and that the suspension notice was given to Grimes on another occasion, after she and Juneman decided upon the discipline. During his testimony, Juneman said nothing about whether Grimes requested or he offered the presence of a union representative but did corroborate Moore that, while seeking to assuage the potential discipline, Grimes essentially corroborated French's version of the incident and that, afterward, he and Moore discussed the situation and decided to suspend Grimes, giving him, at that point, the suspension letter. With regard to the presence of a union representative, I credit the testimony of Grimes that he requested that Edward Miller be present during the interview but that Juneman denied the request. In this regard, while Moore testified that it was Juneman who made the offer of union representation to Grimes and that Grimes refused it, Juneman failed to corroborate the assertion. Essentially then, only a credibility resolution between Moore and Grimes remains and, as set forth above, I credit the latter in such instances. Further, while the suspension letter may have been drafted prior to the interview with Grimes (I credit him on this point), I credit the admissions of both Moore and Juneman that the final decision to suspend him was reached subsequent to his confirmation or corroboration of the facts, as previously related by French.[52]

In Weingarten, supra, the Supreme Court affirmed the determination of the Board that an employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by denying an employee's request that her union representative be present during an investigatory interview which, the employee reasonably believed, might result in disciplinary action. The Court noted that "the right arises only where the employee requests representation" and that the "employee may forgo his guaranteed right and, if he prefers and at his own instigation, participate in an interview unaccompanied by his union representative." Further, it makes no difference whether the employee interview be labeled investigatory or disciplinary. The Weingarten rules apply to both, save only those conducted for the exclusive purpose of notifying an employee of previously determined disciplinary action. Baton Rouge Water Works, 246 NLRB 995, 997–998 (1979). I have credited the testimony of Grimes that he requested the presence of Union Representative Miller upon reading of his suspension and that Juneman

[50] Counsel for the General Counsel does not contend that either should have been expunged subsequent to September 9, 1981, and I do not so find, bearing in mind that neither was the subject of a communication to employee notice.

[51] In this regard, I agree with Respondent's counsel that, given the fact that his wife was a managerial employee, it is highly unlikely that Respondent would have unlawfully terminated Grimes, thereby risking the potential loss of his wife.

[52] I do not credit Grimes' denial that he admitted the conduct as alleged by French.

denied his request and proceeded to interview Grimes as to the French incident. Further, as the meeting was not merely for the purpose of informing Grimes of his suspension,[53] I find Respondent's conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Houston Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 265 NLRB 1488 (1982).

3. The Thelma Glover letter

The consolidated amended complaint alleges that the letter from Juneman to Clarence Owens, dated December 16, 1981, wherein Juneman warned that future misrepresentation of Respondent's business practices by Glover would be considered "misconduct," was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In support, counsel for the General Counsel argues that even if Glover misrepresented Respondent's policies, the warning related directly to her performance as a steward; that such a warning would "chill" communications between stewards and employees; and that employees would be discouraged from acting in such a capacity for fear mistakes would adversely affect their status as employees. Finally, while no actual discipline attached, the warning is alleged as coercive inasmuch as Respondent offered no legitimate business purpose for issuing the warning. In defense. Respondent essentially argues that as no actual discipline was given to Glover, there was no violation of the Act.

I find merit in the position of counsel for the General Counsel. Initially, the law is settled that a shop steward, who, on behalf of fellow employees, makes assertions regarding matters pertaining to work, may not be lawfully disciplined for such by an employer notwithstanding the fact that said assertions are incorrect. NLRB v. Clayton Construction Corp., supra. Moreover, the Board has long held that an individual engages in protected concerted activities when he, in good faith, complains pursuant to a collective-bargaining agreement, notwithstanding that the complaints are without merit or in error. Delta Electric, 236 NLRB 1108, 1112 (1978); United Parcel Service, 234 NLRB 483, 491 (1978). There is no record evidence to suggest that Glover acted in anything but good faith when she sent an employee to Juneman with regard to a hospitalization card, an act clearly within her duties as a union steward. That she may have been in error is, of course, no justification for Respondent's resulting conduct. Further, I find no merit in Respondent's defense that no actual discipline attached. There is no doubt that Juneman's statement in the December 16 letter would have a chilling effect on stewards' activities at the hotel, causing the spectre of discipline to haunt Glover should she ever be mistaken in her advice to employees in the future. No business justification for such was offered and, indeed, I cannot perceive the existence of such. In these circumstances, I must conclude that Juneman's threat of discipline to Glover was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[53] Moore vaguely alluded to such a possibility; I discount it as not credible testimony.

4. The discharge of Edna Hayes

The consolidated complaint alleges that Edna Hayes was discharged by Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In support, counsel for the General Counsel urges three separate theories: that Hayes engaged in protected concerted activities when she made her comments to Lena Grimes and John Morrow behind the closed door of the linen room on the morning of June 4, 1982, and that her resultant discharge was violative of the Act; that by maintaining and enforcing rule 11 of its employee rules, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, causing any discharge for violation thereof likewise to be violative of the Act; and that if Respondent believed Hayes transmitted her comments to other employees and fired her for that reason, such is also violative of the Act. Taking a contrary position, counsel for Respondent asserts that Hayes engaged in no protected concerted activities and that rule 11 is not violative of the Act.

At the outset, the surrounding facts pertaining to Hayes' termination are not in dispute. Thus, in the morning of October 4, Hayes entered the linen room; closed the door; interrupted a conversation between Lena Grimes and John Morrow, both of whom were criticizing the Charging Party; and, calling their attention to an article in the previous afternoon newspaper, said that it was written therein that the hotel had not remitted any money to the Charging Party since February 5, 1982. Both Grimes and Morrow expressed their disbelief at Hayes' account of the newspaper article. There is no record evidence that any employee overheard Hayes' comments or that she repeated them to any other employee. Further, there is no evidence that she falsely or mistakenly reported the contents of the story. Finally, Hayes was suspended and subsequently terminated for telling "numerous" employees that Respondent had failed to remit dues moneys to the Charging Party—in violation of Respondent's aforementioned rule 11, among others.

I am convinced that, utilizing the asserted reason for her discharge, Hayes was terminated in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. As to the fact that Hayes allegedly related the contents of the newspaper article to numerous employees, if, as alleged, she engaged in such conduct, Hayes engaged in union and protected concerted activities within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act. Thus, as pointed out by counsel for the General Counsel and the Charging Party's attorney, in Datapoint Corp., 246 NLRB 234, 235 (1979), the Board held that a conversation may constitute protected concerted activity, notwithstanding that only a speaker and a listener are involved, when such relates to "matters of mutual concern to the affected employees." Here, the alleged conversations clearly concerned employees' terms and conditions of employment as portions of their wages were being withheld by Respondent for the payment of dues to the Charging Party. The fact that the moneys may not have been remitted to the Charging Party was obviously a matter of vital and common concern. Further, there is no record evidence that Hayes' report of the contents of the newspaper report was false, and I am not prepared to find such. However, even if actually false, her alleged comments about Respondent and the Charging Party would nevertheless remain protected concerted activity. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 234 NLRB 1126, 1131 (1978). Finally, whether or not Hayes actually engaged in the alleged conduct is an irrelevant consideration; rather, the only pertinent inquiry concerns whether Respondent believed that she did. Riverfront Restaurant, 235 NLRB 319, 320 (1978). In this regard, Sullivan's accusation that four unidentified employees said Hayes had been repeating her comments concerning the article and the contents of the suspension letter establish that Respondent did, in fact, believe Hayes had so acted. Inasmuch as this is an admitted reason for the discharge, I find the discharge to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

With regard to whether Hayes' discharge for violating rule 11 alone constitutes a violation of the Act, I must initially determine whether said rule is itself per se violative of the Act. This rule proscribes the making of false, vicious, or malicious statements regarding, among others, Respondent or its business operations. In American Cast Iron Pipe Co., supra, the Board had occasion to consider the validity of virtually identical employer rules. Therein, two rules, respectively prohibiting the making of "false, vicious or malicious verbal statements" and the distribution of "false, vicious or malicious written statements," were posted on the employee bulletin board. Noting that merely false utterances and writings constitute protected concerted activity, within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, so long as they are not malicious, the Board concluded that each rule was per se violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as it prohibited and punished the merely false as opposed to the vicious and malicious. Id. at 1131. I perceive no material difference between the two employee rules therein and rule 11 herein. As the latter draws a clear distinction, by use of the disjunctive, between false and vicious and malicious statements, I find it to be per se violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[54] In analogous situations, such as when employees are terminated for violating an invalid no-solicitation or no-distribution rule, the Board finds such discharges to be violative of the Act. Newport News Shipbuilding Co., 233 NLRB 1433, 1451 (1977); Keystone Resources, 230 NLRB 247 (1977). Inasmuch as Hayes was terminated for violating, among others, rule 11, I find such to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[55]

[54] Counsel for Respondent seeks to distinguish between the instant case and the facts of American Cast Iron Pipe Co.; however, although they may be factually distinguishable, the rules were found to be per se unlawful. Accordingly, factual differences are irrelevant to consideration of the facial validity of the rules.

[55] Respondent contends that Lena Grimes and Kay Sullivan considered Hayes' comments to be false, vicious, and malicious—quoting from the suspension letter. In this regard, counsel asserts that use of the conjunctive makes the rationale lawful as the Board considers false and malicious communications to be outside the protection of Sec. 7 of the Act. However, while it is true that the suspension letter reads as stated above, it is also true that reference was made to employee rule 11 and that the above words were obviously meant to track the rule's prohibition. In these circumstances, I believe the governing language is that of rule 11 itself and not what is set forth in the suspension letter. Accordingly, I reject the argument of Respondent's counsel.

5. The refusal to arbitrate

The consoldiated complaint alleges that by refusing to arbitrate the grievances which were filed by the extra banquet waitresses, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Respondent offers several defenses to this allegation: that no valid contract exists between the parties; that inasmuch as the question of the certification of the results of the decertification was pending before the Board at the time, there was no duty to arbitrate; and that the extra banquet employees are not employees of Respondent and, therefore, Respondent was under no duty to process their grievances.

There exists no factual dispute herein that the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Charging Party is effective from June 16, 1978, until June 16, 1983; that the contract contains a grievance and arbitration provision and, at least, two paragraphs which refer to individuals known as extra banquet personnel; that Respondent utilizes extra banquet waiters and waitresses to augment its staff at banquet functions in the hotel; that between November 12, 1981, and May 24, 1982, six extra banquet waitresses filed individual grievances against Respondent; that Respondent processed these up to, but not including, arbitration; that the Charging Party's attorney sent letters to Respondent's counsel, requesting that the latter comply with the grievance and arbitration procedure by joining in striking arbitration panels and stating that failure to respond would be taken as a refusal to arbitrate; and that Respondent failed to respond. In agreement with counsel for the General Counsel and the Charging Party's attorney, I believe that Respondent's conduct indicates a refusal to arbitrate these grievances. Further, the Board has held that an employer acts in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to comply with a contractual arbitration clause and by refusing to arbitrate grievances. Paramount Potato Chip Co., 252 NLRB 794, 797 (1980); Independent Stave Co., 248 NLRB 219, 227–228 (1980).

With regard to the defenses raised by Respondent, although not well articulated, its initial defense, that no current collective-bargaining agreement exists, appears to be based on the Board's contract-bar rule that "an existing collective bargaining agreement not exceeding three years will bar a petition for redetermination of representation in most instances." NLRB v. Circle A & W Products Co., 647 F.2d 924, 926 (9th Cir. 1981); Vanity Fair Mills, 256 NLRB 1104, 1105 (1981). However, nothing in the rule invalidates collective-bargaining agreements whose terms are for periods longer than 3 years in duration, and the Board has, in fact, found violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when employers make unilateral changes in the terms of such contracts. Keystone Consolidated Industries, 237 NLRB 763 (1978). Further, the fact that midterm bargaining occurs does not invalidate the provisions of an entire collective-bargaining agreement for the remainder of its term. Thus, if impasse results in said negotiations, the contract provisions remain in effect, and an employer is not free to make unilateral changes. Keystone Consolidated Industries, supra at 767.

Next, Respondent argues that the filing of the decertification petition in June 1981 and the fact that the matter of the certification of the results of the September 1981 decertification election was pending before the Board at the time of the refusal to process the six grievances through to arbitration relieve Respondent from its obligation to bargain, including the arbitration of grievances, with the Charging Party as the latter may no longer be the majority representative of its employees. Thus, in Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972), the Board ruled that whenever a decertification election petition was filed, such permitted an employer to no longer bargain with the incumbent union until the matter was settled by the Board. While the Board overruled that decision in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), it declined to make its ruling retroactive to pending cases. Id. at 1089. Houston Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 265 NLRB 766. However, notwithstanding the aforementioned general proposition of law, the Board, in Telautograph, supra, specifically held that "the incumbent union may still continue to administer its contract and process grievances." Thus, it appears, and I find, that, despite the pendency of the unresolved decertification petition proceedings, the Charging Party retained its right to administer the parties' existing collective-bargaining agreement, including enforcement of the arbitration provision, and Respondent remained obligated to honor said agreement.[56] Finally, as to Respondent's argument that the extra banquet waitresses are not its employees and, thus, may not file grievances against it, I agree with the Charging Party's attorney that said issue involves one of the proper interpretations of the contract and is best resolved before an arbitrator. In sum, I find no merit to Respondent's defenses and conclude that by failing to process the grievances herein to arbitration, it engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having concluded that Respondent has violated the Act by its acts and conduct described above, it is recommended that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

With regard to the respective communication to employee reprimands given to Beatrice Edwards about September 25, 1981, and James Grimes about September 15, 1981, having concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by such conduct, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to expunge these notices from the respective personnel files of Edwards and Grimes. Having concluded that rule 11 of Respondent's "Standards and Conduct" is per se violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from maintaining and enforcing the rule. Having concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing to process through arbitration the grievances which were filed by Maurine Donnelly, Marguerite C. Stimac, Clara Waller, Tony Poke, Evelyn Anderson, and Rachael Dominquez, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to bargain in good faith with the Charging Party by complying with the terms of the arbitration provisions of the existing collective-bargaining agreement. Having concluded that Respondent terminated Edna Hayes in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer her reinstatement to her former position or to a substantially equivalent position if such no longer exists, without any prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed; to make her whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of her discriminatory discharge on June 8, 1982, with backpay to be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as described in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and to expunge all references to her suspension and discharge from her personnel file.

Finally, I have concluded that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by conducting its interview with James Grimes without granting him his rights as set forth in NLRB v. Weingarten, supra. Counsel for the General Counsel contends that the remedy for such, in addition to the standard cease-and-desist language, should include a reinstatement and make-whole provision. In Kraft Foods, 251 NLRB 598 (1980), the Board established such a remedy for Weingarten violations. Therein, the Board stated that the General Counsel makes a prima facie showing that this is warranted by proving that the respondent conducted an interview in violation of Weingarten, supra, and that the employee was disciplined for conduct which was the subject of the unlawful interview. In order to negate this prima facie showing and establish that a cease-and-desist order is a sufficient remedy, the respondent must "demonstrate that its decision to discipline the employee in question was not based on information obtained at the unlawful interview." Applying the Kraft Foods analysis to the instant case, the General Counsel has established that an unlawful interview occurred, that the subject matter of this interview was the William French incident on October 4, 1981, and that the decision to suspend and, ultimately, terminate James Grimes was based, in large part, on the incident. Moreover, the record establishes, based on the admissions of Respondent's witnesses, that during his interview Grimes corroborated French's version of what occurred but denied his intent was to coerce French. While the foregoing establishes that the General Counsel made a prima facie showing that a reinstatement and make-whole remedy could be appropriate herein, I do not believe such is warranted. Thus, "the mere fact that [56] I note that in Houston Coca-Cola, supra, the respondent argued that while a decertification petition was pending, an employer is free to make unilateral changes in working conditions. The Board sought to distinguish unilateral changes affecting a union's dealings with employees, whom the union represents, from those relating to wages and benefits and concluded that the former would be unlawful while a decertification petition remained pending, as the union remains the employees' bargaining representative. Id. at 766 fn.2.

The Board's holding is not particularly clear, and it may well be argued that failures to adhere to arbitration procedures fall within the former rather than the latter type of unilateral change. Hence, while not free from doubt, I do not believe Houston Coca-Cola, supra, is adverse to my decision herein.

discipline is imposed for misconduct which was the subject of a Weingarten violative interview does not irrefutably establish the required causal link between the interview and the discipline." Houston Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 265 NLRB 766. Herein, Respondent was aware of what occurred during the October 4 incident from the statement of French; Grimes, other than corroborating the facts and denying a bad intent, added nothing to Respondent's knowledge. In Houston Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra, the respondent had previously learned that the employee involved had been in a restricted area of a plant without permission, and, during his unlawful interview, the employee merely corroborated the facts but denied knowledge that the area was restricted. Concluding that "no additional damaging information was obtained" from the employee's corroboration or admission, the Board refused to issue a Kraft Foods remedy and, instead, issued only a cease-and-desist order as "the unlawful interview produced no information other than that which [the respondent] already possessed" Id. Likewise, Respondent learned nothing it did not already know from its unlawful interview of Grimes on October 6. Therefore, the appropriate and proper remedy is the standard cease-and-desist order, which I shall recommend.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All employees employed by Respondent at its hotel; excluding executives, superintendents, department heads having the authority to hire and fire, supervisory employees having the authority to hire and fire and having an executive status, supervisory employees having an executive status with the right to effectively recommend hiring and firing, accounting or control employees, timekeepers, security officers, office employees, sales personnel, desk and mail clerks, checkers, cashiers, typists, stenographers, secretaries, supervisory stewards, storeroom and wineroom personnel, and all extra employees who have not worked at least an average of two functions (6 hours) per week for the period January 1, 1981, to July 24, 1981, constitute an appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. The Charging Party, at all times material herein, has been, and is now, the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing to abide by the provisions of its existing collective-bargaining agreement with the Charging Party and process through arbitration the grievances of Maurine Donnelly, Marguerite C. Stimac, Clara Waller, Tony Poke, Evelyn Anderson, and Rachael Dominguez, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. By issuing communication-to-employee reprimand notices respectively to Beatrice Edwards on September 25, 1981, and to James Grimes on September 15, 1981, because of their activities on behalf of the Charging Party, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. By suspending and, ultimately, terminating employee Edna Hayes on June 8, 1982, because of her activities in support of the Charging Party, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

8. By maintaining and enforcing rule 11 of its "Standards and Conduct," Respondent interfered with, coerced, and restrained employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. By threatening employee Thelma Glover with discipline because she engaged in protected concerted activities as union steward, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

10. By denying the request of James Grimes to have a union representative at an interview, which he reasonably believed might result in discipline, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

11. Respondent committed no unfair labor practices not specifically set forth above.

12. The unfair labor practices specifically found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[57]

ORDER

The Respondent, Radisson Muehlebach Hotel, Kansas City, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Charging Party, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All employees employed by Respondent at its hotel; excluding executives, superintendents, department heads having the authority to hire and fire, supervisory employees having the authority to hire and fire and having an executive status, supervisory employees having an executive status with the right to effectively recommend hiring and firing, accounting or control employees, timekeepers, security officers, office employees, sales personnel, desk and mail clerks, checkers, cashiers, typists, stenographers, secretaries, supervisory stewards, storeroom and wineroom personnel, and all extra employees who have not worked at least an average of two functions (6 hours) per week for the period January 1, 1981, to July 24, 1981.

(b) Issuing communication to employee reprimands to employees because of their activities in support of the Charging Party.

[57] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Suspending and, ultimately terminating employees because of their activities in support of the Charging Party.

(d) Maintaining and enforcing Standards and Conduct Rule 11, relating to the making of false, vicious, or malicious statements against Respondent.

(e) Threatening employees with discipline because they engage in protected concerted activities within their duties as union stewards.

(f) Refusing to permit employees to have union representatives present at interviews, which they reasonably believe might result in discipline against them.

(g) In any like or related matter interfering with, coercing, or restraining employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Offer to Edna Hayes immediate and full reinstatement to her former position or, if such no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of earnings as a result of Respondent's discrimination against her in the manner set forth in the "Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Expunge from its records and files any and all references to the unlawful suspension and discharge of employee Edna Hayes and notify the employee, in writing, that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against her.

(d) Expunge from its records and files any and all references to the communication to employee notices, and the notices themselves, issued respectively to employee James Grimes on September 15, 1981, and to employee Beatrice Edwards on September 25, 1981.

(e) Abide by the arbitration provisions of its current collective-bargaining agreement with the Charging Party and process through arbitration, on request, the grievances of employees Maurine Donnelly, Marguerite C. Stimac, Clara Waller, Tony Poke, Evelyn Anderson, and Rachael Dominquez.

(f) Post at its Kansas City, Missouri facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[58] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 17, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, insofar as the consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by suspending and terminating James Grimes, it be dismissed.

[58] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election held 23 March 1984 and the Acting Regional Director's report and addendum recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 119 for and 112 against the Union, with no challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the Employer's exceptions and brief and adopts the Acting Regional Director's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Direction of Second Election.

Both the Petitioner and the Employer filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. Following an investigation, the Acting Regional Director concluded, without a hearing, that all objections lacked merit and did not warrant setting aside the election. The Acting Regional Director recommended that all objections be overruled and a certification of representative issue.

Contrary to the Acting Regional Director, we sustain the Petitioner's Objection 1 and the Employer's Objection 1 which concern the Region's use of a multilanguage Board election ballot.[1] On examination, we find, for the reasons set forth below, that the multilanguage ballot furnished by the Region is so seriously defective on its face as to interfere with the employees' ability to exercise their election choice.[2]

We first observe that the instructions and the proposition on the ballot appear in four languages. The Spanish and English translations are set forth in what appears to be preprinted type with letters smaller than the handwritten characters of the Vietnamese and Laotian translations. Thus, at times the Spanish and English translations seem lost or overshadowed by the other two translations. The translations are generally line by line which tends to create artificial phrasing in several of the languages. In our view the layout of the ballot makes for difficult reading even for the English-reading voters.

We also note the critical flaws encountered with the Vietnamese and Laotian interpretations, as pointed out by the Employer. The Acting Regional Director in his report conceded these translation inaccuracies but downplayed the high potential for voter confusion created if the proposition on the ballot makes no sense in two of the languages. The Acting Regional Director found a cure for the ballot's defects. He was persuaded that the partisan preelection campaigning, the collective-bargaining agreements, and the dues-checkoff authorization cards—all in English—somehow justified the poorly translated Board ballot. We disagree. We attach no weight to the fact that non-English reading employees may be forced to deal with only English translations in the workplace. Rather, it is the Board's responsibility when a multilanguage ballot is deemed appropriate to supply a ballot that can be comprehended in all the languages appearing on the ballot. See General Shoe Corp., 77 NLRB 124 (1948), and Fibre Leather Mfg. Corp., 167 NLRB 393 (1967).

We also disagree with the Acting Regional Director's conclusion that the eligible voters were presented with sufficient information prior to the election to enable them to intelligently cast their ballots. The requisite laboratory conditions for free expression of voter preference were not present here. Rattan Art Gallery, Ltd., 260 NLRB 255 (1982). Board notices of election and the parties' instructional election campaigning have been found insufficient to cure defective Board ballots. Thermalloy Corp., 233 NLRB 428 (1977), and Marriot In-Flite Services v. NLRB, 417 F.2d 563 (5th Cir. 1969), denying enf. 171 NLRB 742 (1968).

Because we find the ballot itself to be seriously inadequate, we need not address the Acting Regional Director's findings that the translation issues involved only a small percentage of the voters constituting an insufficient number to affect the results of the election. However, we point out that, contrary to the Acting Regional Director's findings, there is no indication from the evidence before us as to the number of Hispanic, Vietnamese, and Laotian employees who are unable to read English. The Acting Regional Director incorrectly assumed that the number of employees was three since the Employer supplied specific evidence concerning three employees who claimed confusion by the ballot. Rather, the appearance of the ballot has a tendency to confuse even the English-reading voters, which comprise the majority of the unit. In these circumstances, where the ballot is facially defective, we view evidence of actual voter confusion which would alter the election count as irrelevant. Nor is it controlling that some voters may have understood the ballot as relied on by the Acting Regional Director.

[1] In view of our disposition of this case, we do not find it necessary to address the Petitioner's and the Employer's remaining objections. The Petitioner's Objection 2 dealt with statements appearing in a local newspaper article allegedly attributable to the Union. The Petitioner's Objection 3 involved alleged union promises made to certain maintenance department unit employees. The Employer's Objection 2 was withdrawn. The Employer's Objection 3 alleged impermissible electioneering by the Union in the vicinity of the polling area. The Employer's Objection 4 concerned alleged threats made by a prounion employee sympathizer.

[2] A copy of the ballot is attached [omitted from publication].

Accordingly, we reverse the Acting Regional Director's recommendation to overrule the Petitioner's Objection 1 and the Employer's Objection 1, sustain these objections, and set aside the election. We conclude in these circumstances it will effectuate the policies of the Act to direct another election.

[Direction of Second Election omitted from publication.]

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not set aside the election. I do not believe that the translation of each line of the ballot into three non-English lanaguges precluded employees from reading the English portion. I therefore would not find that the ballot's organization was so confusing as to interfere with employees' opportunity to make informed decisions. That the Region might have organized the ballot better is not the issue. Rather, the issue is whether employees voted under conditions that permitted them to cast votes intelligently.

Further, I agree with the Acting Regional Director's determination that, under the circumstances, mistranslation of the ballot's propositions does not warrant setting aside the election. The translations in question were for only 3 out of a 238-person unit.[1] It is clear from two employees' statements that they understood (from the election campaign and reading the ballot's English as well as the foreign language) what they were voting about; the third employee admitted not even reading the propositions. Moreover, even assuming the three employees were confused by the ballot and voted contrary to their intentions, their votes could not have affected the election results.

In sum, I believe the facts show that the employees had sufficient information to vote intelligently, and the ballot did not taint the election results.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 24 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Earldean V.S. Robbins issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, So-Cal Products, Inc. d/b/a Eagle Headers, Canoga Park, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

No party excepted to the judge's 8(a)(1) findings.

Member Hunter, in the absence of exceptions, adopts pro forma the judge's findings of 8(a)(1) violations.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V.S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard before me in Los Angeles, California, on October 25 and 26, 1983. The charge was filed by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers of America, Local 509 (the Union), and served on So-Cal Products, Inc. d/b/a Eagle Headers (Respondent), on May 9, 1983. The complaint, which issued June 23, 1983, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The basic issues herein are whether Respondent discharged employees Rafael Gutierrez and Salvador Guzman because of their union or other protected concerted activities and whether Respondent engaged in certain other conduct which constituted independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On the entire record,[1] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, Respondent, a California corporation with an office and principal place of business located in Canoga Park, California, has been engaged in the manufacture of automobile parts. Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, annually purchases and receives goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 from sellers or suppliers located within the State of California, which sellers or suppliers receive such goods in substantially the same form directly from outside the State of California.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the parties stipulate, and I find that the Union is now, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

1. The business justifications for the layoffs

Respondent manufactures accessories and exhaust products for automobiles. Its business is a seasonal one with March through May being the peak sales season and August through September the slowest sales season. The production seasons parallel the sales season except that the production cycles usually commence 30 to 60 days prior to the sales cycles. Its employee complement fluctuates generally in direct relation to the production cycle, expanding by as much as 30 percent during the peak season. As the peak production season ends, Respondent normally begins a series of layoffs to reduce the complement as required by the demands of the slower production season. However, Respondent normally endeavors to confine this reduction in employee complement to less skilled employees and to maintain a permanent complement of the higher producing, more skilled employees.

Prior to 1980, Respondent was owned by Steven Goldstein, vice president of operations, and his father, Charles Goldstein. In 1980, due to strong competition and a rapidly escalating interest rate, Respondent began experiencing severe financial difficulty so that it switched from a profit of $150,000 in 1979 to a loss of $85,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980. This downturn continued throughout 1981 and into 1982. In an effort to achieve sounder financial footing, Steven

[1] Respondent's unopposed motion to correct the transcript is granted.

Goldstein (Goldstein), and his father sold 25 percent of the business to Herbert Goldstein in February 1982. In June 1982, having failed to achieve financial stability, an additional 25 percent of the business was sold to Herbert Goldstein. Steven Goldstein remained as vice president of operations until August 1983 when he and his father sold the remainder of their interest in Respondent to Herbert Goldstein.

Herbert Goldstein immediately expressed the desire to cut overhead expenses as much as possible and increase efficiency. In July and August, he demanded that Goldstein cut the payroll by 25 or 30 employees, but Goldstein argued successfully that these layoffs could not be effected all at once without adverse effect on Respondent. However, he began a series of layoffs on August 13. Eight employees were laid off in August, 10 in November, and 10 in December. In January, Respondent had 100 to 115 employees, about 95 percent of whom were Spanish-speaking. Guzman and another employee were laid off on January 14 and Gutierrez was laid off on January 21. The General Counsel concedes, and I find, that Respondent had legitimate business justification to effect layoffs extending into January.

2. The layoff of Guzman and Gutierrez

Guzman was employed by Respondent on January 29, 1976. He worked primarily as a parts mover for the welders. However, he was classified as a fabrication employee,[2] and did other jobs. At the time of his layoff, he was the only employee who worked primarily as a parts mover. Gutierrez, who worked on a production line as a collector-welder,[3] was hired by Respondent in August 1976. At the time of his layoff, there were two collector-welders in Respondent's employ. A third collector-welder, with greater seniority than Gutierrez, had been laid off on December 31, 1982. The General Counsel contends that Guzman and Gutierrez were selected for layoff because they engaged in union activities.

In mid-November 1982, certain of Respondent's employees began discussing the desirability of union representation. At some point they selected Guzman to contact the Union, which he did on January 2 or 3, 1983.[4] The union representatives gave Guzman union authorization cards which he distributed to some fellow employees who lived near him with the instructions to mail them to the Union after they were signed. On January 8, union representatives met with 15 to 20 of Respondent's employees at a park in Santa Monica. Both Guzman and Gutierrez were present. During the following week another union meeting was held. About 20 to 30 employees attended. Some of the employees signed union authorization cards at these meetings. Both Goldstein and Ollie Adkins, Respondent's plant manager and general foreman, testified that they had no knowledge of any union activity prior to Respondent receiving notice of the filing of the representation petition on January 24 or 25.[5]

On January 14, at the end of Guzman's shift, Adkins told Guzman he had to lay him off because Respondent wanted to save money. On January 20, Adkins called Guiterrez to his office and started to speak to him in English.[6] Gutierrez said he did not understand, so lead-person Vicente Jimenez was called in to interpret. According to Gutierrez, Jimenez said, "Ollie [Adkins] says that he does not like your attitude, and he doesn't like you at all." Gutierrez replied, "I am not here to be liked by anybody. I come to just do my work and do it right. I see that there are two checks on the table, and there is nothing to be said." Gutierrez then asked about unemployment papers Adkins said, "You are not going to need them, because you are dead."

Adkins testified that he told Gutierrez that they had to cut the work force, that Goldstein had insisted he had to let Gutierrez go, and the reason Adkins had chosen Gutierrez was his poor work record, his poor production. Gutierrez asked something about whether Adkins could give him a second chance. Adkins said, no, the decision was not his. Adkins denies saying, "I don't like your attitude" or "I don't like you at all." He also denies that Guiterrez said, "I don't work here to be liked by anybody. I come just to do my work and do it right." Adkins testified that Gutierrez did ask about papers to get his unemployment and he did tell Guiterrez that he did not need papers. However, he denies saying, "You're dead."[7]

I credit Adkins and Jimenez as to this conversation. Their testimony is mutually corroborative. Further, even assuming, arguendo, that Adkins had knowledge of the union activities, I note that there was no expression of hostility toward Guzman when he was laid off. Yet insofar as the record reveals, it was Guzman who was an initiator of union activities and there is no evidence that Gutierrez engaged in any union activity any different in kind from that of a number of other employees. In this regard, I have fully considered, and reject, the General Counsel's contention that the sign in Spanish at Gutierrez' work station, "Let's support Brujo [the warlock]," conveyed his involvement in union activities. The record does not support such a conclusion.

Employee Tommy Torres testified that some time in January, prior to Guzman's layoff, Adkins asked him if he knew that Leonard Hicks, Salvador, and Delgadillo were involved in the Union. Torres said he did not know anything. Adkins said, okay, and walked away.[8]

Wayne Dodds, a maintenance mechanic in Respondent's employ, testified that in late January or early February he went into Adkins' office to obtain his job as-

[2] This is a catch-all classification covering various jobs.

[3] A welder who welds the exhaust pipes of an automobile header into a large pipe which is a collector for all of the smog pipes.

[4] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates hereinafter will be in 1983.

[5] On January 20, the Union filed a petition with the Board seeking to represent Respondent's employees. According to Goldstein, Respondent received the notice of the filing of the petition on January 24 or 25.

[6] Goldstein and Ollie Adkins, then Respondent's plant manager and general foreman, do not speak Spanish. However, several of the lead persons are bilingual.

signments. At that time, Adkins mentioned that there was a union meeting the previous evening. Dodds said, "That is nice." Adkins asked if Dodds would see if he could find out anything about it, find out who the people were who were involved. Dodds said, sure, I'll see what I can find out. According to Dodds, Adkins further stated that he knew the address where the union meeting was held. Dodds also testified that on February 14 he went into Adkins' office. Leo Trane, a maintenance employee, was there. Dodds asked Adkins if he had heard anything about the Union lately. Adkins said, no, he had not. Trane said, "I would fire them all." Adkins said, "Well, we got rid of two of them." Dodds asked if one of them was Huedo, a supervisor in welding. Adkins said, no, it was not, it was Rafael and Salvador. Dodds is not sure whether his first conversation with Adkins occurred before or after Guzman and Gutierrez were laid off.[9]

Juan Vasquez, a leadman, testified that in the second or third week of February he and Adkins were talking about work when he asked Adkins what was going on in the plant. Adkins said, "I don't know, but I think some of your co-workers, they will try to bring the union in. Early or later, I will know who they are and then I will know what I have to do."[10]

Adkins denies the alleged conversations with Dodds, Torres, and Vasquez. He also testified that, at the time he laid off Guzman and Gutierrez, he had no knowledge of their sentiments regarding the Union nor did he have any knowledge of any union activity prior to the receipt of the notification of the filing of the representation petition. According to him, Goldstein told him a petition had been filed and that they were not to question employees regarding their union activities or support, that they were to stay out of it. Goldstein said he had been through it before and that Adkins was not to discuss the Union with anyone.

Goldstein testified that Respondent has no written layoff policy, that he established the layoff policy and administered it as he developed and framed it. According to him, he used a combination of factors in selecting persons to be laid off—efficiency, performance, and seniority to some degree where it could be applied. In the normal layoff situation, his selection follows the production flow. However, he testified, in the layoffs which began in August he more or less had to cut the size of the work force and yet try to maintain the most efficient crew possible. Thus, the principal determinant was the employee's ability. Selections were made so as to achieve a basic plantwide reduction. To the extent that seniority was considered in classifications such as welders or benders, department seniority was used. In other areas, depending on the flexibility of the employee, plantwide seniority was considered to some extent.

Goldstein also testified that the principal factors he considered were efficiency and rate of pay. All things being equal, he tried to keep a senior person but could not do that in cases where there was a great disparity of either production or payroll. Being marginally profitable, Respondent just could not afford to carry someone whose daily output was definitely less than other people working at the same job.[11] For example, Adelaido Robles, who had worked since 1975 as a collector-welder and an assembler-welder, was laid off in December without regard to seniority because his work had started to slip.

According to Goldstein, he initially tried to lay off the last people hired, in May, June, and July at the tail end of the production season. He did not consult Adkins in this regard. He merely told him who was being laid off. Then, as the cuts got deeper, the analysis of the individual employee became a bit more critical because he was trying to compare very closely who was the most efficient employee since, with the smaller crew, Respondent could not afford anything other than maximum output per person. At this point, he did discuss the selections with Adkins. According to him, basically he just presented to Adkins the names of the persons that he felt should be laid off and asked if he had any overriding reason why any of them should not be let go. He did consult Adkins as to Gutierrez, stating that his analysis was that Gutierrez was welding fewer parts per day than the other collector-welders and asked if Adkins disagreed. Adkins said, no, that he had spoken to Gutierrez regarding his production and then proceeded to relate two conversations he had with Gutierrez relative to increasing his production.

Goldstein admits that he did not consult Adkins as to Guzman since he was eliminating that particular job. One of the considerations in eliminating the parts movers classification was a desire to keep the more skilled employees. One way of keeping the welders busy was to let them take up an hour of their time doing their own parts moving, and to have another employee, Enrique Guzman, who had previously assisted Salvador Guzman in parts moving work as a parts mover for about 4 hours a day.

Adkins corroborates that it was Goldstein's decision as to who would be laid off, but testified that he regularly made suggestions. According to him, usually if it was a nonproduction type job, the layoff was strictly by seniority, but if it was something where performance was involved, then they pulled the work records and went according to performance. According to him, a parts mover is not a production job.[12] Adkins testified that he seldom made suggestions as to whom was let go, rather he would try to make a choice as to who to keep; but if it had been determined that a certain number of persons were to be laid off, then that number was laid off. He could not influence that basic decision. In the gray zone, [9] Dodds is chairman of the in-plant union committee and has been since May.

[10] Vasquez was a member of the Union's negotiating grievance committee from sometime in May until 2 or 3 weeks prior to the hearing. Torres has also been a member of that committee since its inception sometime in May.

[11] Goldstein testified that he is aware of the production of all employees because he collected the job tickets daily and has read them for 11 years on a daily basis. The job tickets do not directly indicate the quality of work. However, it has been his practice to make spot checks as to quality.

[12] Adkins testified that at Respondent a production job was one on which you kept records as to actual output. They kept no records on how many parts the parts mover moved.

where one employee may have merits over another employee, he could sometimes influence those decisions. Occasionally his recommendation was accepted but in many cases it was not.

Adkins testified that at the time Gutierrez was laid off there were three collector-welders, Benjamin Vasquez, Raymond Cisneros, and Gutierrez. Vasquez was the best of the three and Gutierrez was the worst as to production. Adkins also testified that he talked to Gutierrez twice regarding his production, the last time was about 2 weeks prior to his layoff and the other occasion was probably 2 months.

Goldstein testified that there has never been any automatic right of recall in Respondent's history, but they have rehired employees from time to time based on their past performance. It was his decision as to whether a laid-off employee would be rehired. Goldstein also testified that he hired former employee Mario Munoz to do collector-welding a couple of months after Gutierrez' layoff. Munoz was only hired for the heavy season, 2-1/2 to 3 months. After that, he was laid off. Goldstein further testified that when the need for collector-work picked up, he tried a couple of times to reach Gutierrez but was unsuccessful. So when Munoz came in, he simply rehired him since he was a good, experienced worker. He also hired him at a lower wage rate than Gutierrez had been earning. Adkins testified that Munoz did not work full time as a collector-welder but did a number of other jobs also.

Another welder was hired between January 21 and August 18, during the peak season. However, he did no collector-welding and was laid off shortly after his hire date as the season ended.

When asked why he decided to let a welder go on January 21, just before the beginning of the peak season, Goldstein testified that he had three people to do the work of two and Gutierrez was the slowest one. According to him, he had no indication that very shortly he would need an additional collector-welder inasmuch as they were not meeting the sales projections forecast for the year;[13] so there was no point in continuing to stockpile headers inasmuch as they are the easiest things Respondent makes and are the easiest to stockpile.

There were no layoffs after January. February basically begins the selling season, so towards the end of February Respondent started to build production back up in anticipation of the 3- or 4-month peak season[14]

The General Counsel contends that if Goldstein had really wanted to contact Gutierrez when he needed to hire another collector-welder, he could have contacted him through his brother who was also in Respondent's employ. Goldstein testified that he does not recall that he was aware at that time that Gutierrez had a brother in Respondent's employ.

When Gutierrez was questioned as to whether, in the 2-month period before he was laid off, Adkins talked to him about his production, he testified that Adkins called in the welders in groups of three and told them if they did not increase production, what happened to Adelaido Robles was going to happen to them. He denies that Adkins ever had a private conversation with him regarding his production; and testified that at the time Adkins spoke to him, two port welders were present. Although Gutierrez testified as to the amount of his daily production, he did not dispute the testimony that he was the least productive of the three collector-welders. Since job tickets are retained for only about 6 weeks, no documentation of the relative production of these employees was available. Goldstein testified that, primarily for costing purposes, he maintained a production record on a spot-check basis whereby he would chart a different group of operations. Those records are also no longer in existence.

B. Conclusion

1. The alleged unlawful statements

I credit Dodds as to his conversations with Adkins. I found him to be an honest, reliable witness who was endeavoring to tell the truth. In this regard, I note that despite the questioning designed to determine if he could be more precise as to timing, and despite the obvious advantage to the General Counsel's case if he had firmly placed the first conversation with Adkins prior to the layoffs, he refrained from doing so. This is not consistent with a fabrication of testimony designed to support the position of the General Counsel and the Charging Party. I also credit Vasquez as to the statement made to him by Adkins. This occurred around the time of the Dodds-Trane-Adkins conversation—a time when Adkins did not seem adverse to expressing opinions to employees regarding union activities if they brought up the subject. Contrary to Respondent's urgings, I do not find that, during the course of a preelection campaign, an assumption by Adkins that Vasquez' question as to what was going on in the plant referred to the campaign was so unreasonable as to require a conclusion that Vasquez' testimony regarding his response lacked credence.

However, I do not credit Torres that prior to the layoffs, Adkins asked him if he knew that Leonard Hicks, Salvador, and Delgadillo[15] were involved in the Union. I find unreliable Torres' testimony as to the timing of this alleged conversation. Thus, he testified that he learned of the union activity from Dodds. Yet Dodds testified that he learned of the union activity through a conversation with Adkins. Dodds first testified that the conversation was in February. Then he testified that it was in late January or early February. In view of this testimony, I find it unlikely that the conversation occurred prior to January 14. I also note that Torres first [13] According to Goldstein, these projections were based on the expection that Herbert Goldstein, one of the top salesmen in the industry, would obtain substantial increases in sales. However, he was hit in the eye with a tennis ball sometime in late October or early November, an accident which detached his retina and required several surgeries between then and the end of December.

[14] January and February are considered relatively slow months; March, April, and May are considered the best months; and June and July are considered good months. August tends to be slower and there is a definite decline in October and September. November and December may be good months depending upon the weather and the condition of the economy. The best months are March through May. The worst months are August and September and maybe February.

[15] Hicks and Delgadillo are welders in Respondent's employ.

testified that the conversation occurred "in the beginning and middle of January." In clarification, he then testified that, at the time, Gutierrez and Guzman were still employed by Respondent, that the conversation occurred during the first half of January. Yet he could not recall whether the first union meeting he attended was before or after they were laid off. Further, I note that, according to Torres, Adkins asked if he knew that Leonard Hicks, Salvador, and Delgadillo were involved in the Union. Yet, according to Vasquez' testimony, in February, Adkins made a statement to him which indicated that he did not yet know who was trying to bring the Union into the plant.

In view of my credibility findings, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting Dodds to inform him regarding the union activities of other employees and by creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities when he told Dodds he knew the address where the union meeting was held. I also find that, in context, Trane's statement, that he would fire them all, could only be interpreted as referring to union supporters. Therefore, Adkins' response that Respondent had gotten rid of two of them—Rafael and Salvador—was coercive in that it conveyed the impression that they had been laid off because of their union activities. Accordingly, I find that by this statement Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

As to the statement made to Vasquez, contrary to Respondent's argument, I find that such a statement would reasonably be construed by an employee as constituting a threat of reprisals against union activists in Respondent's employ, and that Adkins intended to, and did, convey that impression. Accordingly, I find that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Contrary to Respondent's contention, it is immaterial that the union discussions were initiated by Vasquez and by Dodds on one occasion. Cardio Data System, 264 NLRB 37 (1982). I also reject Respondent's argument that these statements were isolated or de minimis and require no remedy, inasmuch as Respondent and the Union subsequently negotiated a collective-bargaining agreement. Holladay Park Hospital, 262 NLRB 278 (1982).

2. The layoffs

The General Counsel contends that Guzman and Gutierrez were selected for layoff because of their union activities. Respondent contends it had no knowledge of the union activity prior to receiving notification of the filing of the representation petition. Thus, the initial issue is whether the evidence is sufficient to establish that Respondent had knowledge of the union activity in general and of the activity of Guzman and Gutierrez in particular prior thereto. The testimony of Goldstein and Adkins denying knowledge is supported by the evidence that the activity took place away from Respondent's premises and was so selective and secretive that employees who had become leaders in the Union by May had no knowledge, at that time, of the union activities.

Hence, the critical question is whether Adkins' statement to Dodds and Trane establishes knowledge, and unlawful motivation as well. I find that the statement does not establish knowledge at the time of the layoffs. Adkins' statement is equally as susceptible to a conclusion that he was expressing delight that the Respondent had laid off two employees who were subsequently found to have been union activists as it is to be the conclusion that they had been laid off unlawfully. Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that, at the time of the layoffs, Respondent had knowledge of the union activities. Further, in this circumstance and in view of Respondent's legitimate reasons for a layoff, the General Counsel's failure to establish that Respondent had definitive policies or practices which it violated regarding the selection of employees to be laid off and the recall of laid-off employees; the absence of any evidence that Gutierrez engaged in any activities different in kind from that of a number of other employees; the prior layoff of senior employees; the limited nature of the unfair labor practices found herein; the fact that Goldstein, not Adkins, made the selections; the absence of unlawful conduct by Goldstein; and the absence of evidence to indicate that, but for Gutierrez' union activities, Adkins would have argued for his retention; I find that the General Counsel has failed to establish a prima facie case that the layoffs of Guzman and Gutierrez were unlawfully motivated. Accordingly, I find that these layoffs were not violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By soliciting employees to inform regarding the union activities of fellow employees, by telling employees that fellow employees had been laid off because of their union activities, by creating the impression that the union activities of employees were under surveillance by Respondent, and by threatening employees with reprisals because of their union activities, Respondent has committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The above-described unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by laying off Salvador Guzman and Rafael Gutierrez, nor has Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act except as found herein.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[16]

[16] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended

ORDER

The Respondent, So-Cal Products, Inc. d/b/a Eagle Headers, Canoga Park, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Soliciting employees to inform Respondent regarding the union activities of fellow employees.

(b) Telling employees that fellow employees were laid off because of their union activities.

(c) Creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities.

(d) Threatening employees with reprisals because they engaged in union activity.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility in Canoga Park, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges that the layoff of Salvador Guzman and Rafael Gutierrez was violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act and insofar as it alleges that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in any respect other than found herein.

Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[17] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
> To form, join, or assist any union
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

In recognition of these rights, we notify our employees that:

WE WILL NOT solicit employees to inform us regarding the union activities of fellow employees.

WE WILL NOT tell our employees that fellow employees were laid off because they had engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT create the impression of surveillance of the union activities of our employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with reprisals because they engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 18 March 1982 Administrative Law Judge Frank H. Itkin issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

Based on an essentially undisputed record, the judge found that the Respondent, a taxi service company, violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act by: (1) unilaterally announcing and implementing changes in the terms and conditions of the taxi drivers' employment; (2) dealing directly with the drivers rather than with their union representative; and (3) terminating the employment of those drivers who refused to abide by the unilateral changes in working conditions. Underlying these conclusions is the judge's determination that the taxi drivers are employees of the Respondent and not independent contractors as the Respondent argues. We disagree with the judge's resolution of the employee versus independent contractor issue and therefore reverse his findings of violations.

The National Labor Relations Act protects individuals who fall within the classification of "employee" and specifically excludes individuals who have the status of "independent contractor."[1] The judge reasoned that the determination as to whether an individual is appropriately classified as an employee or an independent contractor is based on general principles of agency law rather than on the application of any shorthand formula. As fully explicated in the attached decision the judge relied on the parties' long-established relationship (in which they apparently regarded themselves as employer-employee) as well as a number of company restrictions over the drivers' activities (as enumerated in the body of the collective-bargaining agreement and in an appended set of "Company's Working Rules") in concluding that the drivers are employees of the Respondent.[2] While we agree that certain of the characteristics on which the judge relied are suggestive of an employer-employee relationship, we find it significant that many of these factors are imposed not by the Respondent but by city and Federal regulations and insurance requirements. Moreover, we find that whatever factors may point toward an employer-employee relationship are overridden by the basic entrepreneurial nature of the drivers' arrangement with the Respondent which clearly establishes them as independent contractors.

In the recent decision in Air Transit,[3] the Board determined that taxicab drivers operating from Dulles Airport are independent contractors and not employees. Air Transit provided taxi service under a contract with the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA). The FAA imposed an extensive array of regulations on Air Transit which it, in turn, required the drivers to obey. The FAA contract required, for example, that taxi drivers accept all passenger assignments, that they obey all lawful directions from the dispatch, that certain vehicles be equipped with two-way radios, and that a particular fare schedule be followed. In exchange for a weekly stand fee to the company, drivers obtained the right to operate from its Dulles taxistand. Air Transit paid the drivers no wages; the drivers' income was determined solely by the receipts from the passengers they transported.

Adopting the reasoning of the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals in Seafarers Local 777 (Yellow Cab) v. NLRB,[4] the Board determined that two elements were significant in determining that no employer-employee relationship exists: first, the company's lack of control over the drivers' means and manner of operation after leaving the garage and, second, the absence of any correlation between the company's income and the amount of fares collected by its drivers. The Board agreed with the court's statement that "Government regulations constitute supervision not by the employer but by the state";[5] therefore, the greater the control exerted by the governmental entity, the less opportunity for control by the putative employer. In such a situation the company has very little to do with directing the manner and means by which the drivers conduct their normal daily business. Second, the arrangement between the drivers and the company entitled drivers to operate under the company's authority in exchange for payment of a fixed periodic fee. The company did not compensate the drivers for their efforts, but rather the drivers themselves determined their income by virtue of the number of fares they carried. Likewise, the company's revenues were unaffected by the drivers' efforts, but rather remained constant by virtue of the fixed fee arrangement. In a situation exhibiting both these elements—lack of control or actual supervision over the performance of the drivers' functions and lack of correlation between the drivers' efforts and the employees' profits—a finding of independent contractor status is warranted.

[1] Sec. 2(3) of the Labor Management Relations Act.

[2] Among the factors the judge found persuasive in his determination are: (1) the parties' collective-bargaining relationship dating back to 1966; (2) the parties' use of the terms "employer" and "employee" in referring to one another; (3) company restrictions over the right of owner-drivers to sell their vehicles; (4) restrictions over the right of owner-drivers to keep their vehicles out of service while retaining company identification; (5) widespread use by the drivers of the company dispatch service to obtain fares; (6) company requirements for appropriate driver attire; and (7) a variety of dischargeable offenses.

The facts of the instant case lend themselves to the same analysis. Most of the rules under which the drivers operate are dictated by either insurance or city requirements. Among the insurance-related rules are accident reporting procedures, restrictions on usage of alcohol or drugs while on duty, remaining within the authorized mileage radius, requesting passengers to ride in the back seat of the vehicle, and compliance with safe driving procedures. The city-imposed regulations address the operating condition of the vehicles, drivers' wearing apparel, procedures for obtaining weekly work authorization permits, overcharging of passengers, providing assistance to passengers, and prohibition of use of the vehicles for unauthorized purposes. Federal regulations govern drivers' use of two-way radios. The remaining rules of conduct which the company devised relate primarily to the orderly dispatching of jobs, i.e., trip stealing sanctions, obligations to service a fare once it is accepted, and banning the transfer of one driver's charge tickets to another driver. There is no requirement that drivers use the company-provided dispatch service, but rather they are free either to use it or to obtain fares on their own. The company pays drivers no wages, withholds no taxes, keeps no records regarding hours, and does not assign areas in which the drivers must operate. The drivers provide the Respondent with a monthly fee in exchange for the right to display the company emblem on their cabs and for permission to use the dispatch service. This is the only revenue the Respondent receives from the drivers, who are then free to carry as many or as few fares as they are able. In this way the drivers are responsible for generating their own income and the Respondent's profits are unaffected by the drivers' efforts. This type of arrangement is characteristic of an entrepreneutrial endeavor by the drivers rather than an employment relationship.[6] Accordingly we conclude that the drivers in this case are not employees but are independent contractors. Inasmuch as independent contractors are not covered by the Act, we reverse the judge's findings of violations against the Respondent and dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[6] We find that the parties' historic reference to themselves as "employer" and "employee" is not determinative of their relationship, but rather is merely reflective of common, albeit legally inappropriate, terminology.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FRANK H. ITKIN, Administrative Law Judge. An unfair labor practice charge was filed in this case by the Union on February 5, and a complaint was issued on February 26, 1982. A hearing was conducted in St. Louis, Missouri, on October 25, 1982. Briefly, the General Counsel contends that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by unilaterally implementing changes in terms and conditions of employment of its taxicab drivers, without first negotiating such changes with the Union, the exclusive bargaining agent of an appropriate unit of drivers; by dealing directly with unit drivers in the negotiation of certain changes in their terms and conditions of employment; and by, in effect, terminating the employment of unit drivers who refused to accept the changes in terms and conditions of employment thus demanded by Respondent. Respondent denies that it has violated the Act as alleged. The fundamental question presented here is whether the unit taxicab drivers are "employees," instead of "independent contractors," and thus covered by the protective provisions of the Act.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and, after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The evidence adduced in this case is essentially undisputed, and is contained in a 10-page typewritten stipulation, with exhibits A, B, C, and D annexed (Jt. Exh. 1); two letters of counsel (G.C. Exhs. 2 and 3); and the supplemental testimony of Allcorn Williams, Fleming Hearn, Charles Mueller, James Matthews, Robert Wolf, and James Cooper. The pertinent evidence is summarized below.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Status of the Taxicab Drivers

Respondent is engaged in the operation of a taxicab business in the St. Louis area. It is admittedly an "employer engaged in commerce" and meets the Board's jurisdictional standards. The Union is admittedly a labor organization under the Act. And, as stipulated, if the taxicab drivers in question are found to be employees instead of independent contractors, the following constitutes an appropriate bargaining unit:

> All owner and non-owner taxicab drivers employed by Respondent, excluding dispatchers, service station employees, guards, office clerical, professional and managerial employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

In fact, over 16 years ago, on November 30, 1966, the Union was certified by the Board as exclusive bargaining agent for "all drivers and owner-drivers operating under the franchise of" Checker Cab Company. Respondent is admittedly now the successor to Checker Cab Company. (See app. A to Jt. Exh. 1.)

The Union has represented the above taxicab drivers during the past years, and there have been agreements between Respondent and the Union on behalf of these drivers. Thus, during the summer of 1981, Respondent and the Union negotiated the current agreement between the parties, which by its terms runs from August 1, 1981, through May 31, 1983. (See app. B to Jt. Exh. 1.) Although the 1981–1983 agreement was not signed by the parties, the terms of the agreement, as stipulated, were implemented.

The 1981–1983 agreement contains the following language and provisions. In article I, the Company "recognizes the Union as the sole and exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment for all owner and non-owner taxicab drivers, but excluding office clericals, dispatchers, service station employees, guards, supervisors, professional and managerial personnel." The Company "agrees not to discriminate against any employees for legitimate Union activities," and

> During the term of this Agreement, the Company shall not negotiate or enter into agreements . . . with individual employees in the bargaining unit . . . and . . . shall not by any means, directly or indirectly, circumvent or impair the exclusive representative status of the Union which the Union has achieved in consequence of certification by the National Labor Relations Board.

Article II contains union-security provisions, thus requiring union membership as a condition of continued employment. Article III sets forth the rights of employees, stating, inter alia, that no employees shall be deprived of employment in the absence of good and sufficient cause; no employee or union steward shall be similarly deprived of his employment with the Company because of his membership in or activity on behalf of the Union; a non-owner driver prevented from operating a cab during his regular working hours by reason of mechanical breakdown for more than 2 hours on any one occasion shall receive a pro rata refund of his daily operating fee and any attempt to collect such a refund for other than a bona fide mechanical breakdown will subject the driver to immediate discharge; the Company shall pay $5 per day to each employee covered by this agreement who serves on jury duty; the Company will enforce all rules and regulations equally to all drivers and without discrimination; and

> An owner may remove his cab once a year for a period not to exceed 30 days to take a vacation without being required to paint his cab out provided the cab is parked on the Company lot while the owner is on vacation. The owner shall notify the Company at least 30 days prior to the date of intended removal.[1]

Article IV provides, inter alia, that "service seniority shall be Company wide," with an attached "list of drivers rated according to seniority," and

> When an owner desires to sell his equipment, notice shall be posted . . . . First priority for purchase of said equipment shall go to the non-owner driver with the greatest amount of seniority with the Company, provided the applicant can provide evidence of financial responsibility.

Article V provides that no employee shall be required to serve as a supervisor and no supervisor may drive cabs. Article VI pertains to referral of employees in order that the Company shall have a competent working force. Under this section, the Company shall consider for employment drivers referred to it by the Union. The Company, however, is not prevented from hiring any other drivers that are qualified. The Company has the right to accept or reject, to employ or not to employee, any applicant referred by the Union.

Article VII contains grievance and arbitration procedures, including the right of union visitation during working hours for the purpose of adjusting disputes and investigating working conditions. Article XI, in turn, provides that "during the life of this Agreement there shall be no strikes including sympathy strikes, cessation of work or lockout." Appendix D to Joint Exhibit 1 is a copy of a verified complaint by the Company against, inter alia, the Union, filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri during early 1982, alleging, inter alia:

> Plaintiff [Company] has informed Defendant Local 5 that it stands ready to arbitrate any and all matters pursuant to article VII . . . .

[1] As stipulated, all taxicabs operated pursuant to permits issued to Respondent are painted with the Company's colors, and display its name, telephone number, and identification number. The Company paints the taxicabs and bills the taxicab owners for this service. Radios, as discussed below, are owned by the Company.

> Despite the availability of the grievance procedure, the Defendants have violated the collective bargaining agreements by striking the Plaintiff and picketing its premises.

The Company sought, inter alia, injunctive relief against the Union and striking and picketing drivers under Section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act.[2]

Article VIII provides for working conditions, including sanitary toilet facilities for its employees, "adequate radio service, and uniform dispatching. The "Company's Working Rules" are attached to and made a part of the 1981–1983 agreement as appendix A. The Company expressly agreed:

> In the event that the Company changes any of the aforementioned rules or promulgates additional rules during the life of this Agreement, the Company shall notify in writing the Union office of its intention to do so at least five days before the effective date of changes or addition in order that the Union may have an opportunity to bargain with the Company.

Appendix A to the 1981–1983 agreement enumerates, inter alia, the following "working rules":

> All accidents must be reported immediately. Drivers must not leave the scene of accident and must wait for the Company supervisor.
> . . . .
> Any driver having an accident which is his fault may be subject to disciplinary action including discharge.
> . . . .
> Drivers should endeavor to take one percent of total daily orders.
> . . . .
> Wearing apparel will be a white shirt, black tie, black pants and black dress shoes. All drivers are to wear a chauffeurs cap or badge. All drivers are to be neat (hair cut and combed; beards and mustaches neatly trimmed) and the automobile to be in good working order and to be clean inside out. Ties will not be required May 1 to October 1.
> . . . .
> Work tickets are to be picked up each Monday. Turn in your old work ticket when obtaining a new one. Any driver failing to pick up a work authorization will be subject to disciplinary action.

The above working rules also enumerate some 16 violations "subject to immediate dismissal," including: driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs "or with the odor of alcohol"; overcharging passengers; using profanity; permitting an unauthorized person to operate cab; taking cab beyond 150-mile limit without proper authorization; failing to assist passengers failing to comply with safe driving regulations; trip stealing; using the cab for gambling or gambling on Checker Cab premises; not coming to the office when called; servicing an order with a person unauthorized by the Company in cab; not requesting that passengers will ride in back seat; not following a supervisor's orders so long as they do not endanger health or safety of driver; failing to report an accident; failing to take job assignment after responding to dispatcher's call regarding same; and transferring charges from one driver to another. In addition, the 1981–1983 agreement also states, inter alia: "Citizen band radios and other such two-way radios shall not be installed in any taxicab."[3] It was stipulated that the above rules, attached as appendix A to the agreement, have at all times been enforced as to all drivers, without regard to the ownership of the taxicab operated by the driver.

Article IX of the agreement provides, inter alia:

> The Company shall continue to provide during the term of this Agreement liability coverage as heretofore maintained to protect drivers and owners of every cab operating under the franchise of the Company against claims of persons involved in accidents inside or outside the cabs in the amount specified and in accordance with the provisions of [St. Louis and State law] . . . and will defend and hold its drivers . . . harmless against all liability.

Further, no driver shall be required to make any payment for or in connection with such liability coverage, and any driver not cooperating with the defense of an investigation of any accident claim will be subject to immediate discharge. (Also see the parties' stipulation, Jt. Exh. 1, par. 17, p. 4.) And, article X requires the Company to contribute $51 per month for each cab permit obtained by it from St. Louis during the next preceding calendar month to the Union's health and welfare fund. This fund is jointly administered, and any difference between the trustees shall be resolved in accordance with the provisions of Section 302(c)(5)(B) of the Labor Management Relations Act. The fund shall provide for payment of sickness and hospital benefits for employees in

[2] The parties, in their stipulation, explained that during January 1982, the Union authorized a strike against Respondent for slow payment of charge business reimbursements; this strike lasted about 2 weeks; and ended on January 26 "upon agreement between the parties after suit had been filed."

I note also that sec. 7.5 of art. VII also provides:

> [T]he Union may designate a five member Committee . . . . The jurisdiction of this special panel shall be limited only to grievances involving dispatching and payment of charges affecting all employees. All other grievances shall be handled pursuant to sections 7.1–7.4 above. This Committee shall have the authority to take such action as it deems necessary to insure compliance with the provisions of this Agreement involving dispatching and payment of charges, including the right to reduce the monthly operating fee to $362 upon proven violations, all subject to the grievance and arbitration provisions . . . above.

[3] The Company's working rules and related provisions of the 1981–1983 agreement, as summarized above, were discussed and in part modified by the parties during their 1981 bargaining sessions. See generally G.C. Exhs. 2 and 3. Note, for example, the Company's unwillingness to accept a dress code of "dark blue pants, as apparently there are many variations of blue." Similarly, the Company would not agree to the insertion of the word "reasonably" with respect to the work requirement that drivers assist passengers, "as it provides a larger loophole for drivers not to assist passengers." (Ibid.)

the unit and for lost time of drivers due to sickness and injury.

Article XII contains a management-rights clause. The Union "recognizes that all management functions not specifically limited by this Agreement are vested and reserved exclusively in the Company," including, but not limited to, "the direction of the working force; the utilization of employees on any work assignment; the right to hire, transfer, layoff, discipline, and discharge employees for just cause."

Article IX generally provides for service and operating fees. The monthly operating fees payable by driver-owners to the Company total $450. This fee covers insurance premiums, radio and telephone service, general service fees, and monthly operating sticker. This fee may be paid in two specified monthly installments, and if payment is not paid as asforesaid the driver is not permitted to drive for the company. However, the agreement provides alternatively for a daily operating fee payable by non-owner drivers to driver-owners and/or the Company in the amount of $24 for a "daily one shift" or in the amount of $35 for a "daily 24 hour shift."[4] The stipulation executed by the parties explained:

> There are three categories of drivers driving taxicabs under an arrangement with the Respondent. (a) Drivers that own taxicabs and drive same. Said drivers pay to Respondent a monthly service or operating fee also known as the "proration" or "pro"; (b) Drivers that drive taxicabs owned by a corporation in which Barbara Wolf and Robert Wolf are principal shareholders.[5] Said drivers pay a daily operating fee to Respondent; (c) Drivers that drive taxicabs owned by other drivers, or by third persons whose only connection with the Respondent is the payment of the monthly proration. Said drivers pay a daily operating fee to these other owners or third persons who in turn pay the monthly proration fee to Respondent. Driver owners or third persons may own or operate any number of taxicabs under the permits of Respondent.

And, as further stipulated, the Company does not withhold taxes for any of the drivers, keeps no records pertaining to minimum wage or overtime pay for any driver, and "pays no wage of any kind for any driver."

In addition, the parties stipulated with respect to rates charged by drivers as follows:

> Rates charged by drivers are established through negotiation between Respondent and the Union. Such rates are currently $.90 per mile except as otherwise modified by the parties' Agreement. Drivers are not permitted to overchange. Nor may drivers request payment of charge fares directly from Respondent's charge customers. Respondent reimburses drivers for charge fares. In about January 1982, driver Zachary Druckerman, who at that time drove a taxicab owned by one Charles Mueller, attempted to collect on certain charge fares directly from Respondent's charge customers, which charge fares he had been unable to collect from Respondent. Respondent's representative Robert Wolf informed Druckerman that he could not continue to drive under Respondent's name if he continued to solict charge payments directly.[6]

It was also stipulated that drivers are not assigned areas in which to drive, they are not assigned particular times in which to drive, and no records are kept of driver movements. The stipulation explains:

> Drivers decide whether to use the Company dispatcher as a method of customer solicitation. Respondent makes available to drivers a dispatch service. If a driver wishes to use the dispatch service, the driver either waits at one of several designated stands for radio dispatch call, in which case the first driver in line at that stand is normally dispatched; or the driver may respond to "open" radio dispatches when no taxicabs are available at nearby stands, in which case the nearest driver responding is dispatched. While operating under Respondent's permits, drivers may not be dispatched by other taxicab companies.[7]

The supplemental testimony of the six witnesses appearing herein is essentially consistent with the above-summarized provisions of the 1981–1983 agreement of the parties, the working rules attached to the agreement, the 10-page stipulation, and related documentary evidence. Thus, Robert Wolf, an officer and agent of Respondent, credibly testified that during February 1982 there were about 101 taxicabs operating under Respondent's name. Respondent owned about 3 of the taxicabs and a corporate entity known as Robar owned an additional 27 of these taxicabs. Robert Wolf and Barbara Wolf, officers and agents of Respondent, are also the principal stockholders of Robar. The remaining some 71 taxicabs were owned by other individuals. There were, according to Robert Wolf, about 37 persons who drove taxicabs owned by other people—however, approximately 27 of the 37 apparently drove for Robar and approximately 10 drove for other individuals.[8] All 101 taxicabs were equipped with Company-supplied two-way radios, and 85 to 90 percent of the drivers used these radios to obtain business.

[4] As noted supra, the agreement provides that the union committee may reduce the monthly operating fee under specified circumstances. See sec. 7.5 of art. VII.

[5] The Wolfs, as discussed below, are admitted officers and agents of Respondent.

[6] Respondent was permitted by an additional agreement, dated October 26, 1981, to discount by 5 percent "charge business reimbursement to drivers." See Jt. Exh. 1, par. 22, p. 6, and app. C.

[7] It was also stipulated that:

> Drivers may sublease their cabs to other individuals. Sublessees must complete a written application provided by and submitted to Respondent. If said applicant passes a police check concerning his driving record conducted by Respondent, he may be permitted to drive.

[8] Wolf's testimony is not entirely clear in this respect; in any event, whether or not he intended to include the three taxicabs owned by Respondent Ace with his Robar figures is not critical here.

Wolf also explained that the Company could discipline drivers in a couple of different ways. It could put a driver on hold, it could lay a driver off, and it could terminate a driver. Moreover, the working rules, as summarized above, were enforced evenhandedly without regard to who owned the car. Thus, Wolf recalled that Michael Van drove a vehicle owned by his father; he was given a reprimand and disciplined for, inter alia, careless and reckless driving. Wolf recalled that Jesse Jones, a driver of his mother's car, had two chargeable accidents in a 2-week period, and Respondent's supervisor Todd told his mother to remove him from the cab, which she did. Wolf recalled that the Company laid George Emswiller off for overcharging a passenger, and the Union obtained his reinstatement. According to Wolf, the Company, in disciplining a driver as a result of an accident or rule violation, would, in effect, have to determine whether the driver was responsible. Finally, although the stipulation states that no records are kept of driver movements Wolf acknowledged that the Company does maintain a record of dispatches.[9]

Allcorn Williams, formerly a driver for Respondent, credibly testified that he drove his own taxicab for Respondent; that his normal procedure when he started in the morning was to call the Company on the radio to let them know he was in operation; and that he would then proceed to the stand and wait for a call from the Company's dispatcher. Williams explained that, during the course of a normal day, some 80 percent of his business was the result of this dispatch service. Williams noted that:

> . . . the 80 percent was charges, charge business [slips], which you are able to return to the Company for cash . . . I [Williams] would pick up the passenger or package and [the passenger] would give me a charge [slip] . . . [I] write in the fare . . . turn it in later to the Company . . . for cash.

Williams paid the Company a total fee of $450 each month, as a proration. He was required to obtain a permit to drive. He obtained such a permit every week from the Company. The permit or workcard gave the date of the drive and the time.[10]

Williams recalled that he had, for certain periods, two taxicabs in operation with the Company. He owned both vehicles. He would sublease the second taxicab to another driver. Williams explained:

> I had two on the stand. I paid the Company $450 per month and they set the daily run charge, which was $35 a day.

A person named John Thomas drove his second vehicle. Williams paid the Company $450 per month for the second vehicle and Thomas paid Williams $35 per day. Thomas, as Williams explained, was already employed by the Company, so he just got to switch over to Williams' vehicle without obtaining any special application or permission from the Company. Williams added:

> If you found a man [driver] for your car and he was not employed by the Company, you would take him to the Company and try to get him hired before you could put him on your car. . . . If he was already working for the Company, that was different.

Fleming Hearn, formerly a driver for Respondent, credibly testified that he drove his own taxicab for the Company; that he paid the $450 per month proration; that he got a workcard from the Company at its office every week; and that "any official of the Company could sign it and give it to you." The work card named the Company and the work hours that a driver was permitted to work. According to Hearn, 90 percent of his business during a normal day was a result of the Company's dispatch service, and 85 percent of his daily business would be charge business with the Company.

Charles Mueller, formerly a driver for Respondent, credibly testified that he drove his own taxicab and also subleased about three or four vehicles to other drivers. Mueller recalled:

> Most of the time I got drivers that were already cleared by the Company. I never put anybody in from scratch myself. You had to make out an application and get the police report and a "C" taxicab driver's license, and then the driver was available. . . . On a new driver, the Company would take and send him out with either a supervisor, if there was a supervisor available, or with another experienced driver, to teach him how to operate the radio and taking in the orders and servicing the orders and things like that.

Mueller claimed that none of the people driving his vehicles could sublease them.[11]

[9] Wolf noted that some of the working rules (annexed to the 1981–1983 agreement) are the result of city, municipal, or Federal regulations; some are the result of insurance company provisions or requirements; and others were adopted without reference to or not because of law or insurance. Thus, for example, Wolf explained that "rule number three is by city ordinance, you are required to keep your car neat," and the "city does require . . . a neat driver." However, as Wolf also acknowledged, the city did not at the time require black dress shoes—there was no specific dress code.

[10] Williams explained that the only time restrictions on the permit were daytime or nighttime.

Also see the related credible testimony of former driver-owner James Cooper.

[11] In addition, Mueller recalled that one of his drivers, Zachery Druckerman, called him and told him that he had been fired by the company for trying to collect charges directly from charge customers. Mueller told Druckerman that his recourse was not with Mueller; it was with the Union.

James Matthews, president and business representative for the Union, credibly recalled how he spoke with officials of Respondent about Druckerman, and Company Officer Robert Wolf told Matthews that Druckerman could go to work so long as he did not bother the customers anymore. He would be reinstated. Matthews similarly recalled that Company Officer Barbara Wolf apprised him that driver Leroy Moore was fired because he continually answered trips, and was not in the vicinity of the trips. He was lying about his location. Moore was then driving a vehicle owned by another individual.

B. The Sequence of Events Culminating in the Filing of Unfair Labor Practice Charges by the Union

The pertinent sequence of events culminating in the Union's filing unfair labor practice charges with the Board in this case was also stipulated by the parties. (See Jt. Exh. 1, pp. 6–10.) Thus, during January 1982, as noted above, the Union authorized a strike against Respondent "for slow payment of charge business reimbursements." This strike, the subject of an injunction proceeding instituted by the Company, lasted about 2 weeks, ending on January 26, 1982. (Ibid.)

Also, during early January 1982, the Board of Public Service of the City of St. Louis (the governmental unit responsible for issuing taxicab permits for operation in the city of St. Louis), informed Respondent that the Company would be required to take out insurance policies on all taxicabs operating under city permits. Previously, the Company had operated on a surety bond in the approximate amounts of $30,000 to $40,000 for all of the city permits. In addition, during early December and January, the St. Louis County Department of Public Works notified the Company that it would require insurance on each taxicab operating in St. Louis County. (St. Louis City is independent of and is not located in St. Louis County.) (Ibid.)

Respondent, as further stipulated, attempted to secure insurance, and was notified by its insurance agent that the cost of insuring a taxicab in the city of St. Louis was approximately $143 per month per cab and the cost of insuring a taxicab in the county of St. Louis was approximately $83 per month per cab. The Company, however, was in dire financial straits and, rather than close down, determined to pass along the cost of the insurance to the drivers. (Ibid.)

A meeting was held at the Union's hall on January 26, 1982. There, Respondent, through its attorney, informed the union representatives and others that the Company was forced to pass along the cost of the insurance to the drivers. The union representatives informed the Company that the Union would not agree to the insurance cost passthrough. In addition, at this same meeting, union representatives informed company representatives that, due to nonpayment of substantial charge reimbursements, the 5-percent discount of charge reimbursements to the drivers would be discontinued and, further, the monthly operating fee (proration) would be reduced for the month of February to $363 from $450. Respondent's attorney, in turn, informed the union representatives that the Company would not agree to the reduction of the proration or the discontinuance of the 5-percent discount. (Ibid.)

About January 27 or 28, 1982, Company Vice President Robert Wolf spoke by telephone to the Union's president, and gave him the approximate cost of the insurance, which he quoted at $143 for the city of St. Louis. The Union's president then informed Robert Wolf that he would submit the proposal calling for the drivers to pay the insurance cost to the union membership. Later, about January 29, the Union's president telephoned Wolf to inform Wolf that the drivers had rejected the proposed insurance passthrough. The Union's president also informed Wolf that the proration would be reduced from $450 per month to $362 per month. (Ibid.)[12]

About this same time, Robert Wolf met with various drivers to discuss operating problems and, in response to a question as to whether the Company would be operating after February 2, 1982, Wolf informed the drivers that the city of St. Louis and St. Louis County were requiring insurance; that the Company could not afford to pay the insuance; and that drivers would have to pay the insurance amount in addition to their monthly proration. The amount discussed with the drivers was $113, an average of the city and county insurance costs. Wolf further stated that, in lieu of paying $113 per month for insurance, drivers could pay Respondent $5000 for a medallion (i.e., city permit or buy shares in the Respondent's business in that amount, and pay a monthly operating fee equal to approximately one-half the monthly proration fee. (Ibid.)

Thereafter, commencing on January 31, 1982, all drivers paying a monthly proration were told by Respondent that an amount for insurance of $113 would be required in addition to the $450 monthly proration. These drivers were told that the $113 had to be paid prior to February 5, 1982. After that date, Respondent did not give dispatches to any driver that had not paid both amounts. (Ibid.)[13]

C. Discussion

The protective provisions of the National Labor Relations Act extend only to employees, and not to any individual having the status of an independent contractor. The question, whether an individual is an employee or an independent contractor, is to be resolved by application of general principles of agency law. See NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254 (1968). And, as the Supreme Court explained in NLRB v. United Insurance Co., supra at 258:

> [T]here is no shorthand formula or magic phrase that can be applied to find the answer, but all of the incidents of the relationship must be assessed and weighed with no one factor being decisive.

[12] Also on January 29, as further stipulated, there was a meeting at the Respondent's offices attended by the Union's president, the Union's attorney, the Respondent's president Robert Wolf, and the Respondent's attorney. There, the Union suggested that the drivers collect their charges directly from customers. This was rejected by Respondent. (Ibid.)

[13] It was stipulated that earlier, commencing on January 8, 1982, Respondent had also increased the daily shift fee charged to non-owner drivers from $35 per day to $39 per day (for 24-hour shifts). (Ibid.)

Further, Kenilworth Insurance Company, the proposed insurer of the taxicabs in St. Louis, had notified the St. Louis Board of Public Service on February 2, 1982, that it would not accept insurance coverage for Respondent's taxicabs in the city of St. Louis. On February 16, the Board of Public Service voted to revoke all permits for Respondent for various reasons, including the failure to provide insurance on the amount of taxicabs operating. By its order, all taxicabs were to be off the streets of the city of St. Louis and out of operation by noon, February 17, 1982. Thereafter, about March 1, Respondent eliminated all insurance payment requirements to the drivers. Subsequently, the monthly proration required by Respondent did not exceed $450 per month. The daily operating fee was reduced at the same time to $35 per day. (Ibid.)

Restatement 2d, Agency § 220 (2), lists the following indicia, among others, to be considered in assessing this relationship: the extent of control which may be exercised over the details of the work; whether or not the individual is engaged in a distinct business; the skills required; the supplier of the instrumentalities, tools, and place of work; the term of employment; the method of payments; whether the work is part of the regular business of the alleged employer; and whether the parties believe they are creating the relationship of master and servant.

In the instant case, the record makes clear that the parties, for some 16 or more years, regarded the relationship created here to be that of employer-employee. In November 1966, the National Labor Relations Board, following an election by "consent agreement," certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining agent for all drivers and owner-drivers operating under the franchise of Checker Cab Company, the predecessor of Respondent. The Union thereupon represented the unit personnel, entering into a series of collective-bargaining contracts with Respondent. The current contract, summarized at length, supra, runs from August 1, 1981, through May 31, 1983. Although counsel for Respondent generally asserts that "the agreement itself was a business arrangement rather than a collective-bargaining agreement," a review of the contract clauses and attached working rules makes it plain that the document purports to be and is in fact a collective-bargaining contract. Indeed, in early 1982, Respondent filed a suit in the Eastern District of Missouri, seeking, inter alia, to enjoin the Union and its striking and picketing drivers from violating the no-strike provisions of their "collective bargaining agreements" under Section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act. The current contract, in addition, provides that any differences between the trustees with respect to the jointly administered health and welfare fund shall be resolved in accordance with the provisions of Section 302(c)(5)(B) of the Labor Management Relations Act. And, earlier, during this ongoing employer-employee relationship, the National Labor Relations Board determined that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by terminating one of its driver employees. See Checker Cab Co., 175 NLRB 20 (1969).

In sum, the parties have regarded and treated the unit personnel here as employees, the parties have called the unit personnel employees, and the parties have resorted to, relied on, and complied with the protective provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act, in controlling this employer-employee relationship. Significantly, counsel for Respondent, in his brief, makes no attempt to cite here some new facts or recently discovered evidence which would change this 16-year-old relationship. Instead, as demonstrated below, Respondent, for economic reasons, has attempted to unilaterally abrogate, ignore, and modify the terms and conditions of employment expressly provided in the 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement of the parties, as implemented by them.

On the significant issue of Respondent's right and exercise of control over its taxicab drivers in the performance of their daily work, this record also demonstrates that the Company possesses such power and in fact exercises close supervision over the drivers. Thus, for example, although some 71 of the 101 taxicabs involved here are owned by individuals, all 101 taxicabs are painted with the Company's name, telephone number, identification number, and colors. An individual owner may remove his cab once a year for a period not to exceed 30 days to take a vacation without being required to paint his cab out provided the cab is parked on the company parking lot. An individual who wants to sell his taxicab must post a notice giving first priority for purchase to the non-owner driver with the greatest amount of seniority with the Company. An individual may sublease his taxicab; however, sublessees must complete a written application provided by and submitted to Respondent. Such an applicant, if not already employed by the Company, must fill out an application, get a police report or check, and be instructed by a company supervisor, if available, or experienced driver. In addition, some 80 to 90 percent of these individual drivers utilize and rely on the Company-supplied two-way radios and dispatch system. Further, about 80 to 85 percent of their business is so-called charge business, for which drivers are subsequently reimbursed by the Company. As noted, drivers are not permitted by the Company to request payment of charge fares directly from Respondent's charge customers. And, drivers must obtain from the Company weekly permits, which generally provide, inter alia, whether the driver may work during the day or night period. Drivers, while operating under such permits, may not be dispatched by other taxicab companies.

The Company also has a detailed set of working rules which further enables it to closely supervise and control its drivers' daily activities. These rules are admittedly applied evenhandedly to both owner and non-owner drivers. And, as illustrated herein, violation of these working rules has resulted in reprimands, discipline, and the firing of unit drivers. Thus, for example, owner and non-owner drivers must report all accidents to the Company immediately; must not leave the scene of accidents and must wait for the company supervisor; are subject to disciplinary action by the Company if the Company determines that an accident is his fault; are required to comply with a strict dress code; are required to keep their vehicles in good working order and clean inside and out; are required to pick up work tickets from the Company each Monday; and are subject to discharge for violating 1 of some 16 enumerated violations pertaining to, inter alia, their conduct and behavior at work. Owner and non-owner drivers are required to endeavor to respond to a certain percent of total daily orders from the Company. Further, not coming to the office when called, failing to take a job assignment after responding to a dispatcher's call, and not following a supervisor's orders make such an owner or non-owner driver subject to immediate dismissal. Likewise, owner and non-owner drivers may not take their vehicles beyond a 150-mile limit without proper authorization from the Company.

Respondent, in its collective-bargaining agreement, as implemented, agreed to provide liability coverage to protect drivers and owners of every cab and driver was required to make any payment for, or in connection with, such liability coverage. Respondent also agreed to contribute to the Union's health and welfare fund, thus providing sickness and hospital benefits for employees in the unit. And, while it is true that some 71 of the 101 vehicles involved here are owned by individuals, and drivers do not receive compensation or wages in the form of a paycheck like a factory worker, it is also true that the use of all such vehicles is substantially controlled by the Company; over 80 percent of the moneys received by the owner and non-owner drivers is from company dispatches; and an equally significant percent is charge business for which the owner and non-owner drivers cannot be paid directly, but must get their money from the Company.

In sum, I find here that this record shows an employer-employee relationship between the unit personnel and the Company. It is true, as counsel for Respondent contends, there are present here some criteria which, if viewed separately, suggest an independent contractor status. However, on balance, and assessed in the context of this full record, the scale, in my view, substantially tips toward the employer-employee relationship.[14]

The record establishes here, and the parties do not seriously dispute, that the Company unilaterally determined to pass along to its unit drivers the insurance costs, and related operating fees, contrary to the express terms and conditions of employment contained in the 1981–1983 agreement of the parties, as implemented. The Union would not agree to the Company's proposed changes. Representatives of the Company later met privately with unit drivers, advised them that they would have to pay the insurance costs and related operating charges, and offered them, inter alia, an opportunity to purchase an interest in the Employer's business. Under the circumstances, Respondent unilaterally modified terms and conditions of employment of the unit drivers, as contained in the 1981–1983 agreement, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Further, Respondent, at the same time, attempted to circumvent the Union as bargaining agent for the unit employees, also in derogation of its statutory bargaining obligation. And, it is settled, economic needs of an employer will not, as here, privilege such attempts to unilaterally modify or abrogate the terms and conditions of employment set forth in the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. See generally Inland Cities, Inc., 241 NLRB 374 (1979), enfd. mem. 618 F.2d 117 (9th Cir. 1980); Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973), enfd. 505 F.2d 1302 (5th Cir. 1974). Cf. Fibreboard Corp v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964); and First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981).

Respondent unilaterally implemented these changes in unit employees' insurance costs and operating fees. Unit drivers, who did not comply with these midterm changes in the terms and conditions of their 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement, were summarily denied dispatch services from the Employer. In short, they were, in effect, terminated because of their insistence that the terms of their collective-bargaining agreement be followed, in clear violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

In sum, I find and conclude that Respondent, by the foregoing conduct, has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce as alleged.

2. The Union is a labor organization as alleged.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute an appropriate collective-bargaining unit, as alleged:

> All owner and non-owner taxicab drivers employed by Respondent, excluding dispatchers, service station employees, guards, office clerical, professional and managerial employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times material, the Union has been and is the duly designated collective-bargaining agent of the unit employees, as alleged.

5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by announcing, contrary to the terms of its 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement, an increase in, and subsequently increasing, the amount of operating fees which must be paid by certain of the unit taxicab drivers as a condition of their employment; by advising unit employees that, contrary to the terms of its 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement, they would have to pay certain costs for insurance; and by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with the unit employees.

6. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by failing and refusing to issue dispatches to unit employees because they have engaged in union activities, or other concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection, including their insistence that the terms of their 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement be followed.

7. The violations found above affect commerce as alleged.

REMEDY

Respondent will be directed to cease and desist from engaging in the unfair labor practices found above, or like or related conduct, and to post the attached notice. It has been found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by, contrary to the terms of its 1981–1983 agreement, unilaterally modifying certain terms and conditions of employment, as provided therein. Respondent will therefore be directed to, on request, bargain in good faith with the Union as the duly designated bargaining agent of the unit employees; to abide by the terms and conditions as contained in the 1981–1983 agreement; and to make whole the unit employees for all monetary losses sustained as a result of its unlawful unilateral action, with interest, to be determined and computed as provided below.

NLRB*, 679 F.2d 1095 (14th Cir. 1982), seeking to derive support from the treatment of the various indicia found present or lacking in those and related cases. Again, each of these cases rests on its own special facts and no one fact is decisive in striking the required balance.

In addition, it has been determined that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by, in effect, terminating the unit employees because they insisted that the terms and conditions of the 1981–1983 agreement be followed. Respondent will therefore be directed to offer such unit employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings sustained as a result of this unlawful conduct, by paying them a sum of money equal to that which they normally would have earned from the date of this discrimination to the date of Respondent's offer of reinstatement, less net earnings during such period, with backpay computed as provided in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and with interest computed as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[15]

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

[15] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Respondent will preserve and make available to the Board, on request, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary and useful to determine compliance with and the amount of backpay due under the terms of this decision.

DECISION AND ORDER REMANDING

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 3 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief; the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support of its cross-exceptions and in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions; the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and in answer to the Respondent's exceptions; and the Respondent filed an answer to the Charging Party's cross-exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and makes the following findings.

Following the hearing, but before the issuance of the judge's decision, the Respondent moved that the judge disqualify himself from the instant proceeding on the grounds that the record reflects statements by him which demonstrate hostility, bias, and prejudice towards the Respondent and prejudgment of the merits of the case. In his decision the judge denied the Respondent's motion as "plainly lacking in merit" based on his findings, contained in a separate report which he included as an exhibit in the record, of "misconduct" by the Respondent's attorney in filing the motion to disqualify.[1] The judge further found, on the merits, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to furnish relevant information requested by the Union concerning the Respondent's leasing out of coal lands.

After carefully reviewing the entire record, we find merit in the Respondent's contentions that the judge appeared to prejudge the merits of the case and exhibited hostility, bias, and prejudice towards the Respondent. As the Board stated in Indianapolis Glove Co.,[2] and recently reaffirmed in Dayton Power & Light Co.:[3]

> [I]t is essential not only to avoid actual partiality and prejudgment . . . in the conduct of Board proceedings, but also to avoid even the appearance of a partisan tribunal.[4]

Here it appears that the judge made statements throughout the hearing—from as early as during the direct examination of the first witness—to the effect that the Union had a statutory right to the requested information, thereby giving the impression that he had prejudged the ultimate issue in the case.[5] Moreover, when the Respondent's counsel was attempting to elicit evidence as to the nature of the operations of the Respondent's lessees, the judge stated to counsel for the General Counsel, "I would appreciate it if counsel would maintain a reasonably militant posture with respect to the relevance of this material." Further, the judge made several comments to the Respondent's attorney that are particularly troublesome because of their serious accusations and hostile tone, such as when the judge told the Respondent's attorney that he would be "suborning perjury" if he attempted to ask certain questions of his witness, whereupon counsel was impelled to make an offer of proof with respect to that inquiry.

With regard to the judge's report recommending that the Board take disciplinary action against the Respondent's attorney for his "contemptuous and unethical conduct" in filing the motion to disqualify and the judge's supplemental report reaffirming his charges of misconduct, we firmly reject any

[1] The attorney who filed the motion to disqualify did not represent the Respondent at the hearing. The Respondent subsequently filed with the Board a response to the charges of misconduct and a motion to strike the judge's report from the record. The General Counsel filed a position letter stating that the Board should reject the judge's recommendation of disciplinary action against the Respondent's counsel. The judge thereafter filed a supplemental report in response to the Respondent's motion to strike. For the reasons set forth in this decision, we grant the Respondent's motion to strike, and, sua sponte, further strike the judge's supplemental report.

[5] For example, during the judge's examination of the General Counsel's witness, Union President Semko, after Semko stated, "We have the right to it [the leasing information] under the agreement, right," the judge responded, "Not only do you have the right, you have the responsibility."

Later, during the Respondent's cross-examination of Semko, the judge interrupted to state:

> [W]hat they are attempting to do in this proceeding is to verify that information and they have a perfect right under the law to do so . . . . The obligation of a signatory contractor under this agreement couldn't be expressed more clearly than is set forth in subparagraph (g) of Article 2.

In a further dialogue with the Respondent's counsel, the judge stated, "All they have to do is suspect that their contract is being violated and they have a right to request information to protect the interests of the working people who are the beneficiaries of this agreement." A short while later he asked, presumably rhetorically, "What is wrong in giving a little information if it doesn't hurt to give it?"

Finally, during the Respondent's examination of its own witness, Employer Vice President Ulmer, the judge stated:

> As far as I'm concerned, the unions have a right to see the leases, to examine what they cover, and to all the other information to assure themselves that there is no violation of the collective-bargaining agreement.

> They don't have to take your word for it. They are entitled to see the business records. They are entitled to see what is beyond dispute; i.e., the identity of your shareholders, the identity of your managers, the identity of your directors.

such recommendation and express our disapproval of the judge's reports. Particularly where, as here, the attorney's motion to disqualify and the supporting brief are based entirely on the contents of the official record, even the suggestion of discipline for filing such a motion necessarily would have an inhibiting effect on the attorney's duty to represent the best interests of his client in this or any future Board proceeding. Further, we find no basis for the judge's characterization of the Respondent's motion to disqualify the judge as "contemptuous" or "unethical" or, as the judge viewed it, as a personal attack on the judge which was designed ultimately to obstruct Board processes. Accordingly, we find that the judge's reports recommending disciplinary action against the Respondent's attorney were without justification and in the circumstances here were improper, and we strike them from the record.

When the judge's conduct is considered as a whole, both his on-the-record conduct and his issuing reports on misconduct, there are sufficient grounds for finding that the judge, at the very least, gave the appearance of partiality and prejudgment sufficient to warrant his disqualification from the case. Accordingly, in fairness to the parties, and in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act, we shall set aside the judge's decision and remand this proceeding to the Chief Administrative Law Judge for a hearing de novo before a different administrative law judge duly designated by him, who shall prepare and serve on the parties a decision containing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations with respect to the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint herein.

ORDER

It is ordered that the administrative law judge's decision of 3 April 1984 is set aside.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that a hearing de novo be held before a different administrative law judge for the purpose of receiving evidence on the issues raised by the allegations of the complaint.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, upon conclusion of the hearing, the administrative law judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a decision containing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations based on the evidence received and that, following service of such decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL A. HARMATZ, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Pottsville, Pennsylvania, on January 9, 1984, upon an unfair labor practice charge filed on July 29, 1983, and a complaint issued on September 14, 1983, alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to furnish requested information necessary and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as exclusive bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit. In its duly filed answer, Respondent denies that any unfair labor practices were committed. Following close of the hearing, briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel, the Charging Party,[1] and Respondent.[2]

On the entire record in this proceeding, and after careful consideration of the posthearing briefs, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Pennsylvania corporation with a main office located in Pottsville, Pennsylvania, from which it is engaged in the strip-mining, processing, and sale of anthracite coal. Respondent is a member of the Anthracite Operators, an employer association which represents employer-members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with the Charging Party. Members or a member of the Anthracite Operators has sold and shipped products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and it is found that Respondent is, and has been at all times mate-

[1] A posthearing brief filed on behalf of the Charging Party was over the signature of Attorney Randall Vehar, whose appearance was verified by mail and subsequently entered. For reasons set forth below, the Charging Party's "Opposition to Respondent's Motion to Disqualify Administrative Law Judge" is stricken.

[2] The brief of the Respondent was over the signature of Richard S. Meyer, an attorney, who did not attend the hearing. Pursuant to formal correspondence with Meyer, his appearance is noted. At his request, the record is reopened to receive a letter from me, dated February 27, 1984, and marked ALJ Exh. 1 and Meyer's response of March 2, 1984, marked ALJ Exh. 2. Meyer also filed a "Motion to Disqualify Administrative Law Judge," alleging that I "demonstrated hostility, bias and prejudice toward Reading Anthracite Company and prejudged the case" and on that basis requesting "the proceeding to be heard de novo before a new administrative law judge." These latter charges raise fundamental issues concerning the competence, fitness, and integrity of an administrative law judge. The relief sought is plainly calculated to prolong resolution of the instant controversy. Despite their gravity, said allegations are so baseless as to suggest possible malice as well as an intent deliberately to impede Board processes. The motion has been analyzed fully in an independent report issued simultaneously herewith and filed by me with the Executive Secretary of the National Labor Relations Board for further investigation and appropriate action pursuant to Sec. 102.44(b) of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations. Findings therein are deemed a part of this record and it is received in evidence as ALJ Exh. 3. Upon request of Meyer it shall be attached to this decision as an "Appendix" and published [omitted from publication]. Needless to say, the motion to disqualify is denied as plainly lacking in merit.

Respondent on March 12, 1984, outside the due date, filed a "Reply Brief." The General Counsel and the Charging Party urge that said document be stricken. They correctly observe that such filings are not authorized by the Board's Rules and Regulations. For this reason, reply briefs customarily are rejected at this level. Accordingly, neither the belatedly filed "Reply Brief" nor the Charging Party's "Opposition" referred to above has been considered herein.

rial herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and it is found that United Mine Workers of America is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

The material facts in this case are simple and beyond dispute. Respondent, as a member of the Anthracite Operators, is bound to a multiemployer collective-bargaining agreement, executed on June 1, 1981, and scheduled to expire on June 1, 1984.[3] On the face of that agreement, Respondent, as a signatory, is obligated to apply the terms and standards thereof to employees engaged in "the production, preparation, processing and cleaning of coal from deep mining operations, strip operations, and refuse banks."[4]

In addition, Respondent has agreed, as a member of the employer association and party to the contract, that it "will not lease out any coal lands for the purpose of avoiding the application of this agreement."[5]

On May 2, 1983, the Union wrote Respondent requesting information bearing upon the latter's practice of leasing lands for the mining of coal, stating as follows:

> In order to insure compliance with certain portions of our collective bargaining agreement, we are requesting that you provide the following information:
> (1) A description of all anthracite coal lands located within District 25 that Reading Anthracite Company has leased out or during the terms [sic] of this Agreement intends to lease out.
> (2) Specifically identify the leases, the date the leases were let, and whether or not the United Mine Workers of America was previously notified of this lease.
> (3) Please provide copies of all the leases described in paragraph one (1) to the United Mine Workers of America, Region 1 Office, R.D. #1, Box 172, Belle Vernon, Pennsylvania 15002.
> (4) Please provide any agreements and descriptions of any arrangements whereby the leases [sic] provide coal (produced from lands leased from Reading Anthracite Company) to Reading Anthracite Company or provides such coal for Reading Anthracite Company customers. Please provide any agreements and descriptions of arrangements whereby Reading Anthracite Company has obtained coal produced by such leases or whereby Reading Anthracite Company has assisted the lessee in obtaining customers for such coal. Identify whether any of these agreements or arrangements for providing or purchasing back coal or [sic] exclusive agreements or arrangements.
> (5) Please provide the following additional information:
>
> A. Specifically identify any share holders, directors, officers, managers, supervisors, and/or agents of Reading Anthracite Company. The lessor [sic] who are also share holders in the lessee, and/or who otherwise have connections with the lessee as a director, officer, manager, supervisor, agent employee, etc. with the lessee. Specifically identify any subsidiary and/or affiliates of Reading Anthracite Company that are lessees.
> B. Specifically identify whether or not Reading Anthracite Company and the lessee share any fringe benefit coverage programs, mining or other governmental permits, financial accounts, etc., and identify such connections. Specifically identify any situations in which Reading Anthracite Company has paid or is paying taxes, black lung benefits, royalties, etc. for the lessee.
> C. Identify the nature of any financial assistance provided by Reading Antracite Company to the lessees identified in paragraph one (1).
> (6) Specifically identify any type of control legally or contractually retained (whether or not exercised) and/or as a practical matter actually exercised by Reading Anthracite Company over the production, mining, processing, etc. of coal by lessees from such leased coal lands, including, but not limited to the manner in which the coal is to be mined, the amount and the extent to which the coal is to be mined, the type of reclamation that is to be accomplished, etc.
> (7) For the past four (4) years, please identify on a monthly or quarterly basis the tonnage of coal produced by Reading Anthracite Company under the agreement, produced by Reading Anthracite Company by not under the agreement [sic], and the tonnage of coal produced by Reading Anthracite Company lessees (from lands leased from Reading Anthracite Company).
> To the extent that the above information can be provided in a package or if necessary in installments, please provide it as soon as possible to the Region I Office. If you have any questions regarding this request, including clarification of request or suggestions as to any conditions under which you will provide this information, please contact the Region I office.[6]

Thereafter, on July 29, 1983, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board, reciting in material part, as follows:

> Since on or about May 2, 1983, the above-named employer has been violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to provide the United Mine Workers of America, the collective bargaining representative, with the information the Union needs to effectively administer its labor contract with the employer.[7]

On September 23, 1983, the Union, through its "legal coordinator" informed Respondent that its letter of May 2 included a typographical error, attempted to correct same, and indicated that the Union remained available to clarify any questions held by Respondent concerning the request.[8]

Prior to the instant hearing on January 9, 1983, Respondent simply ignored the request, neglecting to inquire in any fashion as to the nature, purpose, or scope of the Union's interest in the subject matter.

B. The Controlling Precedent; Relevance of the Requested Information

Pursuant to settled authority, employers, as a corollary of the duty to bargain in good faith, are required, on request, to provide the exclusive collective-bargaining agent with certain information within its possession. This duty exists where the data sought is relevant to the Union's duties in connection with the negotiation, enforcement, or administration of a collective-bargaining agreement. See, e.g., NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149, 152 (1956); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 435–436 (1967); Detroit-Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 303 (1979).

Apart from issues addressed to the relevance of information sought, precedent leaves little room for controversy in this area of the law. Once relevance is established, the failure of the employer to respond is tantamount to a per se violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. See Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61, 68 (3d Cir. 1965); C-B Buick Inc. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 1086, 1091 (3d Cir. 1974).[9] In the interest of facilitating a free exchange of facts, labor organizations have been favored with wide latitude in perfecting a legally enforceable claim. Thus, certain requests, such as those related to "wages" fall into a category so "intrinsic" to the core of the employer-employee relationship as to be "presumptively relevant." See, e.g., San Diego Newspaper Guild Local 95 v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863, 867 (9th Cir. 1977). In such cases, "the employer bears the burden of showing a lack of relevance." Prudential Insurance Co. of America v. NLRB, 412 F.2d 77, 84 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied 396 U.S. 928 (1969). On the other hand, in connection with certain other types of information, "the courts have required a showing of relevance by the Union before holding that the employer must comply with the request." San Diego Newspaper Guild Local 95 v. NLRB, 548 F.2d at 867, and cases cited therein. However, even under this more stringent standard, the initial burden of proof imposed upon labor organizations is readily satisfied, on the theory that "a broad range of potentially useful information should be allowed to the Union for the purpose of effectuating the bargaining process, unless it is clearly irrelevant." Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 603 F.2d at 1315. Consistent therewith, the Supreme Court, has admonished that the Board need only find a "probability" as to relevance, and that the information sought "would be of use to the union in carrying out statutory duties and responsibilities." NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. at 437; NLRB v. Rockwell Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953 (6th Cir. 1969); Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 603 F.2d at 1315.

With these principles in mind, on the undisputed facts in this proceeding, the prima facie entitlement of the Union is beyond realistic challenge. The request, on its face, relates to possible violations of separate obligations willingly assumed by Respondent through the bargaining process. . The first derives from a "resolution" adopted in 1939 by the Union and the Anthracite Operators which in material part provided as follows: "When any operator proposes to lease a . . . mine or parcels of coal land, and before such lease is executed, he shall notify the President of the District of the United Mine Workers of America in which the property is located."[10] According to testimony adduced on behalf of the complaint it was the Union's position that the aforesaid notification obligation was carried forward through article 1 of the subsisting collective-bargaining agreement which in material part states:

> THIS AGREEMENT . . . carries forward the provisions of the precedessor Agreements except to the extent inconsistent with this Agreement. Prior practice, custom, local agreements and rulings and decisions of the Anthracite Board of Conciliation and umpire not in conflict with this Agreement shall be continued.

Consistent with this interpretation, there was no showing in the instant case that the 1939 resolution had ever been modified, abrogated, or otherwise limited. Against this background, the May 2 letter urges Respondent to "specifically identify the leases, the dates the leases were let, and whether or not the United Mine Workers of America was previously notified of this lease." Such a request was plainly relevant to the Union's assessment of whether or not Respondent had breached an enforceable commitment to the Union.

Beyond the notification issue, the letter of May 2 sought disclosure of factors bearing upon the possibility that Respondent might have embarked upon an improper intrusion upon work awarded by contract to represented employees. On its face, that letter seeks documentation and other evidence pertaining to the degree of common control, common ownership, and other elements of interrelationship of operations relevant to assessment of whether lessees were utilized as a "disguised continuance" in furtherance of a design by Respondent to evade its negotiated contractual duties. See, e.g., Southport Pe-

[7] See G.C. Exh. 1(a).

[8] See Jt. Exh. 2(b).

[9] "To refuse to furnish such relevant information violates the Act, irrespective of the employer's good or bad faith, because it conflicts with the statutory policy to facilitate effective collective bargaining." Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 1310, 1315 (8th Cir. 1979).

[10] See G.C. Exh. 4, pp. 179–180. Respondent in its posthearing brief erroneously refers to the resolution as the "Anthracite Coal Strike Commission award."

troleum Co. v. NLRB, 315 U.S. 100, 106 (1942). In this connection, it will be recalled that article 2, section (g)(1), of the governing agreement embodies an injunction that "[t]he Operators agree that they will not lease out any coal lands for the purpose of avoiding the application of this Agreement."[11] Michael Semko, president of District 5 of the United Mine Workers, testified that the request for comprehensive data concerning Respondent's leasing arrangements also was effected pursuant to article 2, section (g), of the subsisting collective-bargaining agreement and that this request was based on "concern by the coal operators and . . . the Union prior to the time . . . that Reading Anthracite was leasing coal lands out to other people without notifying the Union," and the fact that operators were "expressing concern about nonunion operations in District 25," and "these nonunion operators . . . does affect our membership."[12]

It is also clear that, as a matter of law, the theory on which a grievance or other cause of action might be maintained was implicit in the May 2 letter. That document sought a return which closely tracked factors relevant to the Board's alter ego policy, a concept designed to assure that an employer not avoid its statutory obligations "merely by forming a new business entity." NLRB v. Scott Printing Co., 612 F.2d 783, 786 (3d Cir. 1979). In that same vein, as a matter of settled principle, "one entity is responsible as the alter ego for another's unfair labor practices if an apparent transfer of operations is not an 'arms length' transaction between distinct entities . . . but merely a sham, creating a disguised continuance of the precedessor's operations." Fugazy Continental Corp. v. NLRB, 725 F.2d 1416 (D.C. Cir. 1984); South Prairie Construction Co. v. Operating Engineers, 425 U.S. 800 (1976). By the same token, a contracting employer's use of a closely related firm to operate on a nonunion basis has been held to violate Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(d) of the Act as an abrogation of the terms of a subsisting contract. NLRB v. Al Bryant Inc., 711 F.2d 543 (3d Cir. 1983). And beyond the authority of the Board, in Carpenters Local 1846 v. Pratt-Farnsworth, 690 F.2d 489, 511 (5th Cir. 1982), the court recognized the legal substantiality of a union's cause of action to enforce a contract as against a related, nominally independent nonsignatory under Section 301 of the Act, stating as follows:

> It was Congress' stated goal in adopting section 301 to treat collective bargaining agreements as contracts fully enforceable in federal courts, in order to encourage the making of such agreements and to promote industrial peace through faithful performance of such agreements. . . . The NLRA similarly has as one of its goals the promotion of industrial peace through faithful performance of collective bargaining agreements. . . . We have seen that the Board has developed the single employer and alter ego theories in the context of unfair labor practice proceedings in which it is alleged that related employers have violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the NLRA by failing to abide by the terms of a collective bargaining agreement entered into by one of them. Both of those theories are clearly designed to promote the faithful performance of a collective bargaining agreement not only by the signatory employer but also by a nonsignatory employer with the requisite high degree of consanguinity to the signatory employer. . . . [We] see no reason why the law developed by the Board and by federal appellate courts in that context should not be the substantive law applied in a suit under section 301 against related employers for breach of a collective bargaining agreement entered into by one of them.

In the instant case, the governing contract on its face purports to assure represented employees in the multiemployer bargaining unit work entailed in "the production, preparation, processing and cleaning of coal from deep mining operations, strip operations, and refuse banks."[13] It need not be gainsaid that: "The preservation or diversion of [such] . . . work is a subject of mandatory bargaining under the Act. Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 209 . . . (1964)." NLRB v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969). Here, the leasing operations of Respondent were extensive. Most of the lessees were performing work akin to that described in the "Work Jurisdiction" clause of the contract. In these circumstances, the Union's right to information enabling determination as to whether any employee interests were compromised by operations financed, owned, controlled, or supervised by Respondent is not only confirmed by Board precedent, but also by specific views expressed in at least two circuit courts of appeals. See NLRB v. Leonard B. Herbert Jr. & Co., 696 F.2d 1120 (5th Cir. 1983); NLRB v. Associated General Contractors, 633 F.2d 766, 772 (9th Cir. 1980); see also Doubarn Sheet Metal, Inc., 243 NLRB 821 (1979).

[11] Attorney Kopko, on behalf of Respondent, after close of the evidentiary portion of the hearing, represented that "[t]hrough a reading of the complaint, the Reading Anthracite Company was not alerted to the contractual provision . . . which they [the Union] were relying upon for their entitlement to the information that they had requested." In view of Kopko's limited experience under this Act, his representation might well have been accurate. I would note, however, that the governing collective-bargaining agreement itself has but one article dealing with the leasing of coal lands. Furthermore, leasing practices unmistakably were the focal point of the Union's letter. In any event, the Union both on May 2 and September 23 invited the Employer to address any questions or need for clarification to the Union concerning the request. Respondent obviously failed to show any interest in this offer, electing instead on its own assumption, blindly, to assert that "the information requested . . . is beyond the scope of any collective bargaining obligations imposed . . . by the Act." See G.C. Exh. 1(e).

[12] In its posthearing brief, Respondent characterizes the General Counsel's testimony as failing to provide "clear or consistent reason for the broad request for information." To exemplify the so-called shifts in this evidence Respondent fails to rest entirely upon testimony. Indeed, at the core of this contention is a representation uttered by the General Counsel in support of an offer of evidence which later was excluded by me pursuant to Respondent's own objection. Surely, learned counsel could be expected to grasp the difference, in terms of probative weight, between proof and argumentation by an attorney. Contrary to Respondent, the testimony of Semko concerning the Union's suspicion as to the possibility that Respondent was engaging in evasive tactics through its leases, the fact that any such practice would offend interests of represented employees as well as other signatory operators, and the fact the Union sought to protect those concerns by the May 2 effort was perfectly plausible and did in fact portray "a clear and consistent reason for the broad request for information that it made to Reading Anthracite."

Indeed, in the most recent pronouncement affecting the instant issue, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals stated as follows:

> We think the union needed the requested information to perform an essential collective bargaining function. The union had reason to suspect that the employer was attempting to circumvent the collective bargaining contract by secretly cutting wages and directing work to other, possibly related, firms. Without further data, however, it could not successfully act on these suspicions. [NLRB v. National Cleaning Co., 723 F.2d 746, 748 (9th Cir. 1983).]

C. The Defense

Respondent's posture in this matter is inexplicable under the law and the facts. Despite prodding by me not a shred of competent proof was offered which would tend to controvert the relevance of the requested information. The clear message from an overwhelming body of judicial authority has been ignored, rather than challenged or distinguished. At least one defense collides directly with the teachings of the Supreme Court. Thus, it is asserted on behalf of Respondent that the instant complaint can have no merit "absent some indication that the purpose for the leases was to avoid the Anthracite Wage Agreement." Under this contention the Charging Party would have to substantiate, and the Board and courts affirm, a violation of the contract as a prerequisite to disclosure. Respondent cites neither authority nor line of reasoning which would tend to support such a requirement. Indeed, this is a view which has been discredited by empirical authority. In NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 435, 437–438 (1967), the Supreme Court made it clear that the duty to furnish requested information was an obligation which stood "in aid of the arbitral process." As such, it was enforced "to enable [a] union to evaluate intelligently grievances," in order that it might make an "intelligent appraisal of its right to grieve" and, thus, to "sift out unmeritorious claims." Hence, an employer is precluded from withholding relevant information so as to require a union to proceed with a grievance under conditions amounting to no more than "a game of blind man's bluff." 385 U.S. at 438 fn. 8. See also J. I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 253 F.2d 159, 155 (7th Cir. 1958). Accordingly, "it is not the Board's function in this type case to pass on the merits of the Union's claim that Respondent breached the collective bargaining agreement or has committed an unfair labor practice." NLRB v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969).

Equally untenable is Respondent's contention that the Charging Party's entitlement is influenced adversely by distinction between the work performed by Respondent and its lessees. Even if one were to accept Respondent's representation that the lessees are engaged in deep mining, while it participates exclusively in stripping, this would merely establish that Respondent has made a business judgment that it would not acquire the needed equipment, technology, and personnel to itself develope the capacity to engage in work performed by its lessees. Though Respondent was forewarned at the hearing by my ruling that any such operational difference was irrelevant, the issue was again raised in the posthearing brief without articulation as to just how, under the law, this would make a difference. On the other hand, unmistakable evidence reveals that Respondent was signatory to a multiemployer collective-bargaining agreement which "covers the wages and conditions of employment in the Anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania,"[14] and which also provided that "the production, preparation, processing and cleaning of coal from deep mine operations, strip operations . . . shall be performed by classified Employees of the Employer covered by and in accordance with the terms of this agreement."[15] In addition, Respondent, by virtue of article 2, section (g), affirmed that its "Agreement covers the operation of all the coal lands owned or held under lease by [it] . . . or by any subsidiary or affiliate." At a minimum, it is the work that Respondent guaranteed the Union through contract, rather than the nature of its own operations, that is determinative. Here again, Respondent's position is in defiance of clear holdings that employers may not subvert contractually defined work jurisdiction by channeling even part thereof to a nominally separate entity which, as a matter of substance, constitutes no more than a "disguised continuance." NLRB v. Scott Printing Co., supra; Fugazy Continental Corp. v. NLRB, supra; South Prairie Construction Co. v. Operating Engineers, supra; NLRB v. Al Bryant Inc., supra.

The final defense offered by Respondent is founded upon Section 8(e) of the Act. That issue was first raised at the hearing after all evidence had been submitted, when then counsel for Respondent represented that from a "reading of the complaint, the Reading Anthracite Company was not alerted to the contractual provision in which [the Union] . . . were [sic] relying . . . for their entitlement to the information that they had requested." On that basis, the answer to the complaint was amended to include as an affirmative defense that article 2, subsection (g), embodied "a secondary purpose . . . and that it served no legitimate union function so far as the preservation of work is concerned because it only deals . . . [with] benefits that go to employees of independent miners and to the lessees; no benefit to the Union whatsoever." A motion to dismiss the complaint on that ground was denied. That ruling is hereby reaffirmed.

In this regard, the information requested herein was based upon separate contractual obligations and possible grievable violations, the first pertaining to the 1939 resolution and relating exclusively to the proviso thereof that "when any operator proposes to lease a . . . mine or parcels of coal land . . . before such lease is executed, he shall notify the president of the District of the United Mine Workers of America in which the property is located." Unlike article 2, section (g), Respondent, at no time during the course of the hearing, asserted that this resolution was within its 8(e) contention. Furthermore, in now raising that issue, Respondent seeks to side step the literal terms of the Union's letter of May 2, and belatedly to substitute a version of the facts more to its suiting. For there is no indication in the testimony which directly or indirectly would tend to support the notion that the Union's request was addressed to any other obligation incurred by Respondent under that resolution. Nonetheless, Respondent imputes an 8(e) objective to language in the resolution which requires a lessor's cooperation with the president of the Union in establishing contact with the proposed lessee and to "render reasonable assistance to the Mine Workers and lessee to have operations under such leases carried on in accordance with the terms and provisions of the wage agreement." As indicated, here, the Union is not shown to have ever requested or to have charged Respondent with a failure to provide any such assistance, or to have requested information in connection therewith. Thus, on the facts, the claim of secondary objective is without foundation. See National Cleaning Co., 265 NLRB 1352 fn. 14 (1982), enfd. 723 F.2d 746 (9th Cir. 1983). Moreover, were it necessary to reach the issue, I would find Respondent guilty of absolute error in representing that "the award of the Anthracite coal Strike Commission . . . states that coal lands may be leased only where the lessees agree to abide by the UMWA agreement." See Respondent's posthearing brief, page 6. This is a misstatement of the contract terms. The "assistance" arrangement does not state nor embody, directly or indirectly, a "cease doing business objective" within the ambit of Section 8(e). See, e.g., Harris Truck & Trailer Sales, 224 NLRB 100 (1976); Lone Star Steel Co. v. NLRB, 639 F.2d 545 (10th Cir. 1980). It fails to include the language of "boycott" and neither imposes "onerous conditions," nor limits the signatory employer's right to contract with unorganized operators or those who fail to abide by the terms and conditions of employment enjoyed by those working under union contract. See, e.g., Masters, Mates, & Pilots (Seatrain Lines), 220 NLRB 164 fn. 2 (1975). Moreover, the statement on behalf of Respondent that the assistance provision "is in substance precisely the same as the language struck down by the Board in Amax Coal, "is a materially false portrayal of what was involved in that case and fails to grasp the important distinction between the "assistance clause" and that in Amax and other cases involving 8(e) violations. Thus, the cases cited by Respondent including Mine Workers Local 1854 (Amax Coal), 238 NLRB 153 (1978), enfd. 614 F.2d 872 (3d Cir. 1980), revd. on other grounds 354 U.S. 322 (1981); Teamsters Local 94 (California Dump Truck Owners), 227 NLRB 269 (1976), and Electrical Workers IBEW Local 437 (Dimeo Construction), 180 NLRB 420 (1969), all involved clauses which on their face denied the employer discretion as to whom it would do business with, precluding business relationships with those who "do not have union contracts or employ union members" (238 NLRB at 626), or who do not pay the precise wages and benefits enjoyed by members of the bargaining unit (227 NLRB at 273).

Beyond the "resolution" and the obligation to notify embodied therein, article (2), section (g), of the current agreement and language thereof precluding signatory employers from leasing coal lands "for the purpose of avoiding the application of this agreement" is the only other clause directly involved in the Union's request. As was true of its attack upon the 1939 resolution, Respondent also attempts to set up a "strawman" in order to perfect its 8(e) claim with respect to article 2(g). Thus, in addition to the segment invoked herein by the Union, article 2, section (g), also includes the following:

> Where coal lands of a signatory operator or a signatory company are leased, the signatory operator or signatory company shall be responsible for defaulted wages or earnings of miners of the lessee and independent coal operators.

Here again, Respondent fails to point to any evidence, having the remotest tendency to suggest that the Union's May or September requests, or the surrounding circumstances, are indicative of an interest held by the Union in obtaining information in support of a charge that Respondent had violated the default language or in exploring any such possibility.[16] Nor does it appear that Respondent would be possessed of data bearing upon the "wages and earnings" paid by lessees. On the other hand, clear evidence discloses that under article 2, section (g), the information sought in the instant case, on its face, was addressed to the possible diversion of unit work to an alter ego which might perform under standards undercutting those in the primary work unit. The default clause is collateral to and has no bearing upon the Union's right to enforce another, legally separable obligation regulating the use of a lease as a means of avoiding the collective-bargaining agreement. Not a scintilla of evidence has been offered to suggest that this latter restriction constitutes anything other than a legitimate effort to preserve the work of employees of signatory employers as that work is defined in article 2, section (a), of the agreement.[17] Respondent in its posthearing brief [16] Even if the default language were germane to the instant proceeding, evidence has not been developed to show that it was intended to apply, or had been applied, to lessees, who in their own right, were nonsignatories whose employees were not within the primary work unit. See, e.g., Teamsters Local 982 (Barker Trucking), 181 NLRB 515, 520 (1970), wherein it was stated: "As the . . . clauses are not clearly unlawful on thier face, we will interpret them to require not more than what is allowed by law." Consistent therewith, the instant default provision would be perfectly legitimate for purposes of Sec. 8(e) if intended to apply only to lessees whose employees were part of the primary work unit, National Woodwork Mfrs. Assn. v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612 (1967), including those lessees which constitute an alter ego of Respondent.

[17] It is argued on behalf of the defense that since the lands mined under the leases involved methods and equipment distinct from the technique used by Respondent, the Union's request under art. 2, sec. (g), could not have carried a work preservation objective. However, under settled authority, it is work performed in the "bargaining unit" that controls the "issue of primary versus secondary activity." Teamsters Local 710 v. NLRB, 335 F.2d 709 (D.C. Cir. 1964). Here the appropriate unit was multiemployer in scope and the contract expressly defined the work thereof as including both "deep" and "strip" mining. See art. 2, sec. (a). In such circumstances, the employer's business judgment as to its own method of operation, affecting as it does, only a segment of the overall bargaining unit, is irrelevant. See National Woodwork Mfrs. Assn. v. NLRB, supra, where the legitimacy of a boycott was upheld despite the absence of a showing that the signatory employer, a general contractor in the construction industry, had ever engaged in the offsite manufacture of preset, prefitted doors. Cf. Teamsters Local 216 (Bigge Drayage), 198 NLRB 1046, 1047 (1972), where none of the employees in the multiemployer unit had ever performed the disputed work.

cites Mine Workers Local 1854 (Amax Coal), 238 NLRB 1583 (1978). It neglects to mention, however, the specific finding in that case addressed to a contract term having identical substantive content to the instant leasing restriction. Thus, at 1625, it was stated as follows:

> The first paragraph is addressed only to the actions of the signatory employer and the interests of the unit employees. It secures an agreement that the signatory employer will not transfer coal lands by lease, sublease, or license where "the purpose thereof is to avoid the application of this Agreement." On its face the first paragraph is designed to prevent the erosion of the contract bargaining unit by a series of licensing of leasing agreements, and, as such, it "is addressed to the labor relations of the contracting employer vis-a-vis his own employees" . . . hence it is not proscribed by Section 8(e) of the Act.

My ruling, made at the hearing, that the relevant provision of article 2, section (g), involved a legitimate arrangement designed to protect the work of represented employees in the primary work unit derives direct support from the foregoing holding and is reaffirmed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Reading Anthracite Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. United Mine Workers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. By failing and refusing to provide the Union with relevant information requested by the Union through its letters of May 2 and September 23, 1983, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.
4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act it shall be ordered to cease and deist from engaging in such conduct in the future and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As it has been concluded that Respondent has refused to provide relevant information, requested by the Union to assure compliance with provisions of a subsisting collective-bargaining agreement, it shall be recommended that Respondent be ordered to furnish the Union said information.

On the face of this entire proceeding, a question also exists as to whether the defenses raised were so baseless and lacking in merit as to warrant extraordinary relief. It is true that there is no licensing authority that imposes performance standards upon those who plead causes under this Act. At the same time, however, extraordinary relief is available to protect the Board and the courts from trifling, baseless litigation. In NLRB v. Tiidee Products, 426 F.2d 1243 (D.C. Cir. 1970), the Board was sharply criticized for failing to devise a remedy which would deal effectively with employers whose violation of the duty to bargain, on the face of clear evidence, is nondebatable. The court stated as follows:

> [I]mportant considerations of judicial administration are involved. Simply put, the present posture of the Board encourages frivolous litigation not only before the Board, but in the reviewing courts. The case and hand is in point. The position of the Company is palpably without merit with respect to its refusal to bargain. Yet it profited through the delay that review entails; all during this litigation it has not had to bargain collectively over wages and other financial aspects of employment.
> The courts, then, are doubly concerned when Board inadequacies drain and divert judicial resources from the provision of justice to the crowded calendars and to meritorious litigants whose claims clamor for attention. The same considerations are presumably applicable at the administrative level. [426 F.2d at 1249–50.]

In accordance therewith the Board subsequently fashioned a remedy tailored to discourage needless litigation as follows:

> We find merit, however, in the Union's request that it be reimbursed for certain litigation costs and expenses. Normally as the Board recently noted, litigation expenses are not recoverable by the charging party in Board proceedings even though the public interest is served when the charging party protects its private interests before the Board.
> We agree with the court, however, that frivolous litigation such as this is clearly unwarranted and should be kept from the nation's already crowded court dockets, as well as our own. While we do not seek to foreclose access to the Board and courts for meritorious cases, we likewise do not want to encourage frivolous proceedings. The policy of the Act to insure industrial peace through collective bargaining can only be effectuated when speedy access to uncrowded Board and court dockets is available. Accordingly, in order to discourage future frivolous litigation, to effectuate the policies of the Act, and to serve the public interest we find that it would be just and proper to order Respondent to reimburse the Board and the union for their expenses incurred in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of these cases, including the following costs and expenses incurred in both the Board and court proceedings: Reasonable counsel fees, salaries, witness fees, transcript and record cost, printing cost, travel expenses and per diem, and other reasonable costs and expenses." [Tiidee Products, 194 NLRB 1234, 1236–37 (1974).]

With this policy in mind, it is noted that in this case there is no material dispute of fact. The Charging Party on May 2, 1983, made a detailed request for information, expressly pointing out that any questions or need for clarification would be provided to the Employer upon demand. Respondent ignored the request, forcing the Union to invoke the Board's jurisdiction. In justification of its position Respondent has offered defenses and a line of reasoning authoritatively discredited by longstanding precedent. Clearly pertinent and unambiguous policy emanating from the Supreme Court has been knowingly overlooked,[18] and no effort is made to distinguish a court decision which appears to be dispositive at least as to the Union's prima facie entitlement to the information.[19] Moreover, not a single, legally competent, fact is offered to refute the complaint's allegation of relevance. Indeed, Respondent's factual position includes mischaracterizations, some of which heretofore have been discussed and misstatement as to rulings made by me, which in the circumstances cannot be lightly dismissed as attributable to careless zeal.[20]

Finally, in what can only be taken as a transparent and baseless attempt to divert attention from the merits and to format delay, Respondent seeks to make me the center of controversy though a prejorative laden, otherwise vacuous assault upon his basic fitness and integrity. Respondent's propensity to portray falsely the record facts in this respect continues and has been documented by a report, prepared by me and incorporated herein as Administrative Law Judge's Exhibit 3. The effort to discredit the judge is a ploy so meretricious and lacking in substance as to warrant a strong recommendation that appropriate disciplinary action be taken pursuant to the rules governing practice before the Board.

For these reasons, and as the various defenses interposed by the Respondent merge within that class of frivolous posturing condemned in Tiidee, supra, extraordinary relief, in the form of litigation costs to the Board and Charging Party, is deemed appropriate redress herein. See also Koval Press, 241 NLRB 1261, 1263-64 (1980), enfd. 106 LRRM 2603 (3d Cir. May 27, 1980, unpublished). In so recommending, it is my considered judgment that in order to create delay herein, "the offending party has intentionally used defenses meritless on their face in a clear attempt to burden the processes of the Board and the courts." Admiral Merchants Motor Freight, 265 NLRB 134 (1982); see also NLRB v. Daniel Construction Co., 732 F.2d 139 (1st Cir. 1984), enfg. 257 NLRB 1276 (1981). Accordingly, it shall be recommended that Respondent be ordered to compensate the Board and Charging Party for reasonable counsel fees, salaries, witness fees, transcript, and all record costs, printing costs, travel expenses, and per diem, and other reasonable costs and expenses dervived from maintenance of this action, including interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[18] Respondent's contentions on the issue of "relevance" cannot be reconciled with (1) the "liberal discovery-type standard" and (2) "the blind man's bluff" analogy adopted by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra. Respondent continues to maintain these positions as if the Court's pronouncements did not exist. This, despite the fact that the aforesaid decision and both concepts were mentioned prominently in NLRB v. Leonard B. Hebert, Jr. & Co., supra, a case cited by the Respondent.

[19] NLRB v. Leonard B. Hebert, Jr. & Co., supra, which, as indicated, was cited by Respondent for purposes other than its holding.

[20] The Respondent at p. 7 of its brief states that "The ALJ . . . acknowledged that if the work being done under the coal lease is no normally performed by Reading Anthracite's employees, then there would be not work preservation purpose incorporated in Article 2, Section (g)." Just how anyone acquainted with this proceeding could honestly and in good faith make such an interpretation of any comment made by me is incomprehensible. At several points in the hearing, including distinct segments quoted by Respondent in this regard in charging me with bias, it was consistently ruled from the bench that it was the work assigned to the multiemployer bargaining unit by the contract rather than that actually performed by Respondent that was controlling.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 26 August 1981 Administrative Law Judge James T. Youngblood issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a memorandum in support thereof, the Charging Party Union filed exceptions and a brief in support thereof, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the decision and also filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's and the Union's exceptions and a memorandum in support thereof.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, briefs, and memoranda and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] In agreeing with the judge's decision to dismiss the complaint herein because no violation was made out under the precedent of Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972), we note that the Board, while overruling Telautograph in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), decided to apply Dresser prospectively only, and therefore would not find unlawful actions taken pursuant to the applicable law at the time of the action, i.e., while Telautograph was the law. In finding no violation here, we do not necessarily agree with all of the statements made by the judge with respect to the parameters of Telautograph. We also note the unusual factual matrix presented here, and specifically note the lack of any pending grievance or the existence of a current or recently expired contract.

Chairman Dotson and Member Dennis, who agree that Dresser was prospective only and therefore would not apply to the instant case, find it unnecessary to intimate any views regarding the issues presented in Dresser.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES T. YOUNGBLOOD, Administrative Law Judge. The complaint which issued on October 16, 1980, alleges that since about May 20, 1980, Hennessy Products, Inc. (the Respondent or the Employer) has failed and refused to furnish International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 992 (the Union) with certain necessary and relevant information requested by the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. The Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices. This matter was heard by me on May 20, 1981, in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania. All parties were represented at the hearing and following the hearing the Respondent and the General Counsel filed briefs which have been duly considered.[1]

On the entire record in this matter, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, and after due consideration of the briefs filed, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, with its office and place of business in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of railroad speciality equipment and vending machines and related products. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On October 11, 1978, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees.[2] Between December 1978 and October 1979,[3] the Union and the Respondent unsuccessfully attempted to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement. On April 23, 81 of 119 unit employees went out on a union authorized strike. The strike continued until October 27. The remaining 38 unit employees crossed the picket line and continued to work throughout all or part of the strike. During the

[1] To its brief the Respondent attached the affidavit of James B. Nicklas, vice president of the Respondent, and two pieces of union literature soliciting employees to sign union authorization cards and a copy of a union authorization card. In the affidavit Nicklas states that on the afternoon of June 4, 1981, after the hearing in this matter he witnessed organizers of the Union distributing this literature at the Respondent's premises. The General Counsel filed a motion to strike that portion of the Respondent's brief which made reference to the above material. The Respondent filed an opposition to the General Counsel's motion. Whether or not the Union was soliciting employees to join the Union, or to sign authorization cards, after the hearing in this matter, to me, is totally irrelevant and immaterial to the issues in this proceeding. In any event no consideration was given to this material in this decision. Additionally, on June 29, 1981, the Charging Party filed a motion to reopen the record so that the transcript and exhibits in a prior proceeding between the same parties could be incorporated into the present record. That case was settled on May 15, 1980, by an informal settlement agreement, a copy of which is in this record. As the issues involved in that proceeding have no bearing on the issues in this proceeding, I see no reason to reopen the record. Accordingly, the Charging Party's motion to reopen the record is denied.

[2] The appropriate unit is described as follows:

All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees of Hennessy Products, Inc. employed at its plant located in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, including group leaders and shipping and receiving clerks; excluding all co-op students and summer help and other temporary employees, office clerical employees and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] Unless otherwise specified all dates refer to 1979.

course of the strike, the Respondent hired 64 permanent replacements. It also appears that, during the course of the strike, at least 11 striking employees returned to work. During the strike, the Respondent had group meetings with all of the employees at least once a week. James Hennessy, the Respondent's president, on more than one occasion, informed the assembled nonstriking employees that they could get rid of the Union after 1 year from the date of the certification.[4] On October 23, one of the strike replacements, Ralph G. Fries, filed a decertification petition in Case 6-RD-693.

By letter dated October 25, the Respondent's counsel John G. Kruchko advised the Union that the Employer had been notified that its employees had filed a decertification petition and that "consistent with Board policy, the Company is hereby suspending negotiations pending the outcome of this election."

By letter dated October 26,[5] the Union notified the Employer that it accepted "the contract proposal" and made an unconditional offer to return to work on behalf of all of the striking employees. On October 27, the picketing ceased and each of the striking employees made an individual and unconditional request to return to work.

By letter dated October 30, the Respondent's counsel acknowledged receipt of the Union's October 26 letter, and indicated that there was no proposal outstanding which could be agreed to at that time, and reiterated its refusal to negotiate pending the outcome of the decertification petition. He emphasized that the Company was not withdrawing recognition, but rather only refusing to bargain while the RD petition was pending. The letter also informed the Union that the Company would recall striking employees on a nondiscriminatory basis, as job openings become available.

A few strikers were reinstated immediately and on November 7 the Respondent informed striker James Mongold that he was being denied reinstatement because of picket line misconduct. The remaining unreinstated strikers were informed that they had been permanently replaced and would be recalled when jobs became available.

On November 14, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating or refusing to reinstate Mongold. The decertification petition was held in abeyance pending the resolution of that charge. Following a complaint and hearing in that matter on May 15 the parties entered into an informal settlement agreement in which Mongold waived reinstatement.

By letter dated May 29, 1980, the Union requested that the Respondent forward the following information:

> 1. The names and addresses of the present employees in the bargaining unit and their date of employment. In listing the employees, please indicate their work classification and wage rate.
> 2. The names and addresses of any employees hired since October 20, 1979, and include the date hired, the classification of work, and the wage rate.
> 3. Indicate when you intend to recall the laid off striking employees.
> 4. State whether there are any laid off striking employees whom you do not intend to recall. We raise the issue because at the NLRB hearing there was an unstated implication that there may be employees who will be refused employment. The Union's position is that you are obligated to reinstate all of the laid off employees and this position is supported by all of your conduct to date including, but not limited to, your letters. If you are attempting to deprive any laid off employee of employment, we should like to be advised of the specific factual basis for your position.

On receipt of the Union's request for the above information, James Nicklas, the Respondent's vice president, who is also in charge of labor relations for the Respondent, made the decision for the Respondent not to respond to the Union's letter. As of the date of the hearing in this matter, the Respondent had not responded to the Union's request for information and had not communicated to the Union that the Respondent had withdrawn recognition of the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees.

The complaint alleges that the information requested by the Union on May 29, 1980, was necessary for, and relevant to, the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and as the Respondent has failed and refused to furnish the requested information, the Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

At the hearing the General Counsel and the Respondent entered into a stipulation setting forth the above facts, and the General Counsel, relying on a presumption of continued majority status and a presumption of relevance of the requested information, offered no further evidence and rested his case in chief on the complaint, answer, stipulation, exhibits, and the presumptions as stated above.

The Respondent contends that, because of the pendency of the decertification petition, it has no duty to bargain with the Union and therefore had no duty to supply the requested information to the Union pending that decertification petition; and that the General Counsel must establish by testimony or other evidence, the relevance of the requested information. In any event it has a good-faith doubt that the Union continues to represent a majority of the bargaining unit employees.

Discussion and Conclusion

The Respondent relies on the Board's decision in Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972), in support of its general proposition that it had no duty to meet and bargain with the Union, and therefore it had no duty to supply the Union with any information, which might otherwise have been necessary and relevant to the bar-

[4] This appeared to be in response to employee questions.

[5] This letter was hand delivered by Harrison L. Lushbaugh, secretary-treasurer of the Union, to James Nicklas, the Respondent's vice president of manufacturing on October 26.

gaining process. In Telautograph the employer and the union had a contractual relationship for many years, and their last contract covered the period November 3, 1969, through November 2, 1970. On September 3, 1970, an employee filed an RD petition. The Board's Regional Director concluded that the decertification petition was timely filed and raised a question concerning representation, and directed an election by secret ballot. On October 16, 1970, while the decertification petition was pending, the union requested the company to meet and discuss changes and modifications in the current agreement. On November 4, 1970, the company replied that it would be inappropriate to meet due to some questions regarding representation of the unit. On November 9, 1970, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge, alleging that the company had refused to bargain. Thereafter, under the Board's usual practice involving a blocking charge, the election was held in abeyance and the Regional Director issued a refusal-to-bargain complaint. The administrative law judge (relying on the facts that the Regional Director had concluded that the decertification petition was timely, and raised a question concerning representation; the absence of any unfair labor practices or antiunion activity to render improper, or in any way taint, the atmosphere for an election; that the respondent company in no way assisted or participated in the filing of the decertification petition) concluded that such circumstances, independent of any objective considerations of good-faith doubt concerning the union's continued majority, foreclosed the company from dealing with the union on and after November 4, 1970, the date on which respondent suspended negotiations. The Board agreed.

In the instant case, the Union was certified on October 11, 1978. Between December 1978 and October, the Union and the Respondent unsuccessfully attempted to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement. On April 23, the Union authorized a strike which lasted until October 27. On October 22, after the expiration of the certification year, one of the striker replacements filed a decertification petition. By letter dated October 25, the Respondent informed the Union that it had been notified of the decertification petition filed with the National Labor Relations Board and, consistent with Board policy, it was suspending negotiations pending outcome of the election. On October 26, the Union hand delivered a letter to the Respondent accepting its last contract proposal. This letter also made an unconditional offer on behalf of all striking employees to return to work. The picketing ceased on October 27 with each of the striking employees making an individual request to return to work. On October 30, the Respondent sent a second letter to the Union reiterating that because of the decertification petition the Company would continue to refuse to bargain with the Union during the pendency of that petition, and further stating that the Company was not completely withdrawing recognition but rather was only refusing to bargain while the decertification petition was pending. The Respondent further informed the Union that striking employees would be recalled on a nondiscriminatory basis as job openings become available.

By letter dated November 7, the Respondent informed striking employee James Mongold that his request for reinstatement was denied because of picket line misconduct. On November 14, the Union filed a charge in Case 6–CA–12915 alleging that the Respondent violated, inter alia, Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating James Mongold. The decertification petition in Case 6–RD–693 was held in abeyance pending resolution of the charge in Case 6–CA–12915. On January 16, 1980, a complaint issued in Case 6–CA–12915 alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating James Mongold. On May 6, 1980, a hearing opened in that case and on May 15, 1980, the parties entered into an informal settlement agreement in Case 6–CA–12915. On May 29, 1980, the Union requested that the Respondent supply the information, as set forth above, and the Respondent failed to respond in any manner to the Union's request for information. By letter dated July 17, 1980, the Regional Office notified the parties that the decertification petition in Case 6–RD–693 was being held in abeyance pending resolution of the instant Case 6–CA–13640.[6]

On October 22 and on May 29, 1980, no charges were pending against the Respondent in Region 6 of the National Labor Relations Board and, so far as this record reflects, the settlement agreement in Case 6–CA–12915 was fully complied with by the Respondent.

As indicated above, at the time of the filing of the decertification petition on October 22, there were no unfair labor practice charges pending against this Employer, and it appears that none had been filed against this Employer from the date of the certification until November. In November, the Union filed the charge in Case 6–CA–12915 alleging, in addition to the 8(a)(1) and (3) violation involving James Mongold, that there was employer involvement in the filing of the RD petition. By letter dated December 19, the Acting Regional Director for Region 6 advised the Union that:

> With respect to the alleged instigation of the decertification petition by the Employer, the investigation reveals that no evidence of any involvement by the Employer in the filing of the petition. To the contrary, it appears that the petition was initiated by the employees without any assistance from the Employer. I am, therefore refusing to issue complaint on this aspect of the charge.

It would appear that from this letter the Region found no evidence to indicate employer interference in the filing of the RD petition. Other than the fact that the Employer informed the employees that they could file a decertification petition after 1 year, there is nothing in [6] On October 31, 1979, a complaint issued against the Union in Cases 6–CB–4835, 6–CB–4850–1, 6–CB–4850–2, and Case 6–CB–4851. On April 9, 1980, the General Counsel approved a stipulation entered into by the parties in these cases submitting the matter to the Board for issuance of a Decision and Order. On May 21, 1980, the Board issued a Decision and Order and on September 9, 1980, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit issued a judgment, enforcing the Board's Decision and Order.

this record to indicate that the Employer in any way initiated the filing of the RD petition.

Therefore, it is my conclusion that the RD petition, which was timely filed, adequately raises a question concerning representation, and precludes the Employer from bargaining with the Union until the question concerning representation is settled. I agree that the filing of the decertification petition in itself does not justify withdrawal of recognition, but it does relieve the Company of its obligation to bargain with the Union and, in fact, forecloses the Employer from dealing with the Union, pending resolution of the petition. Other than the current charge there is no evidence that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices or antiunion activity to render improper or in any way taint the atmosphere for an election. It in no way assisted or participated in the filing of the decertification petition or otherwise sought to dissipate the Union's majority status. Therefore, it is my conclusion that, at the time of the filing of the decertification petition, the Employer was under a duty to suspend its bargaining negotiations with the Union pending the outcome of the RD petition. And it is my conclusion that the Employer did not violate Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to bargain with the Union during the pendency of the decertification petition or by suspending negotiations pending resolution of that petition. Here there was no contract or grievance procedure to administer and, therefore, no reason to bargain with the Union pending the decertification petition outcome.

Under these circumstances, it would appear to me that, having no duty to bargain with the Union, the Employer would have no duty to disclose any information which might otherwise be relevant to contract negotiations or the institution of grievance and arbitration procedures under contractual arrangements. It seems to me that the duty to furnish a union with information, exists only insofar as there is a duty to bargain with the majority representative. In the absence of a bargaining obligation, and there being no contract to administer, no sound reason exists for compelling an employer to furnish information to a union which might be ousted as the collective-bargaining representative in the pending representation proceeding and therefore would have no entitlement or need for the requested information. It would seem to me that the duty to furnish information stems from the underlying statutory duty imposed on employers to bargain in good faith with respect to mandatory subjects of bargaining and where that duty does not exist or has been suspended any other duty derived from that statutory duty would also be suspended.

In my view, Telautograph makes it clear that when a valid decertification petition is filed, charges based on an employer's refusal to continue negotiations with the incumbent union thereafter, should be promptly dismissed as nonmeretricious, unless the charge contains allegations that the respondent has committed other acts which may be a basis for finding a violation of the Act.

Here there is nothing to prevent the processing of the RD petition except the instant charge. To compel the Employer to furnish the information under the circumstances of this case seems totally inconsistent with the underlying principles in Telautograph, supra; Shea Chemical Corp., 121 NLRB 1027 (1958); and Midwest Piping Co., 63 NLRB 1060 (1945).

Therefore it is my conclusion that the Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act as alleged in the complaint, and I shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.[7]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Hennessy Products, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Teamsters Local Union No. 992 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Hennessy Products, Inc., the Respondent, did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[7] The General Counsel and the Respondent submitted a stipulation dated June 10, 1981, correcting the transcript in certain regards. There being no objection on the part of the Union and as the corrections appear appropriate the record is corrected as set forth in the stipulation.

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Cone Mills Corporation-White Oak Plant and Marie E. Darr. Case 11–CA–7458

22 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 31 December 1979 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs.[1]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The case of employee Marie Darr's discharge was submitted to the judge upon a stipulated record to determine whether deferral to an arbitration award is appropriate under Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955). The arbitrator found that the Respondent did not have "just cause" under its collective-bargaining agreement for discharging Darr but that some discipline was warranted because she had been insubordinate. He ordered that Darr be reinstated, but without backpay. The judge found that deferral is not warranted because the award was clearly repugnant to the Act.[2] We do not agree. We believe that the judge substituted his judgment for that of the arbitrator, ignoring a fundamental tenet of Spielberg—that deferral is appropriate even where the arbitrator reaches a result different from the one the Board might have reached had it considered the case de novo. Contrary to the judge, we shall defer to the arbitration award and dismiss the complaint insofar as it alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Darr.[3]

A review of the facts underlines the appropriateness of deferral here. At the time of her discharge on 4 November 1977, Darr had been employed by the Respondent for 3 years as a frame cleaner. She had been a union steward for almost 2 years, and the arbitrator found that she was "active and aggressive in pursuing her union duties." At the time in question, she had one written warning for leaving her department without permission.

Several days prior to 2 November 1977 Darr, along with other employees, circulated a petition to protest the discharge of three stewards. During this time, the Respondent inaugurated a new break schedule. Darr protested the schedule on the ground that it would interfere with her activities as steward.

On 2 November Darr's supervisor gave her a note with a schedule of the new breaktimes. Later in the shift they met in the supervisor's office to discuss it. When they could not agree, Darr grieved the schedule orally, and arranged to discuss it with the overseer, the next level of supervision.

Later that evening the overseer saw the petition in the employee's canteen. Darr and several other employees were present at the time. He picked it up and took it to his office, despite Darr's repeated requests for its return. She followed him to his office where they had a heated discussion about both the petition and the new break schedule. He denied her grievance about the breaktime.

About 2 hours later Darr returned with employees from the spooler department to seek the return of the petition. Darr had worked through her own breaktime in order to take her break at the time scheduled for the spoolers. When she arrived at the overseer's office, the overseer refused to return the petition. When the employees were leaving, he asked Darr to stay. He told her she had not followed instructions for her break and he asked her to go home and call in the next day. She refused, and returned to her department.

The overseer then called the Company's security officer, who arrived at the overseer's office with two city policemen. The overseer went to Darr at her work station and again asked her to leave. She refused. In the meantime, the security officer talked to the department head and they decided to take no further action at that time. Darr was subsequently discharged for altering her scheduled break without notifying her supervisor and for refusing to leave the plant when instructed to do so.

On these facts, the arbitrator concluded that the Respondent did not have "just cause" for discharging Darr. He found that her discharge for violating the breaktime rule could not be sustained, since

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] In Spielberg the Board set forth the following criteria, all of which must be met before the Board will defer to an arbitration award: (1) the proceedings must be fair and regular; (2) all parties must agree to be bound; and (3) the decision must not be clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. The parties agree that the first two conditions have been met.

[3] There were also two independent allegations of violations of Sec. 8(a)(1); specifically, that the Respondent (1) more strictly enforced the break schedule in order to discourage union and/or protected activity, and (2) interfered with its employees' union and/or protected activities by impeding the circulation of a petition. Based on the arbitrator's findings as set out below, particularly his finding that Darr should have had permission to process a grievance, we adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) as alleged above.

The parties stipulated that the facts the arbitrator recited are the pertinent facts in this case.

under all the circumstances she should have had permission to process her contractual grievance, but that her refusal to leave when instructed "[was] another matter."

> Even though the Overseer's suspension was improper at the time, the Grievant was obligated to leave the plant. She failed to follow a direct order of her Overseer. This misconduct was insubordination under the just cause doctrine in the labor Agreement.

The arbitrator found, however, that this act of insubordination was not sufficient grounds for discharge. Balancing the overseer's misconduct with respect to Darr's protected activities against Darr's misconduct, he found that Darr should be reinstated, but without backpay because

> . . . a sustaining of the discharge in this case would leave employees with no assurances that their agreement would protect them when they engaged in concerted activity. At the same time, an award of back pay would provide supervisors with little assurance that their instructions would be obeyed by employees. This Grievant must recognize and accept managerial authority and use the grievance procedure to resolve private contract disputes.

The judge found that the Respondent's only motive for the discharge was Darr's protected activity, and that therefore the discharge was unlawful.[4] He recommended a complete make-whole remedy because he found that Darr's insubordination was condoned or, in any event, provoked. Because the arbitrator upheld discipline for Darr's insubordination and compromised the backpay, the judge found the award "clearly repugnant."

With regard to the "clearly repugnant" standard in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), we stated that we would not require an arbitrator's award to be totally consistent with Board precedent. Unless the General Counsel sustains his burden of proof that the award is "palpably wrong," i.e., that the arbitrator's decision in not susceptible to an interpretation consistent with the Act, we will defer.

The arbitrator's award here meets this test for deferral. It is well settled that a failure to give a complete make-whole remedy does not render an award clearly repugnant.[5] As the Board stated in Crown Zellerbach Corp., 215 NLRB 385, 387 (1974), in adopting the decision of the administrative law judge:

> Certainly in reaching his decision and issuing an award, an arbitrator may consider the relative merits of the positions of the parties before him and may determine to give a complete award or a partial award, depending on how he assesses the merit of the situation.

That is all the arbitrator did here. He recognized that:

> To maintain an orderly operation, a company's supervisors must have the authority to issue rules and instructions with the expectation that they will be followed by employees, including Union Stewards. At the same time, union representatives must have an opportunity to present grievances and receive prompt answers from supervisors in order to enforce the Labor Agreement. Employees involved in grievance processing must be protected from discriminatory and retaliatory actions designed to discourage their participation in the dispute resolution procedures under the Labor Agreement.

It is the essential nature of the arbitration process to balance the competing claims of the parties by adjusting the equities involved to reach a harmonious result. That is what the parties have agreed upon as an acceptable resolution of their labor-management dispute. We find that the General Counsel has not carried his burden proving that the arbitrator's award is palpably wrong.

Accordingly, we dismiss the complaint with respect to the allegation that the Respondent violated the Act by discharging Marie Darr.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Cone Mills Corporation-White Oak Plant, Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Strictly enforcing its employees' break schedule in order to discourage its employees' union and protected concerted activities.

(b) Interfering with its employees' protected concerted activities by impeding circulation of and confiscating a petition protesting the discharge of fellow employees.

[4] For this finding, he relied on the arbitrator's conclusion in a section entitled "NLRA Issues" that there was no "compelling reason for the discharge other than for union activity." The judge seemed to conclude that this finding was inconsistent with the arbitrator's withholding of backpay because of Darr's insubordination. There is, however, no inconsistency. The arbitrator found no justifiable reason for discharge, but he did find that some discipline was warranted because of Darr's insubordinate refusal to leave.

[5] See, e.g., Combustion Engineering, 272 NLRB 215 (1984), where we deferred to an arbitration award that found that an improperly discharged employee was entitled only to reinstatement, and not backpay, in view of the employee's poor attitude toward improving his attendance.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility in Greensboro, North Carolina, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT strictly enforce our employees' break schedule in order to discourage their union and concerted and protected activities.

WE WILL NOT interfere with our employees' concerted and protected activities by impeding circulation of and confiscating a petition protesting the discharge of fellow employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

CONE MILLS CORPORATION-WHITE OAK PLANT

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was submitted to me, without hearing and upon a stipulated record,[1] to determine whether deferral to an arbitration award is appropriate under Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), where the arbitrator found that the discharge of Charging Party Marie E. Darr was a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, but also found that she was insubordinate under the "just cause doctrine" of the applicable collective-bargaining agreement. As the remedy, the arbitrator ordered that she be reinstated to her job without backpay. The General Counsel claims that, under Spielberg, the relief granted is repugnant to the Act, while the Respondent contends that, because the arbitrator found a dual motive for Darr's discipline, the award should be deferred to. For the reasons set forth, I find that deferral to the award is not warranted and make my findings of facts and conclusions of law consistent with the allegations of the complaint, and order the appropriate remedy of backpay and the posting of a notice.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Cone Mills Corporation (Respondent) is now, and has been at all times material, a North Carolina corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of textile products at various locations. Respondent's White Oak plant, located at Greensboro, North Carolina, is the only plant involved in this proceeding. During the past 12 months, which period is representative of all times material, Respondent received raw materials at its White Oak plant from points directly outside the State of North Carolina valued in excess of $50,000. During the same period, Respondent, from its White Oak plant, shipped directly to points outside the State of North Carolina finished products valued in excess of $50,000. As a result, I find, as the parties have stipulated, that Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

I also find, as the parties have stipulated, that Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, Local 391 (Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts[2]

Darr was hired by the Respondent on September 30, 1974. On June 14, 1977,[3] she received a written warning

[1] The parties' stipulation to dispense with oral testimony adduced at a hearing is approved.

[2] Pursuant to the parties' stipulation, the facts recited by the arbitrator are the pertinent facts in this case. My recitation is almost a quotation of the arbitrator's findings, interpolating names and certain minor clarifications, where necessary and as agreed by the parties.

for leaving her department without permission. When she was terminated on November 4, she was a frame cleaner in the spinning department on the third shift. Her job involved rotating through a designated area cleaning spinning frames, heads, and the like. In December 1975, Darr was elected to one of 8–10 union steward positions in Respondent's plant. Prior to November 1, Darr pursued her union activities and responsibilities at her discretion during her shift and was active and aggressive in pursuing her union activities.

During the several weeks prior to November 2, three union shop stewards were discharged by the Respondent and Darr was aware of them. Two were the subject of complaints issued by the National Labor Relations Board. Several days prior to November 2, Darr, along with other employees, began to circulate a petition among employees to protest these discharges. Supervisor Lonnie Walker, the Respondent's overseer on the third shift, who had been assigned to the third shift in the spinning department for 2–3 weeks prior to Darr's discharge, learned of this petition activity and reported it to his department head, Supervisor LeRoy Drinkwater. On Tuesday morning, November 1, Drinkwater instructed Walker to pick up the petition if he saw it.

On the prior Friday, October 28, Darr was informed by her substitute supervisor, Elmer Dickerson, that frame cleaners were going to be required to take their breaks at the scheduled hours of 12:30 to 12:45 a.m., 2:30 to 2:50 a.m., and 4:45 to 5 a.m. Darr protested this break schedule on the grounds that it limited her ability to perform her duties as a union steward. She did not follow the break schedule on her shifts which began on Sunday and Monday, October 30 and 31, and the schedule was not enforced by Dickerson. Although the new break schedule applied to approximately 70 employees in various job classifications throughout the plant, there was no proof that Darr was informed of the general applicability of the new schedule at the time it was adopted.

Darr's regular supervisor, Maurice Willis, returned to work on Tuesday, November 1. About 11 p.m. the beginning of the third shift, Willis gave Darr a note with the new scheduled break times on it. Darr asked, "When did this happen?", to which Willis replied, "I'll get back to you later." Darr then proceeded to her job.

About 11:30 p.m., Willis met Darr, and they went to his office to discuss the break schedule, where they discussed the effect of the schedule on her duties as a shop steward. Willis indicated that grievances must be filed during scheduled breaktimes, but did not state that Darr would be given permission to leave her job at other times for union business. At this meeting a verbal grievance was made, and they agreed it should be taken up with Walker. Darr then returned to her job.

About an hour later, at 12:30 a.m., Walker walked into the canteen and found on a table the petition that he had been instructed to pick up if he saw it. The petition, a handwritten document, stated:

> Andria Brewer was fired on a false charge of refusing to be transferred to a spooling job. She did not refuse! The only thing she refused to do was let these supervisors push her around.
> We, the undersigned, demand that she along with the other two shop stewards who were fired be reinstated with back pay, Christine O'Flaherty in the Weave Room and Thomas Anderson in the Dye House.

The petition was signed by 33 employees—Darr's signature was number one and the petition appeared to be in her handwriting. Walker identified the document as the one he was to pick up and took it with him.

Darr and several other employees were in the canteen when this happened. She repeatedly asked Walker to return the petition, but Walker refused. Darr followed Walker to his office and again asked that the petition be returned, but Walker stated that it would not be returned. While there, Darr also complained about the new break schedule. There followed a discussion, the contents of which Darr and Walker were in considerable conflict—a conflict left almost wholly unresolved by the arbitrator. Darr testified that Walker had stated that she did not have time to file a grievance before her break was ended and that she could file grievances only when she and other employees were on their breaks. Walker testified that he had denied the break schedule grievance and informed Darr that she had to check with her supervisor about union activity time. He also testified that Darr had said: "I think the assignment of break schedule is unreasonable, absurd, and we won't follow it." At the conclusion of this discussion, Darr returned to her job about 12:45 a.m.

Following this meeting, Darr and several spooler employees decided to return to Walker to recover their petition. Because the break of the spooler employees began at 3 a.m., Darr decided to work past her 2:30 a.m. scheduled breaktime. At 2:45 a.m., Darr went to the restroom and then met the spooler employees about 3 a.m. They arrived at Walker's office about 5 minutes later and again requested and argued for the return of their petition. Once again, Walker refused; and, as the employees were leaving, Walker requested that Darr remain there. Walker told her that she had not followed her scheduled breaktime and that he believed her conduct involved a flagrant failure to follow instructions pertaining to her assigned break schedule. Walker then suspended Darr and instructed her to go home and call Department Head Drinkwater the following day. Darr refused and returned to her job. Walker noted on his records, "This is clearly insubordination and I do not want any other charge."

Walker then instructed Willis to keep an eye on Darr and called the Respondent's security officer, who sometime later appeared with two city police officers. Walker went to Darr and requested that she leave the plant, advising her that the security officer and policemen were waiting in his office. Darr refused. In the meantime, however, the security officer had consulted with Drinkwater and they decided to leave Darr alone. Later, Darr was observed returning to her job 5 minutes late from her 4:45 a.m. scheduled break. Darr finished her shift at 6:30 and left the plant.

On Friday, November 4, Darr met with Drinkwater, who reviewed the events of November 2. He emphasized that Darr had altered her scheduled break without notifying her supervisor and that she had refused to leave the plant when instructed to do so by her overseer. Darr was then informed that she was being discharged. During the meeting, Darr stated that the Respondent's rules were violated when she was not removed from the plant. Drinkwater replied that: (1) there had been no disorderly conduct; (2) Darr returned to her job without any further incidents; (3) Darr remained on her job performing her job duties and did not associate with any groups nor attempt to disrupt the operation; and (4) Darr was suspended and not discharged.

B. The Arbitrator's Award

The arbitrator considered separately the Respondent's claim that Darr was discharged for insubordination and the Union's claim that Darr was discharged for her union activities and found that both were correct. In so doing, he recognized that:

> To maintain an orderly operation, a company's supervisors must have the authority to issue rules and instructions with the expectation that they will be followed by employees, including Union Stewards. At the same time, union representatives must have an opportunity to present grievances and receive prompt answers from supervisors in order to enforce the Labor Agreement. Employees involved in grievance processing must be protected from discriminatory and retaliatory actions designed to discourage their participation in the dispute resolution procedures under the Labor Agreement.

With these principles in mind, the arbitrator found that, while the Respondent "had planned and attempted to enforce scheduled break times . . . [it] also set in motion a plan to stifle [Darr] and some thirty-two other employees in their concerted activity to prepare a petition . . . [and that Walker] deprived [Darr] and other employees of the opportunity to engage in this protected activity." Darr believed that Respondent was attempting to curtail her grievance time and her associations with her fellow employees, and Walker's taking of the petition provoked Darr's hostility, and the repeated refusal to return it exacerbated the hostility. Although Darr recognized, and then deviated from, the scheduled breaktime, and stated that the schedule was "absurd" and that she would not follow it, what precipitated her suspension on November 2 were her "efforts to process a complaint under the Labor Agreement and not just a fifteen minute deviation from the scheduled break time." The arbitrator found no evidence that the deviation either interfered with operations or was an inappropriate time for a grievance meeting, which was held at a time when all the spooler employees were on their breaktime, thus avoiding any interruption of services. Darr's failure to seek permission for union activity time was condoned by the arbitrator, since, if she had requested such time, it could not have been unreasonably withheld.

Thus, up to this point, the arbitrator found no just cause for Darr's discharge. However, he held that Darr's failure to leave the plant was "another matter"—that she was obligated to leave the plant and that her failure to follow Willis' order was insubordination. Noting that Walker's conduct and accusations contributed to and provoked Darr's insubordination, the arbitrator refused to sustain the discharge because that "would leave employees with no assurances that their agreement would protect them when they engaged in concerted activity." On the other hand, backpay was not warranted because, if granted, that "would provide supervisors with little assurance that their instructions would be obeyed by employees . . . [Darr] must recognize and accept managerial authority and use the grievance procedure to resolve private contract disputes."

Turning to the alleged violations of the Act, the arbitrator found that Drinkwater's plan to stifle Darr's petition-preparation activities and Walker's implementation of that plan constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1), but that the development and implementation of the new break schedule was for legitimate business reasons. However, the November 2 suspension of Darr for deviating from the break schedule was merely a means to an illegal end. The arbitrator wrote:

> Given the fact the break schedule was not enforced on two prior days, the fact that grievance time was permitted at the plant, and the fact [Walker] did not object to [Darr's] presence at the beginning of the meeting, the reasonable inference is that [Walker's] primary motive for the suspension was [Darr's] vigorous pursuit of grievances and her petition preparation activity. The removal of [Darr] from the plant would have deprived fellow employees of a Shop Steward and discouraged their participation in the union.

Drinkwater then became the "prime mover" in permitting Darr to remain on her job for the remainder of the November 2 shift and informing her of her discharge on November 4, when he condoned Darr's > remaining on the job because she ceased her protected activities. In his notes he referred to the fact that she ceased her "disorderly conduct," "returned to her job without further incident," "did not associate with any groups nor attempt to disrupt the operation." The significant conduct which would precipitate such comments was [Darr's] engaging in protected activities. [Drinkwater] made no attempt to explain his decision in terms of any desire to avoid a possible scene at the plant. Instead, he accepted her refusal to leave the plant because she ceased her union activities. The primary motive and concern of [Drinkwater] in taking the disciplinary actions in this case were [Darr's] concerted union activities. Considering the record in this case, I believe the Union has met its burden of proving that the discharge was a violation of [Section] 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3).

Pursuant to the terms of the award, Darr was reinstated to her former position on October 16, 1978, having been on maternity leave from August 22, 1978, until her reinstatement. She has not received backpay.

C. Discussion and Analysis

Both the arbitrator and the Respondent refer to the discipline of Darr as a "dual-motive case." From that vantage point, Respondent contends that if there were two reasons for disciplining Darr, one valid under its collective-bargaining agreement, and the other in violation of the Act, the award cannot be repugnant to the Act[4] because the reinstatement of Darr without backpay was a remedy for its breach of contract and had nothing to do with the Respondent's violations of the Act. On the other hand, the General Counsel argues that, because the arbitrator found that the Act was violated, a remedy of reinstatement without backpay is not justified under Board law and is per se repugnant to the Act.

It is unnecessary to rule upon the contention of the General Counsel,[5] for I find that under well-established principles of Board law, if a motive for the discipline of an employee is in violation of the Act, that is sufficient for the finding of a violation, despite the fact that there may be other valid reasons for the same discipline Johnson Motor Lines, 228 NLRB 393 (1977).[6] Under any reading of the award, there can be no question that the "primary motive" for the discipline was Darr's concerted and union activities, which were so inextricably intertwined with the alleged insubordination that no punishment of Darr was warranted.

Further, not only may it be said that a motive (again, "primary," according to the arbitrator) was discriminatory, but also a fair reading of his award indicates that the only motive for Darr's discharge was her union and protected activities. Recognizing that the arbitrator wrote in terms of a "dual-motive case" and that he characterized Darr's discharge for protected activities as the "primary motive," thus implying that there was a secondary motive, nonetheless, I note that he stated: "The evidence in this case does not show a compelling reason for the discharge other than for union activity." If this is correct, and the parties' stipulation requires that I be bound by the arbitrator's factual findings, I may go no further to find some other valid reason for Respondent's discipline of Darr.

Assuming, however, that there is some ambiguity in the award, caused by the separate findings on the two issues before the arbitrator—breach of contract and violation of the Act—and the arbitrator's reference to a "dual-motive case," the award finds no other conduct committed by Darr which would merit discipline under the collective-bargaining agreement. Her failure to follow the break schedule on October 30 and 31 was excused because the rule was not enforced. Her violation of the break schedule on November 2 to attend a grievance meeting was excused by the arbitrator on the grounds that (1) the 15-minute deviation did not interfere with Respondent's operations; (2) the time for the grievance meetings was not inappropriate since it coincided with the break of the spooler employees; and (3) Darr would have been entitled to meet for union activities at that time, had she sought permission. Darr's suspension, he held, was thus "improper." Finally, despite the fact that Darr's refusal to leave the plant was "another matter," Willis' "conduct and accusations contributed to and provoked" her insubordination, which was in any event condoned by Drinkwater on November 4 because Darr "ceased her protected activities."[7]

As a consequence, I find that Drinkwater's "primary motive and concern" in taking disciplinary action against Darr was the sole motive[8]—Darr's concerted and union activities—and that the award is thus clearly repugnant to the Act in finding there was just cause for discipline under the agreement. Sea-Land Service, 240 NLRB 1146 (1979).

Further, there are two allegations contained in the complaint of 8(a)(1) violations which the arbitration award does not remedy and thus cannot be deferred to: that the Respondent "[m]ore strictly enforced its employees' break schedule in order to discourage its employees' union and/or protected concerted activities"; and that the Respondent "[i]nterfered with its employees' union

[4] Spielberg enunciates the Board's policy of deferring to the decisions of arbitrators where the arbitration proceedings appear to have been fair and regular; the parties agreed to be bound by the results of the arbitration; and the arbitrator's decision was not clearly repugnant to the Act. The parties agree that the first two conditions have been met.

[5] In Sea-Land Service, 240 NLRB 1146 fn. 4 (1979), the Board (Member Penello, dissenting) refused to reach the General Counsel's contention that an award was repugnant to the Act solely because it did not make the grievant whole for his loss of backpay, stating at 1147 fn. 4:

> The dissent finds undue support in the cases itn cites for the proposition that less than a make-whole remedy is not clearly repugnant to the Act. It is true that in Crown Zellerbach Corp., 215 NLRB 385, 387 (1974), a Board panel adopted the Administrative Law Judge's dismissal of a complaint where the the arbitrator awarded less than full backpay, but "insubordination was the reason for the discharge," not an unfair labor practice. Likewise, International Great Lakes Shipping Co., 215 NLRB 701 (1974), dismissed a complaint based on Spielberg where the arbitrator ordered reinstatement without backpay, but once again the discharges were not for protected activity. Ohio Ferro-Alloys Corp., 209 NLRB 577 (1974), at fn. 2, specifically disavowed the Administrative Law Judge's characterization of the arbitrator's award as a "compromise" and his rationale suggesting deferral to such an award. The decision was based on the fact that the employee had obtained his employment under false pretenses. To be sure in Fikse Bros. Inc., 220 NLRB 1301 (1975), a panel majority stated that a lump-sum award in lieu of a "make-whole" remedy was insufficient to require ouster of an arbitrator's decision, but not without Chairman Fanning's dissent. More to the point is Cessna Aircraft Co., 220 NLRB 873 (1975) (then-Chairman Murphy concurring on other grounds), where a panel held that reinstatement without a make-whole remedy is repugnant to the Act.

[6] See, however, Coletti's Furniture v. NLRB, 550 F.2d 1292 (1st Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1979). The Board has not acquiesced in the circuit's rationale. J.P. Stevens & Co., 240 NLRB 579 (1979); Glenside Hospital, 234 NLRB 62 (1978).

[7] There is ample justification in Board law for finding that Darr's conduct in refusing to leave Respondent's premises was condoned and, therefore, should not be considered in determining the motive for her discharge. Heath International, 196 NLRB 318 (1972). In any event, Darr's conduct was provoked by the Respondent's stealing of her petition, her antagonism because of her protected activities, and her illegal suspension. Hawaiian Hauling Service, 219 NLRB 765 (1975). While her postdischarge conduct might not be deserving of condonation, in the circumstances herein, it was not sufficiently serious to warrant the denial of reinstatement. Hagerty Catering Co., 236 NLRB 1553 (1978).

[8] For this reason, I do not rely on Douglas Aircraft Co. v. NLRB, 609 F.2d 252 (9th Cir. 1979), cited by Respondent, which refused to enforce the Board's decision at 234 NLRB 578 (1978). The award herein is not susceptible of a nonrepugnant interpretation.

and/or protected concerted activities by impeding circulation of and confiscating a petition, protesting the discharge of a co-worker." The latter violation is clearly evident from the award and requires no further discussion. I find a violation. The former has also been proved because the arbitrator found that Walker's "primary motive for the suspension was [Darr's] vigorous pursuit of grievances and her petition preparation activity."

In finding that the award may not be deferred to and finding that the Respondent has violated the Act, I have considered and I reject a number of Respondent's arguments. The Board's mechanism for deferring to arbitration is by no means compromised herein. An arbitrator's award cannot oust the Board of jurisdiction to decide whether the Act has been violated and to remedy unfair labor practices. International Harvester Co., 138 NLRB 923, 929 (1962), enfd. sub nom. Ramsey v. NLRB, 327 F.2d 784 (7th Cir., 1964), cert. denied 377 U.S. 1003 (1964). Issues in an award must be resolved in a manner compatible with the Act, Eastman Broadcasting Co., 199 NLRB 434 (1972), which Congress has entrusted to the Board to enforce. The policies of Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963),[9] and Spielberg do not divest the Board from its obligation to insure that the purposes and policies of the Act are effectuated.

Respondent seeks to differentiate between "effectuating the purposes and policies of the Act"—a positive test, Respondent argues—which requires more than the Spielberg test of repugnancy—a negative test—which leaves a "broad range of remedies which would be acceptable as not being repugnant to the Act, but yet would fall short of fully effectuating the policies of the Act." Although there may be some instances presented to the Board in the future where this distinction may have some appeal, Respondent has cited no authority to support its proposition. Indeed, Respondent may be hard-pressed to cite a decision where the Board, finding that a discharge of an employee violated the Act, ordered reinstatement, without backpay, more than 9 months later. Community Medical Services, 236 NLRB 853 at 856 (1978).

Finally, Respondent contends that the failure to defer herein would show that it is a waste of time for the Employer to submit to arbitration; that the declaration of repugnancy would merely be the substitution by the Board of its judgment for that of the arbitrator; and that the favorable consequences of Spielberg—the preservation of the bargain of the parties, their "harmonious interaction," the reduction of the Board's work load, and the speed of arbitration when compared with the delay of the Board—would be greatly diminished. Perhaps the wisdom of Dubo and Spielberg may be demonstrated by the fact that so few cases, such as the instant one, have come to the Board for resolution. The arbitration process must be resolving the vast majority of disputes.

That the Board may substitute its judgment for that of the arbitrator is due solely to the fact that the Board, and not an arbitrator, has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that the Act is complied with. Where the arbitrator has found facts which demonstrate that no violation of the Act or the contract has occurred, or that only the contract has been violated, the Board willingly defers. But the Board cannot abdicate its responsibility when an arbitrator errs in his application of the facts and defeats the Act's purposes. Arbitration is consensual; the parties agree that, right or wrong, an arbitrator's award is the expedient method for resolving disputes. Not so the Act. The parties cannot give the Board jurisdiction to dispose of their disputes, nor can the parties divest the Board of its obligation to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It may well be that arbitration may more quickly dispose of contractual and statutory disputes, but speed is not necessarily the only desirable aim of the Act. There is no question that, because of its everincreasing caseload, the Board is fully cognizant of its duty to carefully and expeditiously dispose of the issues presented to it. The Board has also made known that it may not "[sacrifice] the public interest in the vindication of statutory rights for the sake of reducing [its] caseload." Community Medical Services, supra at 856. At the same time, I would be remiss if I did not note that Darr's grievance was filed on November 11, 1977, the hearing was held on May 18, 1978, and the award was rendered 3 months later, on August 18, 1978. That is not the "matter of weeks" that the Respondent refers to in its brief. This is not to say that the delay (which, unfortunately, may be less than the delay encountered in Board proceedings) is unconscionable or was not justified. Unfortunately, litigation—even arbitration—takes time and will probably never be as expeditious as the parties might like. However, any delay is singularly unhelpful in justifying the arbitrator's decision to reinstate Darr without backpay. That effectively denied her of three-quarters of a year's pay, without discussion of why a lesser penalty might have been imposed and why the discipline meted out by the arbitrator was appropriate in the circumstances. Although it is unnecessary for the purposes of this decision, it appears that some consideration of the justification for particular discipline ought to be spelled out, rather than the unsupported discipline which is inherent because of the delay of the arbitration process.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with the Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

[9] Darr filed a grievance concerning her discharge on November 11, 1977, and the unfair labor practice charge which instituted this proceeding on February 13, 1978. On March 31, 1978, the Regional Director for Region 11 notified the parties that further proceedings would be administratively deferred to the grievance procedure in accordance with Dubo, because the matters involved in the charge were pending arbitration. After the arbitration award issued on August 18, 1978, the Regional Director, on May 10, 1979, issued the complaint herein.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Cone Mills Corporation-White Oak Plant is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO-CLC, Local 391, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The arbitration award, dated August 18, 1978, concerning grievant Marie E. Darr, is repugnant to the Act and may not be deferred to.

4. By enforcing its employees' break schedules in order to discourage its employees' union and concerted and protected activities by impeding circulation of and confiscating a petition protesting the discharge of fellow employees, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By suspending and discharging Marie E. Darr because of her union and concerted and protected activities, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice, I will recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent discharged Marie E. Darr on November 4, 1977, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, but has subsequently reinstated her without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and benefits previously enjoyed, I will recommend that Respondent make her whole for any loss of wages or other benefits to which she may be entitled as a result of the discrimination against her, with interest, as provided by F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977),[10] and expunge from her personnel records all references to her suspension and discharge.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 3 September 1982 Administrative Law Judge Julius Cohn issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found, and we agree, that Ezekiel Correa was not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, although he did act as an agent for the Respondent. None of the parties has excepted to the finding that Correa was not a supervisor. We note, however, that Correa testified, without providing any details, that he "hired" the porter at the Respondent's building. Although the "hiring" of an employee is often a dispositive indicator of supervisory status, the "hiring," just like any other indicium of supervisory status, must reflect some meaningful measure of independent judgment. Thus, an individual may "hire" an employee in the colloquial sense, yet not be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act if the "hiring" individual is merely performing a ministerial act or carrying out the directions of another who actually possesses the necessary authority. See, e.g., Bricklayers Local 44 (Raymond International), 207 NLRB 354, 356 (1973). In the instant case, none of the detailed evidence concerning Correa's day-to-day authority demonstrates any meaningful indicia of supervisory authority. Instead, it appears that Correa, at most, acted as a leadman or a conduit between the employees and the Respondent. Accordingly, we are unwilling to confer supervisory status on Correa merely on the basis of his undetailed statement, particularly in view of the fact that none of the parties now contends that he possessed any supervisory authority.

THE REMEDY

Contrary to the judge, we find that the amounts of money paid by the Respondent to the discriminatees in "settlement" of their claims for "severance pay" should be included in the discriminatees' interim earnings for purposes of the make-whole remedy. A. S. Abell Co., 230 NLRB 17, 21 (1977); 243 NLRB 171 (1979). In our view, exclusion of these payments from the employees' interim earnings, in the circumstances here, clearly results in a windfall to the employees and a penalty against the Respondent.[1] In all other respects, backpay shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Chaim Babad, Bernard Steinmetz, and Emanuel Steinmetz, a co-partnership d/b/a J.R.R. Realty Co., Forest Hills, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for paragraph 2(c).

"(c) Offer Ezekiel Correa, Gilberto Concepcion, Lorenzo Cruz, Charles Darmendo, Curtis Phillip, and Hugh Robertson immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the Board's decision."

[1] The judge relied on Roadway Express, 246 NLRB 174 (1979). We find that case inapposite. Roadway involved the issue of whether the Board should have declined to adjudicate alleged unfair labor practices in deference to the parties' private settlement and not the specific issue here of whether, as a matter of the Board's remedy, certain payments to employees properly are offset against backpay. We find it unnecessary to express any view on the Board's holding in Roadway.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JULIUS COHN, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was heard in Brooklyn and New York, New York, on March 15 and 16, 1982. On charges filed on April 10 and May 8, 1981, the Regional Director for Region 29 issued an order consolidating cases and a complaint on August 31, 1981, alleging that J.R.R. Realty Co. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 32B-32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union); by bypassing the Union and bargaining directly with employees, and by discharging employees because of their membership in the Union. Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of unfair labor practices.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. All parties submitted briefs which have been carefully considered. On the entire record in the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, also called J.R.R., is a partnership composed of nine individuals, principally Chaim Babad and members of his family, and, in addition, two other partnerships, one composed of Bernard Steinmetz and members of his family, and the other of Emanuel Steinmetz and his immediate relations. J.R.R. owns and operates an apartment building in Forest Hills, Queens, New York, from which it derives gross annual income of $410,000. Respondent contends that inasmuch as it does not receive revenues in excess of $500,000, the Board's standard for asserting jurisdiction over apartment housing,[1] this proceeding should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

However, based on documents stipulated for the record, it appears that Babad and members of his immediate family, as well as the two Steinmetz families (Babad being, in addition, a cousin of the Steinmetz'), are all partners in five other partnerships which together total gross revenues of almost $1-1/2 million. These other partnerships similarly, as does Respondent, own apartment buildings. The record further reveals that Babad is the manager of all the partnerships and buildings, that the addresses of each are the same address as Babad's home, where he maintains the books and records for the partnerships and the buildings they own. As managing agent and partner, Babad controls the daily operations of all the buildings, including labor relations. In the latter connection, it is noted that Babad transferred employees from one of the partnerships to Respondent when, as will be more fully described later, it took over the building which is the subject of this proceeding.

I find, therefore, that the six partnerships are sufficiently interrelated in operations, management, control of labor relations, and in effect function as a single employer. The Board has found in these circumstances that a number of corporations operating in the apartment housing industry could combine their total gross revenues so as to arrive at a figure of at least $500,000 in receipts which meets the standard set by the Board for jurisdiction.[2] The record further reveals that Respondent purchased fuel oil valued in excess of $30,000 in the year preceding the issuance of the complaint herein from enterprises which, in turn, received such materials in interstate commerce directly from States other than the State of New York. Accordingly, I find that both the statutory requirement and the Board's relevant standard for asserting jurisdiction have been met and conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.[3]

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The facts are, in the main, uncontroverted. On March 31, 1981, pursuant to a title closing, Respondent acquired the apartment building on Austin Street in Forest Hills which provides the locale for this proceeding. The building had been owned by Jaru Properties, Inc. and ASCR Realty Co., Inc., and managed by J.A.R. Management Corp., all of said entities being owned by the Rose family. As of the date of the title closing, there were six employees at the building.[4] These employees were represented by the Union in accordance with a collective-bargaining agreement dated August 27, 1979, and effective until April 20, 1982, between J.A.R. Management and the Union.

On November 6, 1980, Jaru Properties, Inc. and ASCR Realty Co., Inc. contracted to sell the property to a corporation named Joshua Estates, Inc. This agreement was executed on behalf of the latter by Harry Newman, as vice president. Newman was the attorney for the Respondent in these transactions and, according to the testimony of Alfred Rose, a principal owner of the seller, the contract closing occurred in the office of his attorney, Maurer, and was attended by Newman and Babad. Rose stated it was understood that the purchasers were Babad and Steinmetz who gave checks totaling $165,000 as a deposit on the sale. Rose also said he had a number of conversations with Babad prior to the signing of the contract relating to financing and the purchase price. The ultimate title closing took place at Rose's attorney's office on March 31, 1981, and once more Babad was present.

The contract of sale provided that the purchaser (Joshua) shall take the property subject to certain "permitted incumbences," and among those specified was the union contract, a copy of which was annexed to the contract of sale. At the closing on March 31, Joshua Estates, Inc. by Harry Newman executed an assignment of the contract of sale to JRR Realty Co., which was signed and acknowledged by Babad's partner. At the same time the seller assigned to J.R.R. (Respondent), as assignee of Joshua, all rights and title to certain agreements including the 1979 agreement with the Union. Also at the closing, both Joshua and J.R.R. by Babad as partner agreed to take title subject to the payment and performance of all obligations of seller under the leases, contracts, and agreements and service and maintenance contracts in effect on March 31, 1981, and further agreed to indemnify the seller and hold it harmless for any claims and liabilities arising on such agreements. Finally, it is noted that the collective-bargaining agreement itself contained a provision requiring that the seller of the building obtain an adoption of the union contract from the purchaser, and offer continued employment to all unit employees and give the Union 2 weeks' written notice prior to the sale. However, it does not appear that the seller complied with these provisions.

[2] Arlington Ridge Development Co., 203 NLRB 787 (1973).

[3] Alternatively, the record reveals that in a state court proceeding brought by the Union on this matter, Respondent pleaded successfully that the arbitration be stayed since the same issues were brought before the Board. In Pollack Electric Co., 219 NLRB 1237 (1975), the Board affirmed a decision by an administrative law judge asserting jurisdiction over a respondent whose business met statutory but not discretionary standards and who had not questioned NLRB jurisdiction before the State Labor Board.

[4] The employees were Ezekiel Correa, building superintendent, Gilberto Concepcion, porter, Curtis Phillip, Hugh Robertson, and Lorenzo Cruz, full-time elevator operators, and Charles Darmendo, part-time elevator operator.

Correa, the building superintendent, and Curtis Phillip, the elevator operator on the afternoon shift, both testified that late in the afternoon of April 1 some people came to the building with a moving truck and said they were moving into apartment 3C. They asked Correa for the key which he refused, saying he had no orders to give the key to anybody. About 2 hours later, approximately 7 p.m., Babad came to the premises and told Correa that the new owner was renting that apartment to these people and Correa gave him the key. The people then moved into the apartment. Phillip stated that Babad told him that he was the owner of the building and these people moving in were his men who were going to work there. Babad asked Phillip if he wanted to make a deal to leave his job but the latter said he expected to continue working and was not thinking about any deal. Although Babad offered him $500 to leave, Phillip said he would not do it because he needed the job and pleaded with Babad to keep him on. Phillip also stated that Babad told him he could not pay what the Union was paying and would not be able to hire him.

Also on this occasion Bahad told Correa to contact Gilberto Concepcion because as of that day the porter was out. Concepcion came to Correa's apartment later that evening and Babad offered him $1000 to make the deal. Concepcion accepted it and then waited until Babad returned around midnight with the money. He gave Concepcion $1000 in cash for which Concepcion signed a release. That evening Babad also tried to buy out Correa offering him $1400 to leave the Union, the job, and for severance pay. Correa refused stating he was going to call the Union the next day. Babad told him he wanted the Union "off," and would make a deal with him and the porter without the Union.

The next day Correa telephoned and reported what happened to the Union, and Phillip actually visited the Union and informed the delegate. Correa was directed not to sign any papers and not to leave the Union because a representative would be there the day after. Phillip was told to go back to work at 3 o'clock but shortly thereafter Babad came to the elevator and informed him that one of the new men would be working the elevator from then on. Phillip said he went to Correa's apartment and Babad came in and took their keys for the boiler room and the elevator key.

The next day, Friday, April 3, a union representative came to the building with a picket sign and, from that point on, the employees picketed the building. All the employees had been replaced by the family who moved into the building on April 1.

A few days later Babad came to Correa's apartment in the building and offered him $2500 to leave his job, and indicated that he would give more money to the other employees. He told Correa he would give Phillip $1700 and $700 to the part-timer, Darmendo, and another amount for Cruz. He asked Correa to speak to the others who were then picketing and tell them that Babad was offering a better deal but without the Union which he did not want. Correa did communicate with the other employees who told him there would be no deal without the Union, and Correa reported their refusal to Babad. In the ensuing weeks, Babad offered Correa money on a number of occasions either by telephone or by person. At one point, Babad threatened Correa, who was still living in the building, with eviction and cutting off his utilities. Babad claimed he did this because the pickets had engaged in some violent actions.

Babad testified that, when he took over the building, he brought these new people to the building as described above. He proposed to pay the new superintendent a lump sum from which the latter would take care of the other people who were working with him and were part of his family. Since the previous employees were picketing the building, Babad stated he needed four people to be at the building, but after the strike he retained three, all of whom were brothers, and a fourth person who was the wife of the superintendent. He stated that he intended to automate the elevator but this has not been done yet. Babad further testified that while the picketing was going on about the latter part of April, he received a telephone call from Rudy Larmond, a union official, and, after some discussion, an appointment was made to meet on April 27. During the telephone conversations Babad told Larmond that, since he was putting in an automatic elevator, there was no need for elevator men and, in addition, the superintendent (Correa) was looking for another job. He concluded there was no sense keeping all the men there and, while he did not have anything against the Union, he had not taken over the contract when he purchased the building. At the meeting, after discussion of these various problems raised by Babad, a settlement agreement was prepared but never signed, and indeed Babad stated he never read the paper. Basically the agreement provided for a settlement with the employees consisting of a 4 weeks' pay to each of them. Babad stated that the Union said he could talk to the superintendent and work out a private deal with him if he wished, and the amount of 4 weeks' pay to the other people had been left open.

In any case Babad conceded that, until the telephone call setting up the meeting and the meeting itself on April 27, he had not talked to or notified the Union concerning offers of settlement made to the employees, Concepcion, Cruz, Darmendo, Robertson, and Phillip. Nor did the Union give permission for Babad to talk or deal with these employees. By the same token before April 27 Babad did not discuss with the Union the problem of dealing with Superintendent Correa.

On April 28 Babad came to the building and asked Correa to communicate with the other employees. Shortly thereafter some of them came to Correa's apartment. Babad then gave Concepcion, whom he had already paid $1000, another $150; he gave Darmendo, the part-timer, $850; $1500 to Cruz and struck his deal finally with Correa for the payment of $2500 in addition to 3 months' free rent. The employees agreed to give up rights to their jobs and signed receipts for the money which had been given them by check and then cashed by Babad. According to Curtis Phillip, he and Robertson continued their picketing until April 30 when they decided that it was too lonely and dangerous to continue. Robertson then called Babad and made an appointment and they met at the building with him and the new superintendent. After some negotiation Babad finally offered Phillip $2100, and Robertson $1850. After endorsing checks they were paid in cash by Babad. In addition they signed receipts, as did the other employees before them.

In his testimony Babad maintained that he had never agreed to assume the contract and consequently he did not abide by any of the terms and conditions of employment set forth therein. His new superintendent did the work of the porter and consequently Babad no longer employed anyone in that latter capacity. The three elevator men, whom Babad employed to replace the former employees, were reduced to two shortly after taking over the building. Moreover, clearly Babad did not negotiate any of the terms and conditions of employment of his new employees with the Union and, as noted, he has reduced the number of employees, and those that remain are paid less than the union contract rates. Finally, as of the time of the hearing, the elevator had not been automated, the reason asserted for not hiring the former elevator operators.

B. Discussion and Analysis

1. The successorship issue

In NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972), the Supreme Court affirmed the Board's successor-employer doctrine, finding that a successor-employer, absent a reasonably based good-faith doubt of the incumbent union's majority, is obligated to recognize the continuing representative status of the bargaining agent of its predecessor's employees in an appropriate unit taken over from the predecessor. This is applied not only where the union's status was established by Board certification but also where it had been established by voluntary recognition.[5]

In the instant case, Respondent continued the same business as its predecessor, that is, the ownership and operation of a residential apartment building. However, an essential factor in the determination of successorship is absent as Respondent did not continue at least a majority of the employees of the predecessor in its work force. Indeed, Respondent immediately replaced the predecessor's employees with a family of employees that Babad transferred from one of his apartment house operations at another location. Nevertheless, Respondent's obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union and even more to honor the contract is founded on another ground. In NLRB v. Ethan Allen, Inc., 544 F.2d 742 (4th Cir. 1976), the court enforced a Board Order finding there had been an adoption by the successor of the contract.

In the instant case the assumption of the collective-bargaining agreement by Respondent may be spelled out from the series of not unusual real estate transactions and documents described and set forth above. The contract of sale was executed by Newman, Respondent's attorney, as vice president of Joshua Estates, Inc., undoubtedly a dummy corporation, acting on behalf of Babad who incidently was present at this and all of the other transactions. The contract specifically provided that the purchaser take title subject to, among other things, union contracts, a copy of the collective-bargaining agreement even being annexed thereto. At the title closing on March 31, Joshua, again by Newman, assigned the contract of sale to Respondent, an assignment acknowledged by Babad, in which Joshua assigned all rights of the purchaser to Respondent as assignee, which assumed all obligations of the purchaser under the original contract with the seller. Finally, at the closing both Joshua and J.R.R., the Respondent, agreed to take title subject to all existing leases, contracts, agreements, service and maintenance contracts then in effect. By these undertakings and assumptions, Respondent succeeded the seller of the building with respect to obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement.

In his testimony, Babad apparently chose to ignore his own written assumptions and indemnifications concerning the labor agreement, and preferred to remark on the sellers' alleged failure to abide by the collective-bargaining provision requiring it to notify the Union of the impending sale. I find in all the circumstances that Respondent, by its failure to recognize the Union and to assume all the obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement relating to the Union itself and the employees who were employed at the time of his takeover, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[6]

Turning back to the question of successorship and the principles established in Burns, supra, it has been noted above that all factors for the finding of a successorship are present except for the failure of Respondent to retain the former employees at the apartment building. The Board has stated, "[I]t is well settled that successorship will be found in such circumstances if the new owner fails to hire the predecessor's employees because of their affiliation with the Union."[7] The issue then is whether the employees were not hired for unlawful discriminatory motives.

After closing title to the building on March 31, Babad, on behalf of Respondent, went to the building on April 1. At the time Superintendent Correa was there inasmuch as he lived in an apartment in the building, and employee Phillip was working on the elevator. That day Babad replaced them with a family of employees whom he transferred from another building he managed in Brooklyn. The remainder of the employees were advised that they no longer had jobs. Actually, whether the employees were discharged or refused hire by Respondent, the result is the same. The uncontradicted testimony of Phillip, an elevator operator, was to the effect that, during the course of his conversation on April 1 with Babad, the latter stated he could not pay the union rates and therefore he would not be able to hire Phillip, who, at the time, was actually pleading for his job. In reality, Babad attempted to make some sort of deal with Phillip whereby, for a certain sum of money, he would relieve himself of the obligations which he knew were part of the union contract such as severance pay and the like. As a result, he or Correa went through this routine with all of the old employees. It was implicit in his course of conduct that the reason he was trying to "buy out" these former employees was his desire not to retain them under the union agreement. Indeed, Babad paid some of these employees sums in excess of what would have been severance pay under the terms of the union contract. Clearly, Babad was aware of what he was doing. As a bona fide purchaser and successor to the former employer, Respondent would have no obligation to retain the employees; consequently it had no need to pay money in lieu of severance pay or for any other reason to these employees. The only logical purpose of these payments was to strike a deal with individual employees so that they would forgo not only the Union, but also their jobs and he could start afresh with his own crew. Finally, Babad's claim throughout the proceeding, that he had no need for the elevator operators in view of his plan to automate the elevator as soon as he took over the building, was pretextual. The hearing in this matter was conducted almost a year after Respondent took title to the building and the elevator was still not automated. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to hire the former employees of J.A.R.

[6] The Union's letter dated April 23, 1981, addressed to Respondent does not militate against this finding. While the letter appears to be simply a request that Respondent, as an ordinary successor, agree to be bound by the collective-bargaining agreement with its predecessor, it is clear that the Union had no knowledge at that time of the express assumption of the collective-bargaining agreement by Respondent.

I further conclude that, but for the unlawful conduct in failing to hire these employees, the Union's majority status as collective-bargaining representative would have continued following the takeover and Respondent's obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union as a successor would have also continued. By its conduct in refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as representative of the employees, I further find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[8]

2. The bypassing issue

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by dealing individually with employees and thereby bypassing the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

a. The status of Correa

Preliminary to the discussion of this issue, it is necessary to determine whether Correa was an employee or a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Correa had been superintendent since 1977, approximately 4 years before the building was sold to Respondent and, as such, was within the bargaining unit described in the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and J.A.R. As building superintendent, he was mainly concerned with the general maintenance of the building including checking the boiler, and making minor repairs. He also checked employees coming in to work but, if someone called in sick, he would call J.A.R. Management and inform them of this circumstance. Correa was paid about $25 above the stipulated contract rate for a building superintendent, but he explained that this was in payment for extra work which he was called upon to do. In addition his compensation included free rent for an apartment and utilities, such as a telephone. Correa testified that during his tenure he had never hired anyone for a job except the porter, Concepcion, nor had he ever interviewed anyone for a job. Moreover, the other employees had been employed prior to the time he started in 1977 and there was no occasion to discharge any of them. Correa stated that, on the one occasion when he hired the porter, he merely told Concepcion what his work duties were and that was it. He did state that, if an employee wanted an off day, he would tell him whether he could take it or not. Further, Correa said he never suspended any employee or even issued a warning. Correa said under the established policy, if an elevator man for the midnight shift called in sick, nobody would run it. However, if there were an absentee for an elevator on another shift, he would run it himself for a while or ask others to do it, but often they would refuse if they had their own shift or for any other reason. Sometimes, at his request, another operator would take over the shift in order to obtain overtime pay. Finally, Correa stated that a representative of his employer, J.A.R. Management, would come to the building once a week and inspect what was going on.

On the basis of the foregoing I find that Superintendent Correa is not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act but is more in the nature of an experienced, senior employee who routinely oversees the maintenance of the building, and is subject to regular and constant higher supervision.[9] In this connection it is also noted that the elevator operators' jobs are unchanged and require no particular further instruction or assignment, and the porter had a similar position, merely repeating the tasks and duties he was told to perform when hired.

The General Counsel and the Charging Party have alleged, alternatively, that Correa is an agent of Respondent whose statements and conduct would be binding upon it. This is clearly evidenced in the instant case by reason of Babad having asked Correa to approach employees and make offers of settlement to them. This was done at the outset since Correa transmitted, on behalf of Respondent, all of Babad's offers to Concepcion and to other employees on other occasions. Since Correa actually spoke to the former employees of J.A.R. and offered to them specific sums of money, proposals acted upon by Babad, the employees could reasonably believe that Correa was acting on behalf of and as a conduit for Respondent, and accordingly I find him to have been an agent of Respondent.[10]

[8] Burns, supra; Love's Barbeque Restaurant No. 62, supra. The appropriate unit is:

All service employees of Respondent, employed at its Forest Hills apartment building, exclusive of all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

b. The bypassing

The uncontroverted evidence is to the effect that Babad, either by his own efforts or through Correa, dealt with the employees, communicated offers of settlement of their status as employees, and negotiated severance pay. Babad, either by himself or through Correa, engaged in this conduct without permission of the Union, the collective-bargaining representative of the employees. Indeed, Babad ultimately reached agreements with all the employees, including Correa, and paid sums of money and obtained signed receipts from them. As to Correa, Babad also made numerous attempts to make a deal with him and, since Correa was a member of the bargaining unit, Babad also bypassed the Union in his case, at least until April 27, when he received permission from the Union to deal with him. However, no such permission was granted to the other employees with whom Babad made a final "settlement" after the meeting, again without notifying the Union or obtaining any authorization to do so.

It has been established that it is the duty of an employer to bargain solely with the statutory representative and no other person or group.[11] Respondent acted in derogation of this principle when, on April 1 and thereafter, Babad or Correa began discussions individually with employees concerning an attempt to have them voluntarily leave their positions for which they would be reimbursed. In his effort to rid himself of the Union, Babad actually paid them perhaps more than they would have been entitled under the severance pay provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement. This bypassing of the Union and dealing on these matters directly with the employees further violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[12]

3. The alleged violations of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act

In the circumstances of this case, in order to establish that Respondent was a successor to the former owner of the apartment building, it was necessary and I found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing employment to the employees of J.A.R. In addition, since I have found that Correa was not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, but rather was an employee, I find further that he was also subject to Respondent's discrimination in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In sum, as previously stated, I find that Respondent failed to offer employment to Correa, Concepcion, Cruz, Darmendo, Phillip, and Robertson, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III above, occurring in connection with the operations of Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent as a successor-employer violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to bargain with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to recognize and bargain in good faith with the Union.

I have further found that, as a result of its contractual undertakings in the course of the closing of title to the apartment building it had purchased, Respondent had adopted the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and its predecessor, J.A.R., which it then repudiated, and discharged or refused to hire the employees of the predecessor on and after April 1. Accordingly, I shall recommend that Respondent make whole the discharged employees in the unit found appropriate, from April 1, 1981, in accordance with the terms and conditions of employment set forth in the contract repudiated by Respondent. This remedy is not limited to the end of the contract term since the obligation to bargain continues after the expiration of the agreement.

Having found Respondent discharged Correa, Concepcion, Cruz, Darmendo, Phillip, and Robertson, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer them reinstatement and to make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge. The amount of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[13] In making whole the employees for their loss of earnings and other benefits, Respondent should not be credited with the amounts it paid to the employees allegedly in settlement of their claims for severance pay, as these payments were made in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and constituted bribes to the employees for the purposes of their renouncing their ties with the Union and leaving their jobs. Nor do I find merit in the contention of Respondent that these payments resulted from voluntary settlement agreements and receipts signed by the individual employees. The agreements were not really voluntary since it was clear from the evidence that the employees desired continued employment and were forced to take these amounts as an alternative. The Board has not normally refrained from adjudicating unfair labor practices because of private settlement agreements. Particularly in this situation, where the agreements in themselves were violative of the Act, I find it would not effectuate the policies of the Act to give effect to and credit the settlements made by Respondent.[14]

Because of the egregious nature of the violations herein, including discharge or refusal to hire the entire complement of the predecessor's employees, I shall recommend entry of a broad order.[15]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Union is the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following unit found appropriate. All service employees of Respondent, employed at its Forest Hills apartment building, exclusive of all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

4. Respondent is the successor-employer to J.A.R., the former employer at the apartment building involved.

5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to bargain, after April 1, 1981, collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate.

6. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to honor the collective-bargaining agreement then in effect, and by its discharge of all of the former employees at the apartment building.

7. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by bargaining directly with the building service employees and bypassing the Union.

8. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Ezekiel Correa, Gilberto Concepcion, Lorenzo Cruz, Charles Darmendo, Curtis Phillip, and Hugh Robertson, because of their membership in and support of the Union.

9. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[16]

ORDER

The Respondent, Chaim Babad, Bernard Steinmetz and Emanuel Steinmetz, a co-partnership d/b/a J.R.R. Realty Co., Forest Hills, New York, its partners, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Local 32B–32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the unit described above as appropriate herein.

(b) Refusing to honor and abide by the contract entered into between its predecessor J.A.R. Management Corp., and the Union, for the period from April 1, 1981.

(c) Disregarding the Union and bargaining directly with the employees in derogation of their bargaining representative.

(d) Discharging employees because of their membership in or support for the Union.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Bargain collectively, on request, with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

(b) Honor and give retroactive effect from April 1, 1981, to the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining contract with the Union, including payment of wages and benefits as prescribed.

(c) Offer Ezekiel Correa, Gilberto Concepcion, Lorenzo Cruz, Charles Darmendo, Curtis Phillip, and Hugh Robertson immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exists, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for their loss of earnings in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at the Forest Hills, Queens, New York apartment building copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of his Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain collectively with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Local 32B–32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit described below:

> All service employees of Respondent, employed at its Forest Hills apartment building, exclusive of all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT refuse to honor the terms of an existing contract with the Union.

WE WILL NOT disregard the Union and bargain directly with our employees in derogation of their bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees because of their membership in or support for the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL bargain collectively, on request, with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

WE WILL honor and give retroactive effect from April 1, 1981, to the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining contract with the Union including the payment of wages and benefits.

WE WILL offer Ezekiel Correa, Gilberto Concepcion, Lorenzo Cruz, Charles Darmendo, Curtis Phillip, and Hugh Robertson full reinstatement to their jobs, with backpay plus interest.

Harley-Davidson Transportation Co., Inc. and Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local Union No. 430. Case 4–CA–13710

22 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 24 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge David S. Davidson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Charging Party filed a brief in support of the judge's decision. The General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The pertinent facts are undisputed. Prior to 1 April 1982, Service Group, Inc. (SGI) provided freight transportation services to Harley-Davidson Motor Co. (H-DMC) at its York, Pennsylvania facility. The Union had successive collective-bargaining agreements with SGI for 3 years covering a unit of truckdrivers engaged in hauling for H-DMC. The latest of these agreements expired on 31 March 1982.

On 1 April 1982 Respondent Harley-Davidson Transportation Co. (HDT) assumed control of SGI's trucking operation for H-DMC. A majority of the drivers then hired by HDT had been employed previously by SGI in the bargaining unit represented by the Union. These employees continued to comprise a majority of the Respondent's drivers through the date of the hearing in this case.

On 6 July 1982 the Union called on the Respondent to bargain with it as a successor to SGI. Recognizing that it might be a successor employer to SGI, the Respondent agreed on 19 January 1983 to bargain with the Union. The Respondent does not now dispute its successor status.

The Union and the Respondent met to negotiate three times in February and April 1983 and had scheduled a fourth meeting for 16 May 1983. The fourth meeting did not take place. On 9 May 1983 the Respondent withdrew from negotiations because, inter alia, it had been presented on 7 or 8 May with a petition signed by a majority of its employees stating that they did not wish to be represented by the Union.

The judge found that by conceding its obligation as a successor and agreeing to negotiate, the Respondent voluntarily recognized the Union. He further found that by so doing the Respondent impliedly admitted that it had no reason to doubt the Union's majority status on the date the Union requested bargaining. Relying on the Board's statement in Landmark International Trucks, 257 NLRB 1375 fn. 4 (1981), enf. denied in pertinent part 699 F.2d 815 (6th Cir. 1983), that "we can discern no principle that would support distinguishing a successor's bargaining obligation based on voluntary recognition of a majority union from any other employer's duty to bargain for a reasonable period," the judge concluded that the Respondent had incurred the obligation arising from voluntary recognition to bargain for a "reasonable time" notwithstanding any subsequent good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. Alternatively, the judge cited Holiday Inn of Niles Michigan, 241 NLRB 555, 559 (1979), for the proposition that a successor employer can deny recognition only if its good-faith doubt is based on circumstances existing on the date recognition is sought, and that once a successor has agreed to bargain, it is not privileged to withdraw recognition based on circumstances arising thereafter until a reasonable time for bargaining has elapsed. Accordingly, the judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act because it withdrew from negotiations before the parties had bargained for a reasonable period.

We do not adopt the judge's conclusion because we disagree with his characterization of a successor employer's bargaining obligation.[2] We adhere to the view expressed in Barrington Plaza & Tragniew, 185 NLRB 962, 963 (1970), and cases cited therein, that where, as here, a successor employer recognizes a union which has been certified for a year or more, the union enjoys a rebuttable presumption of majority status only. A successor may lawfully withdraw from negotiation at any time following recognition if it can show that the union had in fact lost its majority status at the time of the refusal to bargain or that the refusal to bargain was grounded on a good-faith doubt based on objective factors that the union continued to command majority support.[3] Accordingly, we overrule Landmark, Holiday Inn, and similar cases to the extent they are inconsistent with this view.

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] We therefore do not pass on the judge's conclusion that a reasonable time for bargaining had not elapsed.

[3] See also Grico Corp., 265 NLRB 1344 (1982).

The rule set forth today is supported by the Sixth Circuit's decision in Landmark International Trucks v. NLRB, 699 F.2d 815, 818 (6th Cir. 1983). The court observed that a successor employer's obligation to bargain with the representative of its predecessor's employees arises by operation of law and cannot be truly voluntary. The court concluded as follows:

> There is no reason to treat a change in ownership of the employer as the equivalent of a certification or voluntary recognition of a union following an organization drive. In the latter cases the employees must be given an opportunity to determine the effectiveness of the union's representation free of any attempts to decertify or otherwise change the relationship. However, where the union has represented the employees for a year or more a change in ownership of the employer does not disturb the relationship between employees and the union. While the relationship between employees and employer is a new one, the relationship between employees and union is one of long standing. A successor's duty to continue recognition under such circumstances is no different from that of any other employer after the certification year expires. Recognition under these circumstances carries with it no irrebuttable presumption of contiunued majority status.

Applying the above rule to the instant case, we turn to the Respondent's defense that on 9 May 1983, when it withdrew from bargaining, it harbored an objectively based good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. The judge found that the Respondent had relied on, inter alia, a petition presented to it on 7 or 8 May 1983 apparently signed by a majority of its employees. The petition stated that the employees did not want to be represented by the Union. The judge further found that the Respondent's general manager made no attempt to authenticate the signatures because they looked at a glance to be those of his employees. We conclude that the employee petition constituted a sufficient objective ground to support the Respondent's good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. An employer may rely on a petition apparently signed by a majority of its employees as a basis for good-faith doubt even though the employer did not authenticate the signatures. Guerdon Industries, 218 NLRB 658, 660 (1975). The Respondent therefore did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by withdrawing from bargaining on 9 May 1983. Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID S. DAVIDSON, Administrative Law Judge. The charge in this case was filed on May 12, 1983, and the complaint issued on June 24, 1983, alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by withdrawing its recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its truckdrivers on May 9, 1983, and by refusing to bargain collectively with the Union after that date. Respondent denies the commission of any unfair labor practices.

A hearing in this case was held before me in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, October 20, 1983. Briefs have been received from the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondent.

The issue in this case is whether, after initially recognizing the Union and meeting for negotiations with it three times during a 3-month period, Respondent was obligated to continue bargaining with the Union after receiving a petition containing the presumed signatures of a majority of the bargaining unit in support of a recently filed decertification petition.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, engages in the over-the-road truck transportation of motorcycles and other freight from its York, Pennsylvania facility. During the past fiscal year, Respondent received revenue exceeding $50,000 for the transportation of goods directly to points outside Pennsylvania.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Background

The facts in this case are largely undisputed. Before April 1, 1982, Service Group, Inc. (SGI), an independent contractor, provided transportation services to Harley-Davidson Motor Company (H-DMC) from the facility at 2400 East Market Street in York, Pennsylvania. The Union had collective-bargaining agreements with SGI for 3 years covering its drivers; the most recent contract ran from January 1, 1981, to March 31, 1982.

In early March 1982, H-DMC notified the Union of its decision to terminate its agreement with SGI. On April 1, 1982, Respondent, a wholly owned subsidiary of H-DMC, assumed control of the operations previously handled by SGI. A majority of the drivers then hired by Respondent had been previously employed by SGI in the bargaining unit represented by the Union. That majority continued through the date of the hearing. The unit contained 25 drivers in May 1983, when the issue in this case arose.

On April 27, 1982, the Union filed a charge alleging, inter alia, that H-DMC and SGI were joint employers refusing to bargain with the Union (Case 4–CA–12889). On June 30, 1982, the Regional Director dismissed the complaint, noting that SGI and H-DMC were not joint employers, that the Union had failed to make a bargaining request of Respondent, and that the evidence indicated that Respondent was a successor employer to SGI. On November 1, 1982, the General Counsel denied the Union's appeal of the Regional Director's dismissal; on December 8, 1982, the General Counsel denied the Union's request for reconsideration of the denial of the appeal.

In the meantime on July 6, 1982, the Union, claiming that Respondent was a successor to SGI, requested Respondent to begin bargaining. On July 13, 1982, Respondent refused, pending the resolution of the Union's appeal in Case 4–CA–12889, above, and pending the expiration of the appeal deadline for another charge filed by the collective-bargaining representative of parent company H-DMC's employees (Case 4–CA–12920) alleging that the drivers were an accretion to the unit it represented. On July 19, 1982, the Union filed a further charge alleging that Respondent was a successor to SGI and had refused to bargain (Case 4–CA–13081).

On January 19, 1983, after the appeals in Cases 4–CA–12889 and 4–CA–12920 were exhausted, Respondent agreed to bargain with the Union, disclaiming, however, any acknowledgement that the Union represented a majority of the employees in the unit. On January 24, the Union requested withdrawal of the charge in Case 4–CA–13081; on January 31, the Regional Director approved the request.

2. The bargaining sessions

The Union and Respondent met to negotiate on February 1 and 28 and April 21, 1983,[1] and had scheduled a fourth meeting for May 16. The meetings took place over this somewhat extended period largely as an accommodation to the schedule of Respondent's attorney. Union Business Agent Bricker testified, without contradiction, that February 28 was the earliest date Respondent offered for the second meeting. At this second meeting, Respondent proposed that the third session occur on one of seven dates between March 29 and April 13, an earlier date being impossible due to its attorney's impending medical treatment. On March 4 the Union sent a letter to Respondent agreeing to meet on three of the dates proposed by Respondent, March 31 and April 12 and 21. However, in a March 8 reply Respondent stated that other obligations now made it available only on April 21. Bricker testified that at the April 21 meeting the parties found scheduling conflicts which were mutually resolved by the May 16 date.

There is some slight disagreement regarding the length of each meeting. Union Business Agent Bricker testified that the first meeting lasted 2 hours, the second meeting lasted 45 minutes, and the third meeting lasted 4-1/2 hours. Respondent's general manager Schwarz testified that the first meeting lasted about 30 to 45 minutes, the second lasted 2 hours, and the third lasted 3 to 4 hours. The discrepancy is not material, as, in either case, the parties spent approximately 7 hours in negotiations.

At the February 1 meeting, the Union submitted its contract proposal; at the February 28 meeting Respondent offered its proposal. At the end of the April 21 meeting the parties had reached agreement on the following articles:[2] 1. Coverage; 3. Dues Checkoff; 5. Casuals; 7. Leave of Absence; 10. Holidays; 11. Military Clause; 12. Non-Discrimination/Union Activities; 13. Passengers; 14. Meal Period; 15. Pay Period; 17. Equipment, Accident Reports; 18. Federal, State and Municipal Laws; 19. Bonds; 23. Protective Clothing and Equipment; 25. Suspended Licenses; 27. Examination of Records; 28. Examination/Examination and Identification; 29. Time Sheets; 30. Management Prerogatives; 32. Death in the Family; 34. Mileage Determination; 36. Road Expenses; 37. Fuel Time; and 38. Credit Union.

Differences remained as to the following: 2. Shop Conditions; 4. Discharge or Suspension; 6. Grievances; 8. Seniority; 9. Vacations; 16. Protection of Conditions; 20. Loss or Damage; 21. Health and Welfare Insurance/-Health and Welfare Fund; 22. Pension Plan/Pension Fund; 24. Employee's Bail; 26. Protection of Rights; 35. Paid-for-Time; 39. Term of Agreement; and possibly 31. Savings and Separability. In addition, the parties had reached agreement as to first year wages, but not as to wages for later years of a proposed 3-year contract.

During the negotiations the parties compromised on a number of issues and agreed to a number of changes to initial proposals. The May 16 meeting was scheduled for the purpose of discussing the remaining areas in dispute. Although the parties were far apart with respect to two issues, union security and a pension plan, with both strongly adhering to their initial positions as of the end of the third meeting, those issues were still on the table, there is no claim that the parties had reached an impasse, and it is clear that they had not. As Schwarz testified, at the end of the last bargaining meeting, there was "no question" that Respondent intended to negotiate until a contract was reached. The Union, anticipating a successful May 16 session, posted signs after the April 21 session announcing a union meeting to occur on May 22 for the purpose of voting on the contract.

[1] All dates are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Numbers and headings were almost identical in the two proposals; where headings differ, Respondent's heading is listed first, followed by a slash and the Union's heading.

3. The discontinuation of negotiations

On May 9, Respondent, by letter, informed the Union that it was halting contract negotiations pending the outcome of a representation case arising from the filing of a decertification petition. Respondent noted that its withdrawal was based not merely on the petition but on its being "informed by a majority of the employees of this bargaining unit that they do not want to be represented by Teamsters Local 430 at this time." Respondent contends that its determination that employees did not want union representation was based on some generalized dissatisfaction with the Union expressed at a January 16 company-called meeting of the drivers; the decertification petition filed by Joe Avaritt on April 15; two petitions containing the purported signatures of a total of 16 of the drivers, in support of the decertification petition; and the knowledge that none of the unit's drivers were currently dues paying members of the Union.

a. The January 16 meeting

On January 16, Respondent held a meeting for its drivers at Respondent's plant to discuss Respondent's obligation to bargain with Local 430.[3] An animated discussion ensued, during which an undisclosed number of unnamed drivers asked if they had "any choice in the matter as to whether or not we want a union"; if there were "anything we can do on our own behalf"; and if they were "being placed in a position that we don't have anything to say about it." Respondent's vice president for human relations, Hamilton, responded by telling the drivers that they had "every freedom, whether individually or as a group, to respond to the situation"; that they had "the right to do on your own behalf, what you feel is necessary"; and that it would be improper for the Company to intervene. The meeting lasted approximately 2 to 2-1/2 hours. Union officials were neither invited to nor attended this meeting, although David Hartman, shop steward under the SGI collective-bargaining agreement, was present.

b. The decertification petition

On April 15, employee Joe Avaritt filed a decertification petition with the Regional Director (Case 4–RD–1115). On April 18, a copy of the petition was mailed by the Board to Respondent and received on April 22 or 23. A member of the union negotiating team informed Respondent, at the April 21 bargaining session, of the petition, suggesting Respondent's complicity in its filing. Respondent denied prior knowledge of the petition. Around April 25, Schwarz was approached by Avaritt who handed him a copy of a petition in support of decertification containing the purported signatures of 12 drivers.

On May 4, Avaritt filed a second decertification petition (Case 4–RD–1117), after withdrawing the first. Respondent's copy was mailed on May 4 and received on May 7 or 8. A day or two later Avaritt gave Schwarz a copy of a petition containing the purported signatures of 13 drivers, with dates alongside the names, supporting decertification.[4]

c. The petitions

The first petition which Avaritt gave Schwarz on April 25 has the typewritten caption: "WE THE UNDERSIGN ARE HARLEY-DAVIDSON DRIVERS WISH TO LET YOU KNOW THAT WE DO NOT WANT TO BE REPRESENTED BY THE TEAMSTERS LOCAL 430 AT THIS TIME." Below the heading, in a column, are the following 12 signed names: Joe K. Avaritt Sr., Earle D. Snyder, Jim Heare, Earl S. Baer Jr., Clarence Frey, Walter Almony, Ben Schmittel, E. E. Worley, Lynn C. Kaufman, R. S. Pannebaker, J. Merle McLaughlin, and Richard A. Burk. None of the signatures were dated.

The second petition, which Avaritt gave Schwarz on May 7 or 8, has exactly the same typewritten heading as the first. However, below the heading are the further typewritten captions "NAME" and "DATE." In columns below the captions are the following 13 purported signatures and handwritten dates: Earle D. Snyder 4–19–83; Joe K. Avaritt Sr. 4–19–83; Monte Poff 4–19–83; Richard A. Burk 4–19–83; E. E. Worley 4–19–83; W. H. Tyson 4–19–83; J. Merle McLaughlin 4–19–83; David K. Burke 4–20–83; Clarence E. Frey 4–21–83; Earl S. Baer 4–21–83; B. H. Schmittel 4–21–83; Walter S. Almony Jr. 4–23–83; and Alvin W. Sprenkle 4–23–83. All 16 different names appearing on the two petitions were names of drivers then employed by Respondent.

Schwarz made no attempt to authenticate the signatures on the petitions. He testified that they looked familiar to him based on his experience reviewing the drivers' signed daily logs, that "the signatures were at a glance those of my people," and that "I had no reason to question them." At the hearing however, when presented with employees' W–4 forms signed in April 1982, Schwarz noted dissimilarities between the compared signatures of Richard Burk and stated, "It might have been a failing on my part" that he did not question the authenticity of the signatures.

Schwarz testified that until the hearing, when it was called to his attention, he found nothing curious about the fact that the dates entered on the second petition fell between April 19 and 23 even though the need for a second petition was not established until sometime after the first petition was presented to him on April 24 or 25.

d. Union membership

Testimony was sharply divided over whether the question of active union membership arose during the negotiating sessions. Bricker repeatedly maintained that the topic was not discussed; Schwarz recalls Respondent's attorney asking the question in the context of the union-security clause during the April 21 meeting. Schwarz remembers Bricker admitting that "none of the people on [3] The findings concerning this meeting are based on the uncontradicted testimony of Schwarz, who was present.

[4] There is some apparent confusion in the testimony of Schwarz as to the sequence of events. He testified that on May 5 he was contacted by a Board agent who told him that the petition was deficient because it lacked dates alongside the names and asked him to contact Avaritt so that Avaritt could remedy the deficiency. It seems unlikely the events occurred in the sequence described by Schwarz.

the fleet force were then members on a dues paying basis," that "they were on withdrawal cards." While Bricker denied that this conversation occurred, he acknowledged that since March or April all the drivers of Respondent—acting on Bricker's instructions—had taken out withdrawal cards. Bricker, at the hearing, explained that members were encouraged to take out "honorary withdrawal" cards for a 50-cent fee, during the period their unit was without a contract. Once a contract was signed, the members were expected to turn in the cards and "pick up their dues." Members on withdrawal cards lost some union benefits but retained the right to vote on a new contract. Bricker claims that he explained to Respondent, at negotiations, none of the mechanics of this process as he claimed that no discussion was held concerning union membership.

I have credited Schwarz whose version included specific details which were acknowledged at the hearing to be true (no drivers were dues-paying members; all were on withdrawal cards) and which were hardly self-serving, as these details, in the absence of testimony to the contrary by Schwarz, indicate that Schwarz was aware that the drivers had maintained their affiliation with the Union.

B. Concluding Findings

1. Did Respondent voluntarily recognize the Union?

In its January 19 letter to the Union, Respondent stated that it agreed to bargain as a result of the Regional Director's opinion that Respondent "may be a successor employer of Service Group, Incorporated" and noted that "[w]e do not acknowledge that Teamsters Local 430 represents a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit." In its brief, Respondent argues that it agreed to bargain only because it "inherited that obligation by virtue of the Board's successorship rule enunciated in NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972)."

Under Burns, absent a reasonably based good-faith doubt of an incumbent union's majority, a successor employer must recognize the continuing representative status of the union within an appropriate unit. See Landmark International Trucks, 257 NLRB 1375, 1378 (1981).

While Respondent may have refused to acknowledge expressly the Union's majority status, it clearly granted voluntary recognition to it as the exclusive representative of its employees. It thereby acknowledged that it lacked a reasonably based good-faith doubt of the Union's majority sufficient to overcome the presumption that the Union's majority continued among Respondent's employees after it succeeded SGI. Thus, Respondent acknowledged that the Union was presumed to represent a majority of its drivers and voluntarily recognized the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees.

2. Was the Union's majority status rebuttable before a reasonable period of bargaining time had elapsed?

Respondent contends that the settled rule, requiring an employer to bargain for a reasonable period with a voluntarily recognized union, does not apply to successor employers who recognize incumbent unions after expiration of the certification year. Rather, Respondent contends, in such a case the employer may withdraw recognition and cease bargaining whenever it forms a reasonably based good-faith doubt of the union's continuing majority

In Landmark International Trucks, 257 NLRB 1375 (1981), vacated and remanded 699 F.2d 815 (6th Cir. 1983), the Board held otherwise, stating: "We can discern no principle that would support distinguishing a successor employer's bargaining obligation based on voluntary recognition of a majority union from any other employer's duty to bargain for a reasonable period." 257 NLRB at 1375 fn. 4.

The court of appeals disagreed, and rejected the Board's holding. It reasoned as follows (699 F.2d at 818–819):

> There is no reason to treat a change in ownership of the employer as the equivalent of a certification or voluntary recognition of a union following an organization drive. In the latter cases the employees must be given an opportunity to determine the effectiveness of the union's representation free of any attempts to decertify or otherwise change the relationship. However, where the union has represented the employees for a year or more a change in ownership of the employer does not disturb the relationship between employees and the union. While the relationship between employees and employer is a new one, the relationship between employees and union is one of long standing. A successor's duty to continue recognition under such circumstances is no different from that of any other employer after the certification year expires. Recognition under these circumstances carries with it no irrebuttable presumption of continued majority status. When a successor employer recognizes a union which has been certified as the exclusive representative of employees of the predecessor employer for one year or more, there is a rebuttable presumption only that the union continues to have the support of a majority of the employees.

While the Board did not articulate the basis for its holding, there does appear to be a substantial basis for it. Although the court saw the relationship between the employees and the union as the only critical element and stated that a change in ownership did not disturb that relationship, the rationale for providing a reasonable period for bargaining following voluntary recognition draws from the rationale for the Board's certification year rule and focuses not only on the relationship between employees and union but on the relationship between union and employer and the effect upon bargaining of rules which permit withdrawal of recognition at any time. Thus, in Ray Brooks v. NLRB, 348 U.S. 96 (1954), among the reasons advanced and found persuasive to support the certification year rule were:

> (c) A union should be given ample time for carrying out its mandate on behalf of its members and should not be under exigent pressure to produce hothouse results or be turned out.

> (d) It is scarcely conducive to bargaining in good faith for an employer to know that, if he dillydallies or subtly undermines, union strength may erode and thereby relieve him of his statutory duties at any time, while if he works conscientiously toward agreement, the rank and file may, at the last moment, repudiate their agent. [348 U.S. at 100.]

In Keller Plastics Eastern, Inc., 157 NLRB 583, 588 (1966), the Board relied on Brooks and Franks Bros. Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 702 (1944), in holding that "the parties must be afforded a reasonable time to bargain and to execute the contracts resulting from such bargaining" following voluntary recognition. In NLRB v. Universal Gear Service Corp., 394 F.2d 396 (6th Cir. 1968), enfg. 157 NLRB 1169 (1966), the court of appeals agreed with the Board that the above quoted reasons from Brooks "have relevance to the problem presented in the instant case and support its determination that only if the parties can rely on the continuing representative status of the lawfully recognized union, at least for a reasonable period of time, can bargaining negotiations succeed and the policies of the Act be effectuated." 394 F.2d at 398. See also NLRB v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 399 F.2d 409 (7th Cir. 1968).

The focus on the bargaining relationship between union and employer is most strongly stated in the decision of the administrative law judge, adopted by the Board, in San Clemente Publishing Corp., 167 NLRB 6, 8 (1967):

> [I]t is . . . easy to visualize the obstruction to effective bargaining and denigration of statutory policy that could result if the employer in any of the given situations were permitted to repudiate his obligation solely because the union in question has lost majority status. Fluctuations in a labor force may cost a union its majority in the midst of pending bargaining; restore it a week or two later; remove it once more in another week or two; and return it still again after some such period . . . the result could be negotiations by fits and starts tailored to repeated fine measurements of a union's numbers, with attendant haggling over a range of matters such as . . . real or fancied problems of unit inclusion of new employees, or of the validity of the form in which they have designated the union; and accompanied by provocative pressures by one side or the other to compel agreement to a position, or dilatory dodges to prevent one, conditioned by the state of the union's numerical support in the unit at any given time. . . . This type of jousting would make for shackles and climates of friction in the bargaining process and would tend to frustrate the statutory aim of promoting industrial peace and stability.

As the Declaration of Policy in Section 1(b) of the Act recognizes, the relationships with which the Act deals are triangular and interrelated. The relationship between employees and union is not independent of the relationship between union and employer. In the case of a successor, while the same union represents the same employees, the introduction of a successor employer means that the established contractual relationship is ended. The negotiations between union and successor employer are not like the negotiation of a typical renewal agreement with a continuing employer where only selected issues are usually raised in the context of an otherwise established contractual framework. Rather, as the facts in this case show, all contract provisions are open, and the negotiations are in fact negotiations for an initial agreement. Absent protection of the bargaining relationship for a reasonable period of time following recognition by a successor employer, the same adverse impact on the bargaining process would follow as in the case of initial recognition.

While the Board's rule prevents withdrawal for a reasonable time following recognition, it does not bar an employer from denying recognition where a good-faith doubt is based on circumstances existing at the time recognition is sought. Holiday Inn of Niles Michigan, 241 NLRB 555, 559 (1979). The right to withdraw is lost only after recognition has been granted where the good-faith doubt is based on what has happened since negotiations commenced, either fluctuations in the work force or temporary swings in union support that may themselves reflect the momentary status of collective-bargaining negotiations. After a reasonable time for bargaining has elapsed, the right to withdraw recognition based on a good-faith doubt is restored. Thus, the right to withdraw recognition is suspended only for a reasonable period of time in which the interest in promoting collective bargaining outweighs it.

Here, 3 months elapsed between Respondent's takeover of the operations previously carried on by SGI and the Union's first claim of the right to represent the employees of Respondent as successor to SGI. Another 6 months elapsed before Respondent agreed to bargain with the Union. During the entire period Respondent made no claim that it had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority. After that 9-month hiatus a bargaining relationship was rightfully established, and it is not excessively restrictive of employers' or employees' rights to require that the bargaining relationship "be permitted to exist and function for a reasonable period in which it can be given a fair chance to succeed,"[5] without challenge based on doubts arising after bargaining began.

Accordingly, I find that after Respondent agreed to bargain with the Union in January 1983, it was obligated to bargain for a reasonable period of time without regard to any good-faith doubt it might acquire as to the Union's continuing majority.

3. Did Respondent bargain for a reasonable period before withdrawing recognition?

In determining what constitutes a reasonable bargaining period "[t]here are no rules" and "each case must rest upon its own individual facts." Thus, "reasonable time does not depend upon either the passage of time or the number of calendar days on which the parties met," but "the issue turns on what transpired during [the] meetings and what was accomplished therein." Brennan's Cadillac, Inc., 231 NLRB 225, 226 (1977). The fact that the parties reached impasse can cause an otherwise shorter time to be seen as reasonable. N. J. MacDonald & Sons, Inc., 155 NLRB 67, 71 (1965). However, "Generally, the Board will not find that an impasse has occurred unless the negotiations between the parties have been exhaustive." Betlem Service Corp., 268 NLRB 354 (1983).

Here, Respondent does not contend that impasse had been reached, but a suggestion was raised that irreconcilable differences existed between the parties as to union security and pensions. It is clear, however, that bargaining had been anything but exhaustive. The parties were negotiating for what was for them an initial contract. In approximately 7 hours of negotiations considerable progress was made with many compromises and changes in initial proposals.

At the conclusion of the April 21 meeting all unresolved issues were still on the table, both sides were still bargaining on many issues, and both parties intended to negotiate until a contract was reached. The Union was clearly optimistic; after the April 21 meeting the Union posted signs announcing that a vote on the contract would occur on May 22 following the scheduled May 16 session. While the 7 hours of negotiations were spread over a 3-month period, the timing of negotiating sessions was the result of scheduling conflicts and did not reflect any exhaustion of prospects for agreement. Based on the orderly and substantial progress in the three bargaining sessions that occurred and the indication that both parties looked forward to an equally fruitful fourth bargaining session, I conclude that a reasonable period for bargaining had not elapsed and, regardless of the difficulties that may have remained in the way of agreement on all issues, the parties were nowhere near impasse.

Accordingly, I find that Respondent was obligated to continue bargaining with the Union when it withdrew recognition from the Union and that Respondent's withdrawal from bargaining violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As I have found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit comprising its truckdrivers, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered, upon request, to bargain for a reasonable time with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

On the basis of the above findings of fact and the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Harley-Davidson Transportation Co., Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 430, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All truckdrivers employed by Respondent who are assigned to perform services at its York, Pennsylvania facility, excluding all clerks, dispatchers, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times since April 1, 1983, the Union has been, and now is, the exclusive representative of the employees in said unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing to recognize or bargain with the Union at all times on and after May 9, 1983, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment for the employees in the appropriate unit described above, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Lycee Francais de New York and United Federation of Teachers, Local No. 2, New York State United Teachers, American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO. Cases 2–CA–19291 and 2–RC–19215

23 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

Upon a charge filed by the Union 3 December 1982, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 18 January 1983 against the School (Lycee), the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that on 18 November 1982, following a Board election in Case 2–RC–19215, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the School's employees in the unit found appropriate. (Official notice is taken of the "record" in the representation proceeding as defined in the Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g), amended Sept. 9, 1981, 46 Fed.Reg. 45922 (1981); Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982).) The complaint further alleges that since 29 November 1982 the School has refused to bargain with the Union. On 31 January 1983 the School filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On 8 February 1983 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 10 February 1983 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The School filed a response.

The School's answer admits its refusal to bargain but attacks the validity of the certification based on its contention, set forth in its request for review and motion to reopen record in the representation proceeding, that the certified unit is not appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9 of the Act. The General Counsel argues that all material issues have previously been decided. Upon reconsideration, we have decided that review of the unit question was erroneously denied. Accordingly, the Board has reconsidered the issue under review in this case and makes the following findings.

Rulings on the Motion for Summary Judgment

The Employer (Lycee) is engaged in the operation of a private school offering a French curriculum for about 944 nursery, elementary, and secondary school students. The Lycee is accredited by the Board of Regents of the State of New York, the French Ministry of Education, and the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It offers the same comprehensive curriculum, in the French language, taught in French schools which leads to the French baccalaureate examination.

The Lycee employs about 83 teachers, 13 surveillants, 2 library aides, and 1 laboratory technician. Of these, 40 members of the faculty and a few surveillants and aides are exchange visitors. Exchange visitors are personnel from France who are assigned to the Lycee for up to 3 years. The Lycee contends that, contrary to the certificaton by the Board, the exchange visitors should be excluded from the unit as temporary employees or because they lack a community of interest with locally hired employees.

The locally hired employees and the exchange visitors share some significant terms and conditions of employment. All of the employees are hired by the president of the Lycee, who also evaluates them and renews their contracts. They all may participate in the Lycee's medical insurance program, are paid monthly, have yearly contracts, and receive the same gross wages and supplemental work payments. Both groups are supervised by the directors of their units, are required to meet with parents, and are required to attend parent and teacher meetings. They also share work and lounge areas and have the same holidays, vacations, and work year.

At the same time, there are significant differences in the employment conditions of the two groups. French nationals who wish to become exchange visitors file an application with the president of the Lycee. The president interviews some of the applicants in France and then chooses from among them. Those selected have a 1-year contract with the Lycee.[1]

Exchange visitors receive a $1200 travel allowance and $1000 allowance for settling costs. Their visas do not allow them to work anywhere other than the Lycee. Additionally, they are permitted to work only for 3 years within an exchange visitor program without special permission for an extension of time from U.S. immigration authorities. If no extension is forthcoming from the immigration authorities after 3 years, the employee must change

[1] Contracts of exchange visitors on leave from the French Ministry of Education must be approved by the Ministry. All but four or five of the exchange visitors are connected with the French Ministry of Education, and the ensuing discussion refers primarily to their terms and conditions of employment. No party contends that the few exchange visitors who are not in the Ministry of Education should be treated differently, in terms of unit determination, from those who are.

his or her immigration status in order to continue working in the United States. For 2 years the exchange visitors are not subject to local, state, or Federal taxes. Thereafter, the exemption is lost.

The exchange visitors are not eligible to participate in the Lycee's pension program since it requires 3 years of service at the Lycee. They continue to contribute to their own French government pension program. Their time spent working at the Lycee is credited toward their pension and seniority status in France. They work the same hours that they work in France and, according to regulation of the French Ministry of Education, cannot work additional hours.

The exchange visitors from the Ministry of Education continue to be covered by their French health care program, although they may participate in the Lycee's health plan if they desire. Should they become ill and unable to work during their term at the Lycee, exchange visitors are paid until the end of their contract.

Significantly, the exchange visitors from the Ministry of Education are evaluated by inspector generals from the Ministry. The Lycee does not receive a copy of the inspector general's evaluation, but it becomes a part of the teacher's record in France. Moreover, the Ministry exchange visitors can only be discharged with permission of the Ministry of Education. The exchange visitors are required to comply with French statutes which establish the rules of their profession. They also are required, if selected, to sit on juries testing candidates for French baccalaureates. For the latter task the exchange visitors are paid by the French embassy rather than the Lycee.

In contrast, the locally hired employees average 8 to 9 years with the Lycee, although some have been employed there for 20 or 25 years. They are eligible for a deferred compensation plan after 3 years of employment. They have pension and medical insurance plans. Unlike the Ministry exchange visitors, the hours of locally hired employees are based on the type and level of education degree so that teachers with lesser degrees are required to work more hours than those with higher degrees. Locally hired employees are given 3 months of sick leave with full pay and 3 months at half salary, but do not have the contractual arrangement afforded exchange visitors. Similarly, the few exchange visitors not from the Ministry of Education and locally hired employees may be discharged by the president of the Lycee and are evaluated solely by either the Lycee's director of studies or by the director of their unit.

These facts demonstrate that the interests of the exchange visitors diverge from those of the locally hired employees in several significant ways. Although their gross salaries are the same, those of the exchange visitors are not subject to United States' taxes for 2 years, which is as long as most of the exchange visitors stay at the Lycee. Exchange visitors have their own pension and health plans, although they may participate in the Lycee health plan also if they desire. Their time at the Lycee is credited to their pension and seniority status in France. At the same time, exchange visitors by virtue of the duration of their employment are not eligible for the Lycee's deferred compensation plan. Most of the exchange visitors come from the Ministry of Education and, thus, their contracts, hours, and work performance are subject to standards of the Ministry. Moreover, they are evaluated by inspector generals from the Ministry and cannot be discharged without permission of the Ministry. Pursuant to United States' immigration laws, the duration of the exchange visitors' employment is limited, and they are not permitted to work anywhere but the Lycee.[2]

As noted by the Regional Director, the exchange visitors do share some terms and conditions of employment with the locally hired employees. Upon reconsideration, however, we have concluded that the instances when the interests of the exchange visitors diverge from or are in conflict with those of the locally hired employees are fundamental and outweigh the instances of shared concerns. Thus, when viewed in the totality, the community of interest between the exchange visitors and the locally hired employees is insufficient to warrant the inclusion of the exchange visitors in the unit.[3]

ORDER

It is ordered that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment be denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed and that the certification issued in Case 2–RC–19215 on 18 November 1982 be revoked, and the election conducted therein on 9 November 1982 be set aside and that the representation proceeding be remanded to the Regional Director for Region 2 for appropriate action consistent herewith.

[2] This factor is of possible relevance in the event of a strike.

[3] In view of our finding regarding community of interest, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether the exchange visitors are temporary employees. Additionally, we note that while German School Society, 260 NLRB 1250 (1982), is distinguishable in that there the "assigned" teachers from the Federal Republic of Germany shared the same hours and hiring procedures with the locally hired teachers, to the extent that our decision there is inconsistent with our decision here it is overruled.

Indiana & Michigan Electric Company and Local Union No. 1392, International Brotherhood Of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 25–CA–10346

23 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 17 December 1979 Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The stipulated facts in brief are as follows. The Union and the Respondent have a collective-bargaining agreement which covers, inter alia, the line department of the Respondent's Marion-Muncie Division. This agreement contains an article entitled "Mutual Responsibilities," to wit:

MUTUAL RESPONSIBILITIES

Section 1. It is the mutual desire of both parties hereto to provide for uninterrupted and continuous service; therefore,

a. The Company agrees that while this Contract is in effect, there shall be no lockout of the Employees of the Company.
b. The Union agrees that while this Contract is in effect none of its members will cause, directly or indirectly or participate in any strike, or stoppage of work of the Company.

Section 2. The Union agrees that, in the event of a violation (other than lockout) of the provisions of the foregoing paragraph, it will in good faith and without delay publicly disavow such violation, exert itself to bring about a quick termination of such violation and insist that the employee or employees involved cease such violation. To that end the Union will promptly take whatever affirmative action is necessary. If the Union has not authorized, participated in or condoned such violation and fulfills its obligations under this paragraph with respect to any such violation, the Company agrees that it will not sue the Union for any damages resulting from such violation.

On 21 August 1978 about 15 employees in the line department engaged in an unauthorized work stoppage in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement. The Union's highest official at the division, Unit Chairman Baldridge, along with two stewards, Maxwell and Ridley, participated in the work stoppage. Baldridge and Maxwell ceased work shortly after the walkout began. Ridley failed to report to work after discovering that the line department employees had left the premises. None of the union officials instigated the work stoppage.

On 25 August 16 line employees received suspension notices and/or warning slips from the Respondent. Baldridge received only a written warning for failing to report to his supervisor before leaving, but was not suspended because the Respondent's investigation revealed that his failure to report to work on 21 August was for the purpose of attempting to get the striking employees to return to work. Two employees received 5-day suspensions because they induced other employees to participate in the work stoppage. The remaining employees, except for Maxwell and Ridley, received 3-day suspensions essentially for participating in the work stoppage. Maxwell and Ridley received 5-day suspensions for participating in the stoppage in "total disregard of your obligation as a Union Steward."

The judge in effect concluded that by holding the union stewards to a higher standard of conduct than other rank-and-file employees the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We disagree.

The issue was considered recently by the Supreme Court in Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983). In Metropolitan Edison, the Court held that an employer may impose greater discipline on union officials only when the collective-bargaining agreement and circumstances surrounding the collective-bargaining relationship indicate the union has waived its officials' Section 7 rights to the extent that the officials have an affirmative duty to prevent illegal work stoppages.[1] There the parties' collective-bargaining agreement contained a general no-strike/no-lockout clause. Two earlier arbitration awards had interpreted a similar clause as imposing a higher duty on union officials to enforce the no-strike obligation. These arbitration awards, however, were rendered under prior contracts, and the agreement in force at the time of the alleged unfair labor practice contained a provision stating that "[a] decision [by an arbitrator] shall be binding . . . for the term of this agreement" (emphasis added). 460 U.S. at 709. In this context the Court held that the union had not clearly and explicitly waived the Section 7 rights of its employee officials. Therefore, the employer violated Section 8(a)(3) by disciplining the employee officials for failing or refusing to take affirmative steps to end the unlawful work stoppage.

While finding that the union had not bound the union officials to enforce the no-strike clause, the Court concluded that since "[n]o-strike provisions, central to national labor policy, often have proven difficult to enforce"[2] a "union and an employer reasonably could choose to secure the integrity of a no-strike clause by requiring union officials to take affirmative steps to end unlawful work stoppages."[3] Indeed, the Court found that a union lawfully may bargain away the statutory protection accorded union officials in order to secure gains it considers of more value to its members, and that such contractual obligations promote labor peace and clearly fall within the range of reasonableness accorded bargaining representatives.

With regard to the specificity required for a finding that a union has waived union officials' rights, the Court found on the record before it that there was no showing that the parties intended to incorporate the two prior arbitration decisions into the subsequent agreement, particularly in light of the provision restricting the binding effect of arbitration decisions to the term of the agreement. Accordingly, the Court considered that the general no-strike clause alone was insufficiently clear to constitute a waiver. Nevertheless, the Court stated that arbitration decisions may be relevant to establishing waiver of the statutory right in question either when an arbitrator has stated that the bargaining agreement clearly and unmistakably imposes an explicit duty or when there is a clear and consistent pattern of arbitration decisions which may be said to have been incorporated in subsequent agreements.[4] The Court thus held that a waiver may be established by circumstances surrounding the collective-bargaining relationship as well as by the language of the agreement itself. "Assessing the clarity with which a party's duties have been defined . . . will require consideration of the specific circumstances of each case."[5]

Turning to the instant case, we find a contract clause which unequivocally requires the Union to disavow publicly an unlawful strike and take whatever affirmative action is necessary to bring about a quick termination of such a strike. To find that this clause imposes no greater duty on union officials than they would have without it would be to misconstrue both the scope and intent of the Supreme Court's opinion in Metropolitan Edison. Nothing in the Supreme Court's opinion in Metropolitan Edison or the Third Circuit decision which it affirmed indicates that the courts intended to require specificity with regard to the naming of union officials as opposed to specificity regarding what affirmative action can be expected of the union by and through its officials in the event of an unlawful strike. Indeed, all indications are to the contrary.

The Supreme Court defined the question before it as follows: "[W]hether an employer unilaterally may define the actions a union official is required to take to enforce a no-strike clause and penalize him for his failure to comply."[6] (Emphasis added.) One need only look at the facts in Metropolitan Edison to interpret this statement. There, unlike here, the no-strike clause was merely a general clause which imposed no affirmative obligation on the union. Moreover, the union officials who were disparately disciplined, unlike those in the instant case, did take conscientious affirmative steps to bring the walkout to an end—though not the steps the employer deemed necessary. In particular, the courts focused on the employer's decision that the union officials must cross the picket line, a requirement the courts regarded as especially problematical for union officials and possibly counterproductive in terms of ending the walkout. Nowhere is there any indication that the courts were concerned with an employer unilaterally determining which officials, if any, should represent the union. That the courts did not express such a concern is not surprising—it has long been well established that a union, like an employer, acts through its agents.[7] Indeed, it would be a radical departure from longstanding precedent to hold that contractual or other obligations imposed on unions or employers must be explicitly designated as the responsibility of specified officials or agents. Nor is it surprising that the courts consistently used the term "union officials" instead of "union" when describing the specificity necessary for a waiver of Section 7 rights. The union cannot act but through its agents.[8]

[3] Id. at 707.
[4] Id. at 709 fn. 13.
[5] Id. at 709.

[6] Id. at 700.
[7] Indeed, since the 1947 amendments to the Act, Sec. 2(2) has defined the term "employer" as including "any person acting as an agent," and Sec. 8(b) has applied to acts committed by "a labor organization or its agents." As Senator Taft stated, "What is a labor organization? It is an organization with officers, exactly like a corporation." 93 Cong.Rec. 4142 (1947), reprinted in 2 Leg. Hist. 1026 (LMRA 1948).
[8] Although the Board specifies that a union's "officers, agents, and representatives" are responsible for effectuating the Board's order, this fact is of little relevance since the Board inserts a similar provision referring to "officers, agents, successors, and assigns" in its orders against employers. And, no one would question seriously the responsibility of an employer's officials for carrying out the employer's obligations, contractual or otherwise. See Riley Aeronautics Corp., 178 NLRB 495, 501 (1969).

Thus, we conclude that the Supreme Court in Metropolitan Edison found that affirmative action cannot be required of the union and its officials unless such a requirement is bargained for. Nevertheless, in our view the Court clearly left open the question of what contractual language would suffice to constitute such a waiver. The Court merely held that the general "no-strike" language in that case was not enough. Here, the contract unequivocally imposed an affirmative duty to take steps to terminate the unlawful walkout. Since Union Stewards Maxwell and Ridley here not only took no action to halt the work stoppage but actually participated in it, we need not speculate as to what particular language would be necessary to require those union officials to take particular actions. Clearly, Maxwell and Ridley have not fulfilled their contractual obligations even under the most narrow construction of this contract.

In view of the foregoing, we find that the Union has clearly assumed the duty to attempt to prevent unlawful strikes and has thereby waived its employee officers' Section 7 protection from the Employer's disparate discipline for failing to do so. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by disparately disciplining Stewards Maxwell and Ridley, and we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Fort Wayne, Indiana, on August 27, 1979, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on November 13, 1978, by Local Union No. 1392, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union), and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 25 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on December 20, 1978.[1]

The complaint alleges that Indiana & Michigan Electric Company (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discriminatorily disciplining union stewards for their participation in an unprotected work stoppage. Respondent, by its timely filed answer, denies the substantive allegations of the complaint.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs were filed by Respondent and the General Counsel and have been carefully considered.

On the entire record, including the stipulations entered into by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent is an Indiana corporation engaged at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and other locations within the States of Indiana and Michigan in the production, sale, and transmission of electrical energy as a public utility. Jurisdiction is not in issue. The complaint alleges, Respondent has admitted, and I find and conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent has admitted, and I find and conclude that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Stipulated Facts

The Union represents certain employees of Respondent in four separate units, each having its own collective-bargaining agreement. The events involved in this case occurred in Muncie, Indiana, at Respondent's Marion-Muncie Division.

The collective-bargaining agreement for Marion-Muncie in effect at the time involved herein provided at article III as follows:

> Section 1. It is the mutual desire of both parties hereto to provide for uninterrupted and continuous service; therefore, > a. The Company agrees that while this Contract is in effect, there shall be no lockout of the Employees of the Company.
> b. The Union agrees that while this Contract is in effect none of its members will cause, directly or indirectly or participate in any strike, or stoppage of work of the Company.
> Section 2. The Union agrees that, in the event of any violation (other than lockout) of the provisions of the foregoing paragraph, it will in good faith and without delay publicly disavow such violation, exert itself to bring about a quick termination of such violation and insist that the employee or employees involved cease such violation. To that end the Union will promptly take whatever affirmative action is necessary. If the Union has not authorized,

[1] Pursuant to an Order dated August 3, 1979, this case was consolidated for hearing with Case 25–CA–8593 involving the same parties but distinct issues, and the two cases were presented seriatim. However, as resolution of the issues involved in Case 25–CA–8593 may potentially be affected by, and must therefore await, disposition of the Employer's petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari in the substantially similar case of Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 229 NLRB 576 (1977), Supplemental Decision and Order at 235 NLRB 1128 (1978), enfd. 599 F.2d 185 (7th Cir. 1979), and as the issues of this case arise under Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, affect individual employees, and are subject to immediate resolution, I have determined, sua sponte, to sever the two cases for decisional purposes in order to avoid unnecessary delay.

participated in or condoned such violation and fulfills its obligations under this paragraph with respect to any such violation, the Company agrees that it will not sue the Union for any damages resulting from such violation.

The Union's highest official at the Marion-Muncie Division was its unit chairman Phillip Baldridge. Six employees served as union stewards. Baldridge and two of the stewards, Robert Maxwell and Keith Ridley, worked in the line department, the department involved in the instant dispute.

On August 21, 1978,[2] about 15 employees in the line department engaged in an unauthorized work stoppage in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement. The work stoppage lasted from 8 a.m. until 7:30 the following morning.

Baldridge and Maxwell participated in the work stoppage to the extent that both ceased work and left Respondent's premises shortly after the walkout began. Ridley participated to the extent that he failed to report to work at his scheduled starting time on that day after discovering, on his arrival, that the line department employees had left the premises. The work stoppage was not instigated by either Baldridge, Maxwell, or Ridley.

On August 25, Respondent issued disciplinary suspension notices and/or warning slips to 16 line department employees (a 17th discipline was issued in error and was subsequently rescinded). Of these, Unit Chairman Baldridge received merely a written warning for failing to report to his supervisor before leaving the premises, but no suspension because the Company's investigation revealed that his failure to work on August 21 was for the purpose of attempting to secure the return to work of the striking employees. Two employees, not union officers or stewards, received 5-day suspensions because the Employer believed that they had induced other employees to participate in the work stoppage. The remaining employees, except for Ridley and Maxwell, received 3-day suspensions for "Participating in a stoppage of work on August 21, 1978, in direct violation of Article III of the Agreement and the Company's Rules of Conduct." Union Stewards Ridley and Maxwell received 5-day suspension notices stating:

> Participating in a stoppage of work on August 21, 1978 in direct violation of Article III of the Agreement and the Company's Rules of Conduct. Your participation indicated a total disregard of your obligation as a Union Steward, to uphold the provisions of the Agreement to which the Union is a party and to refrain from condoning, by your own actions, the violation of that Agreement.

During the investigative interviews conducted with Ridley and Maxwell, Respondent informed them that, as stewards, they had a greater responsibility than the rank-and-file employees to stop an unauthorized work stoppage in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement and to secure the return of the striking employees. Based on those interviews, it was stipulated, Respondent had reason to believe that neither Ridley nor Maxwell took any action to secure the return to work of the striking employees.[3]

The employees served the suspensions assessed against them.

B. The Prior Case

The parties stipulated that Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 237 NLRB 226 (1978), enf. denied 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979), involved the same parties and the same issue, arising from an earlier unauthorized work stoppage in violation of the collective-agreement at a different location and in a different bargaining unit.[4] In that earlier case, the Board, adopting the administrative law judge's decision, rejected Respondent's contention that "stewards and the union officials have a greater responsibility to the Employer than do ordinary rank-and-file members to uphold the collective-bargaining agreement particularly Article III, and that Article III should be construed as to set forth that union officials are to be subject to a more severe punishment for breach of same." It refused to require, as urged by Respondent, that the contract should be read so as to require stewards to take positive action to halt unauthorized work stoppages. The Board decision was based on its earlier holding in Precision Castings Co., 233 NLRB 183 (1977). Therein, the Board had stated, at 183–184, as follows:

> The fact that the disciplined employees participated in an unauthorized strike in breach of a valid contract provision does not legitimatize Respondent's action in this situation. Respondent's freedom to discipline anyone remained unfettered so long as the criteria employed were not union-related. In the case before us, however, Respondent admits that the reason for selecting these five employees for discipline was that each held the position of shop steward and, therefore, under the terms of the contract, could assertedly be held to a greater degree of accountability for participating in the strike. However, discrimination directed against an employee on the basis of his or her holding union office is contrary to the plain meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and would frustrate the policies of the Act if allowed to stand.

[2] All dates hereinafter are 1978 unless otherwise specified.

[3] In a similar unauthorized work stoppage in violation of the contract occurring on April 24, among other employees of the Marion-Muncie Division, all participating employees, including stewards, received warning notices. The steward of that department, who participated in the work stoppage, received no greater discipline than the other employees "since the Respondent has reason to believe that the steward took efforts to secure the return to work of striking employees."

[4] The only distinguishing factor between that case and the instant case was that in the "Mutual Responsibilities" article of the contract involved in the earlier case there was no language requiring the Union to "promptly take whatever affirmative action is necessary to "bring about a quick termination of" a work stoppage in violation of the agreement. The article involved in the earlier case provided that the Union agreed "that the employees covered by this Agreement, or any of them WILL NOT be called upon or permitted to cease or abstain from the continuous performance of the duties pertaining to the position held by them with the Company."

As noted, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit denied enforcement to the Board's Order in the Indiana & Michigan Electric case. The court stated (599 F.2d at 232):

> Differentiating between union officers and rank-and-file in meting out discipline for participating in a clearly illegal strike did not penalize or deter the exercise of any protected employee right. We believe the employer was entitled to take into account the union officials' greater responsibility and hence greater fault, and that the resulting different treatment of union officials could not be reasonably considered inherently destructive of important employee rights.

The Board did not seek certiorari review in the Supreme Court.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

The Board has repeatedly stated, "Under [our] consistent policy it is the Administrative Law Judge's duty to apply established Board precedent which the Board or the Supreme Court has not reversed." Club Cal-Neva, 231 NLRB 22, 23 fn. 5 (1977), and cases cited therein. See also Ford Motor Co., 230 NLRB 716 (1977),[5] where the Board, at 718 fn. 12, stated:

> By relying on U.S. court of appeals' decisions which are contrary to applicable Board precedent, the Administrative Law Judge in this case has committed an error. It is not for an Administrative Law Judge to speculate as to what course the Board should or would follow where a circuit court has expressed disagreement with the Board's views. That is the province of the Board alone. It remains the Administrative Law Judge's duty to apply established Board precedent which the Supreme Court or the Board has not reversed.

I am therefore bound to follow the relevant Board precedent on the issues raised herein.

While, as noted, the Board in the earlier case herein found Precision Castings controlling and determinative of an 8(a)(3) and (1) violation, Respondent contends that the Board's most recent decision on this question, Midwest Precision Castings Co., 244 NLRB 597 (1979), evidences a modification of the Board view. Respondent argues, based on that latter case, that "all members of the Board now appear to recognize that a union steward may, under appropriate circumstances, be held to 'a higher standard of conduct than rank-and-file employees.'" I cannot agree that this is the import of Midwest Precision Castings. The Board expressly distinguished the steward's conduct in that case from the conduct of the union officers in both Precision Castings and Gould Co., 237 NLRB 881 (1978). In Midwest Precision Castings the Board specifically found that the steward "urged support of and sought to induce employee participation in an unauthorized, illegal work slowdown" and held that the employer did not violate Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act by disciplining the steward for engaging in such conduct. No such involvement existed in the original Precision Castings case or in the Gould case and none exists herein. I must therefore conclude that this case is governed by the Board decisions and rationale in Precision Castings and Gould.

In the instant case, unlike the situation in the prior Indiana & Michigan case, the contract provided that "the Union will promptly take whatever affirmative action is necessary" to bring about a quick termination of any violation of the no-strike, no-work-stoppage clause. That language is similar to the contract language involved in Precision Castings, supra, which required the union to "take all reasonable steps to restore normal operations" in the event of a work stoppage. It is less precise than the language contained in the Gould contract, which specifically provided that the union, its officers, and representatives should immediately order employees participating in an unlawful work stoppage to return to work. The Board in both Precision Castings and Gould held that the greater discipline assessed upon the union officers was not validated by such contractual provisions. In Gould it stated:

> The contract is binding between the Employer and the Union, but does not grant the Employer the power to enforce it by discharging union officials. The Employer's recourse is against the union entity rather than against the individuals who serve the unit by holding union office. Employer self-help against individual union officials for a union's breach of contract can only undermine the peaceful settling of disputes and clears a path for employer intervention in a union's internal affairs in a way that is specifically barred to unions in the corollary situation by Section 8(b)(1)(B), which prohibits restraint or coercion of an employer in the selection of his representatives for collective bargaining or adjusting grievances.

That rationale is specifically supported by the contract language involved herein, which provides: "If the Union has not authorized, participated in or condoned such violation and fulfills its obligations under this paragraph with respect to any such violation, the Company agrees that it will not sue the Union for any damages resulting from such violation." It is implicit from such contract language that the contemplated recourse available to the Employer for breach of the Union's no-strike obligations is through the courts in an action against the Union, as an entity, and not in such self-help measures as Employer-imposed discipline on union officers and stewards.

It is axiomatic that organizations, such as labor unions, must have officers in order to function. Individuals assume the responsibilities of organizational office expecting to shoulder certain burdens and to derive certain tangible and intangible benefits from the organization. In so doing, they subject themselves to the discipline of the organization. They should not have to fear that those with whom they must deal as representatives of their organization will similarly have the power to unilaterally impose discipline. The Board has recognized this, stating (in the context of grievance processing) that the master-servant relationship does not carry over to the dealings between the employer and the employee when the employee is acting as a union representative; at such times, there are only company representatives on the one side and union representatives on the other. See Crown Central Petroleum Corp., 177 NLRB 322, 323 fn. 4 (1969). The possibility that an employee might suffer a penalty exacted out of his or her job tenure for what an employer perceives to be a misuse of union office or a breach of its contract with the union would, I am convinced, act as a powerful deterrent to an employee's willingness to assume or actively pursue a leadership role in a union.

[5] Both Club Cal-Neva and Ford Motor involved decisions of the circuit courts of appeals for the circuits in which the employers' facilities were located.

Accordingly, I find that by holding union officers and stewards to a higher standard of conduct than other, rank-and-file, employees, and by disciplining Maxwell and Ridley more severely than it disciplined rank-and-file employees who engaged in identical improper conduct, Respondent has discriminated against them because of their roles in the Union and has necessarily discouraged employees from holding union office. Such conduct is inherently discriminatory and destructive of important Section 7 rights and, even absent any showing of specific union animus, violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. See NLRB v. Great Dane Trailer, 388 U.S. 26 (1967), and NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375 (1967). See also Crown Central Petroleum Corp., supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By giving more severe discipline to Robert Maxwell and Keith Ridley than was given to other employees who participated in the August 21, 1978 violation of the contractual no-strike provision, because said Robert Maxwell and Keith Ridley were stewards for Local Union No. 1392, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

2. The unfair labor practice enumerated above is an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, it will be recommended that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent discriminatorily assigned greater discipline to Robert Maxwell and Keith Ridley by suspending them for longer periods of time than other employees who participated in the work stoppage of August 21, 1978, Respondent shall be required to make them whole for any loss of pay they suffered by reason of this discrimination. Any backpay found to be due shall be computed, with interest, in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[6]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 17 December 1980 Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondents filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

On 7 August 1978 members of Teamsters Locals 287 and 315 employed by the Respondents began an unsanctioned economic strike against the Respondents. Thereafter by letter dated 9 August 1978, Retail Clerks Locals 428 and 1179 (the Unions) informed their members that the Central Labor Council had sanctioned the Teamsters strike and advised that: (1) members were not to cross a picket line; (2) if members were requested to work and no bona fide picket line was present, they were authorized to go to work; and (3) if the picket line showed up later, members were to complete their shift unless they had to leave the store, but they were not to cross the line and reenter. The letter also solicited all members to fully support the strike. By letter dated 7 and 8 September, the Unions notified their members that the strike sanction had been withdrawn on 7 September. The strike lasted, however, until about 27 November 1978.

The Respondents had a discretionary policy, not challenged by the Union, of disciplining employees for taking unauthorized or unexcused absences. On 14 August 1978, by letter mailed to all employees and posted in all stores, the Respondents advised their employees as follows concerning their participation in the sympathy strike: "If there is picketing at your store, it is your individual choice to work or not to work . . . . If striking Teamsters have not placed a picket line at your store you are expected to work as scheduled or be subject to disciplinary action. . . . Should pickets appear after you have started your shift, you may finish your shift . . . ."[2] Pursuant to this policy the Respondents discharged 15 employees during the course of the sympathy strike because they refused to work when no pickets were present at their respective worksites. The Respondents also discharged five employees who failed to report for work after the strike sanctions were lifted.[3]

The Union filed grievances on behalf of all these employees and pursuant to the contractual grievance/arbitration procedures a board of adjustment was convened to consider the grievances. Several meetings were held and testimony was given by the affected employees, union officials, and the Respondents' store managers. The board of adjustment deadlocked on a mutually agreeable solution. As a result of private discussions between representatives of the Respondents and the Unions on 25 October, an agreement was reached whereby 15 of the employees would be reinstated without backpay and 4 would be considered voluntary quits.[4] As found by the judge, when the employees were apprised of the terms of the agreement, they were "displeased" with the refusal of backpay, but voted to accept the offer. They also decided among themselves to pursue backpay through unfair labor practice charges filed with the Board. The reinstatement occurred on 29 October.[5]

Meanwhile on various dates in October 1978, eight of the dischargees who ultimately were reinstated filed the instant labor charges alleging that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees because of their protected activities. Regarding the 15 employees who were discharged because they failed to report for work during the sanctioned period of the strike, the judge found that deferral to the settlement agreement was improper under Spielberg[6] because

[1] The General Counsel and the Respondents have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge found that the Respondents' letter violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act because it interfered with employees' Sec. 7 rights to engage in such strikes. In view of our deferral to the settlement agreement regarding the discharge allegations we find the violation based on the 14 August letter standing alone to be de minimis and not requiring a notice posting. Accordingly, we shall dismiss it.

[3] One other employee who quit on 12 August 1978 thereafter did not seek reinstatement.

[4] These determinations were not based on whether the employee had failed to report for work during or after the sanctioned period; e.g., four of five employees who failed to report after the sanctioned period were to be reinstated.

[5] In November 1978, one other employee was classified as a voluntary quit and in January 1979 one other employee was reinstated.

[6] Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955).

the discharge grievances had not been pursued to arbitration. Further finding that there had been no waiver of the employees' statutory right to engage in sympathy strikes, the judge found that the discharges were unlawful and therefore deferral to the settlement agreement—insofar as it covered those employees—would also be repugnant to the Act. However, regarding the five employees who had been discharged for failing to report for work after the strike sanction was lifted, the judge found that those discharges were lawful, and therefore the settlement agreement was not repugnant to the Act insofar as it covered those five employees.

In deciding whether deferral principles should apply to settlements arising from the parties' contractual grievance/arbitration procedures, we find the views of former Member Penello in his dissent in Roadway Express, 246 NLRB 174, 177 (1979), to be instructive. Member Penello stated:

> Deferral in general will encourage parties . . . to negotiate rather than to litigate their differences. The establishment of grievance-arbitration procedures has been a major factor in promoting and achieving industrial stability and peace, encouraging parties to use such procedures will further the fundamental purposes of the Act. I believe that the Spielberg tests for deferral apply to grievance settlements as well as arbitration awards . . . .
> As an administrative agency the Board should not take a narrow, legalistic view of the Act and seek to rule on every dispute that may fall within the letter of the Act, but should instead take a broad view of the Act and seek to further the spirit and purpose of the Act. The Board should encourage employers and unions to negotiate their differences arising during the term of their bargaining agreement, to discuss and settle grievances, and, if necessary, to arbitrate their differences.

We agree with former Member Penello that the deferral principles apply equally to settlements arising from the parties' contractual grievance/arbitration procedures because they further the national labor policy which favors private resolutions of labor disputes.[7] These deferral principles of Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), and Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), were recently reaffirmed in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), and Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983). We particularly note that in Olin, supra, the Board stated its commitment to a policy of full, consistent, and evenhanded deference to the deferral process where appropriate safeguards for statutory rights are satisfied.

Applying these principles to the instant case we still defer to the settlement agreement. Our determination is based on the following. The grievance proceedings were fair and regular, and the settlement was made under the contract's grievance procedure. All parties had agreed to be bound, including the employees. Although the employees were not themselves involved in the settlement negotiations, they were fully informed as to the specific terms of the proposed settlement by the Unions. Indeed, the Unions left the final decision of acceptance or rejection of the proposed settlement up to the employees, who knew that it did not contain any provision for backpay. Instead of rejecting the settlement on that basis, and without expressing any dissatisfaction to the Respondents, the employees authorized the Unions to accept the settlement agreement on their behalf. Thus, the employees were bound by their acts and those of their collective-bargaining representative.

We further find that the General Counsel has failed to carry his burden of proving that the results of the settlement agreement are "clearly repugnant" to the principles and policies of the Act. In Olin Corp., above, the Board stated that, in determining if an arbitrator's award is clearly repugnant, the test to be applied is not whether the Board would have reached the same result, but whether the award is "palpably wrong" as a matter of law. Thus, the Board's concern in a possible deferral situation is to ensure that its decision does not impinge on the parties' rights under the Act. Here, we find that the settlement of the contractual grievances was not "palpably wrong" under the law, particularly because it resulted from negotiations between the Respondents and the Unions within the context of the agreed-upon grievance/arbitration procedures.

It is clear that the settlement agreement was intended to resolve the parties' contractual dispute over the discharge of employees who failed to report for work in connection with a sympathy strike. To resolve this contractual dispute, the Union could—if they felt it necessary—waive the employees' statutory rights. Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983). The terms of this agreement suggest that both the Respondents and the Unions made concessions in order to settle the grievances without going to arbitration, with the Unions primarily concerned with getting the employees' jobs back. We note that the employees may have authorized the Unions to accept the settlement agreement solely because they wished to pursue the matter of backpay before the Board, but we find that to be insufficient to prove that the settlement of the grievances is repugnant to the Act.

Based on all the foregoing, we shall defer to the settlement agreement in this case. Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL L. STEVENS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried on various dates in May and August 1980,[1] in Campbell and Oakland, California. Charges were filed by the Charging Parties[2] as follows:

32-CA-1275—10/3/78—Beth Mahon
32-CA-1313—10/19/78—Terry Rendon
32-CA-1332-1-10/27/78—Florence O'Day
32-CA-1332-2-10/27/78—Norma L. Meyers
32-CA-1332-3—10/27/78—Carol A. Mitchum
32-CA-1332-4—10/27/78—Richard W. Hutson
32-CA-1332-5—10/30/78—Linda T. Parrette
32-CA-1405—10/30/78—Josie Melendez

By order dated May 22, 1979, the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) consolidated Cases 32-CA-1275, 32-CA-1313, and 32-CA-1332-1-5 and filed a complaint[3] alleging that Alpha Beta Company (Respondent Alpha Beta) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act). The complaint in Case 32-CA-1405, dated May 22, 1979, alleges that Ralph's Grocery Company (Respondent Ralph's)[4] violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Respondents' answer to the consolidated complaint is dated June 1, 1979. The answer admits jurisdiction, denies the substantive allegation of the complaint, and interposes affirmative defenses. The answer was amended July 19, 1979, relative to Case 32-CA-1405, and further was amended at trial to add another affirmative defense. By order dated August 13, 1979, the Acting Regional Director for Region 32 consolidated Case 32-CA-1405 with all cases previously consolidated. Both complaints were amended May 2, 1980, to add the names of three individuals as agents of Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record,[5] and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent Alpha Beta is now, and at all times material herein has been, a corporation duly organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of California, with places of business located in various locations throughout California, including facilities in Danville, San Jose, and Sunnyvale, California, where it is engaged in the distribution and retail sale of grocery products and related items.

Respondent Ralph's is now, and at all times material herein has been, a corporation duly organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of California, where it does business at various locations, including San Jose, California, where it is engaged in the retail sale and distribution of grocery products and related items.

During the past 12 months, Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's, in the course and conduct of their business operations, each derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and purchased and received goods or services valued in excess of $5000 which originated outside the State of California.

I find that Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's are, and each of them is now, and at all times material herein have been, employers engaged in commerce and in businesses affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

Retail Clerks Union, Local 1179 and Local 428, AFL-CIO (Locals 1179 and 428)[6] are, and each of them is, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background Summary[7]

Local 428, located in San Jose, California, and Local 1179, located in Martinez, California, are part of the Retail Clerks Bay Area Council which has engaged in bargaining on a multiunion basis since 1970 with the Food Employers Council (FEC), which represents the major retail grocery store chains in the Bay area, including Alpha Beta, Ralph's, Safeway, Albertson's Lucky, Brentwood, P & W, and Cala Markets, in all labor matters including contract negotiations and grievance handling. The Retail Clerks locals which bargain with FEC in addition to Locals 428 and 1179 are the following: San Francisco, Local 648; San Mateo, Local 775; Alameda,

[1] All dates hereinafter are within 1978, unless stated to be otherwise.

[2] Individuals are referred to herein by their last names.

[3] A minor amendment was made at trial, with my permission, and an 8(a)(1) allegation was added, with similar leave, to charge a violation by Respondent in stating in a letter to employees dated August 14, 1978 (R. Exh. 7): "If striking Teamsters have not placed a picket line at your store, you're expected to work as scheduled or be subject to disciplinary action."

[4] When the context so indicates, the two Respondents sometimes are not named separately, but rather, are referred to simply as Respondent, or as Respondents.

[5] The General Counsel's motion to correct transcript was not opposed, and is granted.

[6] Where the context so indicates, the two Locals sometimes are referred to as the Union, or the Unions.

[7] This background summary is based on stipulations of counsel for the parties, credited testimony, and evidence not in dispute.

Local 870; Vallejo, Local 373; and Marin, Local 1119. Although bargaining is conducted on a multiunion-multiemployer basis, each local separately has signed agreements with individual employers. Approximately 25,000–30,000 employees of the various grocery stores represented by FEC were members of Bay Area Retail Clerks locals in the summer of 1978.

From January 1, 1977, to December 31, 1979, Local 428 was party to identical collective-bargaining agreements with Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's. During that same period, Local 1179 was party to a collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent.

Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's were struck, initially without official sanction, and picketed by the Teamsters Union, Locals 287 and 315 from August 7 until November 27, 1978. In anticipation of the strike, which was an economic strike, Respondent organized a strike preparation committee, sent communications to interested corporate divisions, and sent strike packets to store managers. The packets included such things as documents for use in obtaining replacement personnel, merchandising plans, notices to employees, and picketing information. By letter dated August 9,[8] Locals 428 and 1179 advised all their members that the Central Labor Council had sanctioned the Teamsters strike, and asked for full support of the strike. Local 428's letter stated, inter alia:[9]

> 1. Local 428 members are not to cross a bonafide picket line at any time to go to work.
> 2. If any of you are requested to go to work and there is not a bonafide picket line around the store, you are authorized to go to work.
> 3. If a picket shows up after you have gone to work, you are to complete your shift unless going out of the store for any reason. When returning and there is a picket line around the store, you are not to cross the picket line.
> 4. You should come into the Union office and sign up with our Dispatch Department.
> We strongly urge every Union member to respect your Union obligation in full, in spirit and letter. Unions have full legal sanction to discipline members who work behind a recognized picket line no matter what the Food Employers Council trys to persuade you to do.

By letter dated September 8,[10] Local 428 advised all of its members that the strike sanction had been withdrawn on September 7.[11] The letter stated, inter alia:

> This action means that you must report to work at your store immediately because you are no longer protected by the contract if you refuse to return to work. In fact, you may be subject to termination if you do not report to work behind the Teamsters picket line. We feel this is a new and tragic experience for Bay Area.

By letter dated August 14,[12] Respondent notified its employees of certain of their rights and responsibilities relative to the strike and its attendant events. The letter had been included within the prestrike packet given to all store managers; was posted in all stores, at one place in some and at two places in others; and was mailed to all of Respondent's employees at their home address.[13] The letter states, inter alia:

> If there is picketing at your store, it is your individual choice to work or not to work. If you choose to work, the Company will do everything possible to continue normal operations and insure available work for you to maintain your earnings. The Company will also do everything it can to protect you against coercion from any source. If striking Teamsters have not placed a picket line at your store, you are expected to work as scheduled or be subject to disciplinary action. Should pickets appear after you have started your shift, you may finish your shift.[14]

After imposition of the strike sanction, picketing by the Teamsters was fairly regular and continuous at most stores for approximately 2 weeks. Thereafter, picketing at most stores was sporadic, inexact, and uncertain.[15] On some occasions at some stores, pickets appeared late in the morning and left early in the evening; or appeared for only a few hours and then left; or appeared on some days but not on other days. From approximately September 4, picketing ceased at some stores.[16]

[8] G.C. Exh. 5.

[9] Local 1179's letter was less instructive than that of Local 428.

[10] G.C. Exh. 4.

[11] Local 1179 similarly notified its members by letter dated September 7.

[12] R. Exh. 7.

[13] This statement is based on credited testimony of several store managers; some employees; Richard Hinshaw, Respondent's director of labor relations for the northern California division; and Gregory Tarr, Respondent's director of personnel, northern California division. Some employees testified that they did not receive, or did not read, Respondent's letter. That testimony is not consistent with the record, was not believable, and is given no credit.

[14] It is clear from the testimony of several of the General Counsel's witnesses, as well as from several of Respondent's witnesses, and it is found, that no employee of Respondent Alpha Beta or Respondent Ralph's was disciplined for refusing to cross a picket line to work. Respondent's contracts with Locals 428 and 1179 provide, inter alia:

> SECTION 17. STRIKE OR LOCKOUT
> 17.1 During the life of this Agreement the Union agrees not to engage in any strike or stoppage of work as long as the Employer has not committed an act held by the Adjustment Board or Arbitrator to be in violation of this Agreement, or the Employer is not in clear violation of a provision of the Agreement where no question of interpretation is involved.
> 17.3 Refusal of any employee covered by the terms of this Agreement to pass through any picket line which has been sanctioned by the Central Labor Council of proper jurisdiction and/or the Retail Clerks Bay Area Council shall not constitute a violation of this Agreement.

[15] Much testimony was devoted to the subject of a "bona fide" picket line. That testimony is given no weight, since it is clear that the actions of Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's, which resulted in charges by employees, were not controlled or affected by the nature of the picketing—clearly, store managers considered any presence of pickets, however they conducted themselves, to constitute a picket line.

[16] This statement is based on the credited testimony of store managers, and is supported, in part, by the testimony of some of the General Counsel's witnesses.

During the entire strike period, news of strike-related events was disseminated in broad fashion by newspapers, radio stations, and television stations. In addition, Local 428 maintained a "hot line" telephone which employees could call to obtain the latest information relative to the strike. Lou Menacho, a business agent of Local 428, visited employees and store managers at stores for conversations related to the strike.

Respondent's contract with Local 428 provides, inter alia:

> 7.1 POSTING OF WORK SCHEDULES: The Employer agrees to post a weekly schedule in ink of working hours specifying the starting and finishing times, meal periods and days off, and this schedule shall continue in effect until a new one is posted. The schedule shall contain the employee's full name. A twenty-four (24) hour notice of any change in such schedule, other than meal period, shall be given by the Employer, except that in the case of a change in a day off, at least five (5) days advance notice shall be posted except in case of a bona fide emergency.
> POST NOTICE: Work schedules must be posted by Noon on Friday of the week preceding the week in which such schedules are to be effective.

Prior to the strike, Respondent regularly posted work schedules as required by the contract. Posting of schedules during the strike was done in the same manner as prior to the strike, although store managers maintained records and systems during the strike, which were in addition to regular schedules, in order to account for the work of strike replacements.[17] These additional records were not uniform among the stores—each manager devised his own system. Both before and during the strike store managers prepared or approved and posted all work schedules. If assistance was required, the managers usually relied on assistant store managers.[18]

Although specific numbers were not established at trial, many employees continued working during the strike, and the remainder that was required for store operations was obtained "off the street" as strike replacements. Of those employees who honored the picket lines, many kept close watch of their schedules and reported to work on occasions when no pickets were present. Some employees entered through rear doors when only front entrances were picketed.[19] Of all employees of Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's, only a few did not come to work as scheduled, when no pickets were present at the stores. Those few were discharged, and are Charging Parties herein.[20] Some employees did not return to work immediately after the sanction was withdrawn on September 7, and were discharged for that reason. Those employees also are Charging Parties.

All employees discharged by Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's reported that fact to union representatives, and grievances were filed on their behalf pursuant to contract provisions, which are, in pertinent part:

> 18.2 DISCIPLINARY GRIEVANCES: Pursuant to Section 3 of this Agreement, any employee who feels he has been unjustly discharged or suspended shall file a grievance with the Union and thereafter within ten (10) business days of notice of the disciplinary action, the Union, if it desires to proceed with the grievance, shall notify the Employer or its representative that an Adjustment Board should be convened to hear the grievance. Within fifteen (15) business days (Monday-Friday, holidays excluded) thereafter, the Union and the Employer shall meet as a Board of Adjustment, consisting of two representatives of the Employer and two representatives of the Union, in an effort to settle the matter. This time limit may be extended by mutual agreement of the parties. If the matter is not adjusted and is impassed, the Union, if it so elects, within fifteen (15) business days following the meeting of the Board of Adjustment, shall proceed to arbitration. If the Employer fails to meet with the Union within the time limits herein specified, the grievance will be deemed substantiated and the employee shall be made whole. If the Union fails to comply with the time limits herein specified, such failure shall be deemed to be a conclusive waiver of the grievance. The Union's intention to proceed to arbitration shall be communicated to the Employer or its representative within the time limit specified above.

A board of adjustment meeting was held September 30, attended by Richard Dodge, who at times relevant herein was labor relations advisor for the FEC of which Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's were, and are, members; James Gaddis, labor relations associate of the FEC; James McLoughlin, then president of Local 428 (now retired); Claudia Wallace,[21] Local 428's inside representative (grievance handling); Menacho; and some of the employees who had been discharged. Hinshaw was present only at part of the meeting. Principal spokesmen at the meeting were Gaddis and McLoughlin. Gaddis contended that the employees who were present had been discharged for failing without justification to report for work. McLoughlin contended that the employees did not report for work because, when they arrived at the stores, picketing was in progress. Since store managers were not present, and their testimony was essential, the parties decided to depart from the usual procedure, first take the testimony of the employees, then [17] This statement is based on credited testimony of store managers.

[18] It is clear, and not in dispute, that store managers were supervisors within the meaning of the Act. It is not clear that assistant store managers were supervisors, but it is found that they were agents of Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's, and that they frequently acted as agents in dealing with employees.

adjourn to a later date to hear what the store managers had to say. Respondent's termination notices for all employees who were present were available at the meeting. Employees then were asked to give their version of events leading to discharge, which they did, after which they were asked questions by those desiring to do so. All employees stated, or made it clear, that they were scheduled to work on the days they did not work. They stated that they did not work on those days because of the presence of pickets. Some employees failed to report for work after the sanction was lifted, and those employees contended that the failure was because they were out of town, or did not know the sanction had been withdrawn. No other contention was made relative to the discharges by employees or by union representatives.[22]

The next board of adjustment meeting was held on October 3, attended by Dodge; managers of stores from which employees had been discharged; McLoughlin; Wallace; Menacho; Claude Fernandez, then secretary-treasurer of Local 428;[23] and employees who had been discharged. Work schedules and termination documents were brought to the meeting by Respondent. Each employee testified and was questioned, as on September 30, after which store managers testified and were questioned. Employees contended that pickets always were present when they were scheduled to work, and the store managers contended they were not. Those who were fired for not working after the sanction was withdrawn contended they were out of town or did not know the sanction had been lifted. The meeting ended in a "deadlock," i.e., the Union wanted the employees reinstated, and Respondent declined. Dodge said, however, that he would discuss the matter further with Hinshaw. Nothing was discussed at this meeting concerning nor did the Union contend that employees had a right not to work as scheduled even in the absence of pickets.

Approximately October 25 Hinshaw and McLoughlin talked on the telephone and reached an agreement whereby four employees who had been terminated would be considered as having decided to quit their jobs, and 15 other employees who had been terminated would be reinstated without backpay. The following day McLoughlin met with the employees and discussed the offer. Although the employees were displeased with the refusal of backpay, they voted to accept the offer, and decided among themselves to seek the assistance of the NLRB in recovering backpay. McLoughlin called Hinshaw on the telephone to advise that the employees had accepted the offer. Dodge sent a letter to McLoughlin dated October 25, 1978,[24] confirming the agreement between Hinshaw and McLoughlin. The letter stated, inter alia, that the grievances filed by the employees and Local 428 "have been resolved, and the settlement in this matter is final and binding." By letter of November 9, 1978, Fernandez forwarded to Dodge a copy of the signed agreement.[25] All employees except voluntary quits were reinstated October 29.

[22] McLoughlin initially agreed with Gaddis' testimony that no contention was made by the Union at the meeting of September 30 that employees had a right to withhold their services, whether or not pickets were present. McLoughlin later changed his testimony and said that such a right was discussed at length during the meeting on September 30, and at "numerous" other meetings. McLoughlin appeared to be a confused, unrealistic witness, and his contention on this point, relative to the meeting of September 30, is given no credence. If such an employee right was the basis of the Union's defense to the discharges, there would have been no necessity for the lengthy questioning of employees on September 30, relative to the absence or presence of pickets. McLoughlin further testified that he met informally on one occasion with Hinshaw; David Cox, a labor relations associate with the Food Employers' Council; and John Bacon, executive vice president of the Food Employers' Council; and that he told the three that the question was whether the employees had a right not to work even in the absence of pickets. Bacon denied that McLoughlin made such a statement during the conversations, or that McLoughlin or any other union representative ever took that position with him. Hinshaw testified in the same manner as Bacon. Gaddis testified that he was present at the conversation, but that McLoughlin said nothing about a right of employees. Bacon, Hinshaw, and Gaddis are credited on this point. Finally, Menacho testified concerning the two board of adjustment meetings:

> We met to ask Alpha Beta and Food Employers Council to put these members back to work with their lost wages. They refused to do it and at that time we produced a letter from the Teamsters saying that they had manned their picket lines around the clock in the stores that these people had worked in.
> Q. To your recollection, did anyone in the Union state that it did not matter whether pickets were present or not?
>
> A. No, I don't remember that.
> Q. When was the second meeting held?
>
> A. The second meeting was held in the beginning of October at some time.
> Q. Where was it?
> A. We had that in our offices in San Jose.
> Q. Who was present?
>
> A. At that one, there was myself, Claudia Wallace, Jim McLoughlin, Claudia Fernandez was there and two other business agents. I'm not sure whether they stayed in or not. There was Lilly Sugimoto and Ed McGee.
> Q. What was said at this meeting?
>
> A. Again, we asked them to put the employees back to work and spoke about the letter that the Teamsters had given us and we had some managers that were there, store managers, that came in and testified.
> Q. To your recollection, did anyone from the Union state during this meeting that it did not matter whether pickets were present at the stores?
> A. No, we didn't bring that point up.

Several of the discharged employees also testified that such a right was not mentioned at either of the two board of adjustment meetings.

[23] Fernandez testified that he did not recall attending the meeting. It is found that he did attend.

[24] R. Exh. 31.

[25] The letter dated October 25 superseded a similar letter prepared by Dodge and dated November 2 (G.C. Exh. 9). Hinshaw and McLoughlin objected to some of the language in the letter dated November 2, and to the date, which they both wanted to reflect the date of the oral agreement, i.e., October 25. The new letter, agreed to by Hinshaw and McLoughlin, was prepared in November but back dated to October 25. McLoughlin and Wallace testified that the words stating that the settlement was "final and binding" were added without their knowledge or consent, and McLoughlin testified that he signed the agreement dated October 25 without reading it. The letter passed through the hands of three union representatives—McLoughlin, Wallace, and Fernandez—and remained in the union files for a long period of time without objection. It first was objected to when this controversy became ripe for litigation. It would be inappropriate at this stage of proceedings to set aside the agreement reached after such a long and trying period of time, solely on the basis that McLoughlin now seeks to disavow the agreement as not having been read before signed. The agreement was freely discussed before being reduced to writing, it was signed voluntarily and freely without protest, and there is no evidence of fraud or misrepresentation in either the inception or execution of the document. The testimony of McLoughlin and Wallace on this point is given no weight. The document is found to be a valid one, and to represent the intent of the parties.

B. Further Findings of Fact

1. McLoughlin. As pointed out supra, this witness appeared confused and uncertain in his testimony. He changed his testimony on at least two important points, and he seemed unsure of his memory in many important areas of inquiry. He now contends that he told Hinshaw and others at the board of adjustment hearings and elsewhere of his belief that the employees had the right to withhold their services even in the absence of pickets, but that contention is contrary to the record and is contrary to Menacho's testimony. It is apparent that McLoughlin's only serious concern at times prior to settlement of the grievances was the jobs of the employees—he wanted them reinstated as quickly as possible, and apparently was not too concerned with the reason for the discharges. He said he believed, and he often stated, that the employees were discharged for refusing to cross picket lines, and the record is clear that such was not the reason for the discharges. It is apparent that McLoughlin did not make serious inquiry into the background of the discharges prior to the board of adjustment meetings. McLoughlin is credited only to the extent that credit specifically is given.

2. Menacho. The record is clear that the picketing of the Teamsters was poorly executed. Menacho and McLoughlin acknowledged that fact. Many employees worked during the strike, being able to do so because of the frequent absence of pickets. Menacho's testimony generally was not convincing, and often appeared inconsistent with the record, e.g., his denial of conversations relative to "bona fide" picketing, and to employee rights in the absence of picketing, did not square with the general situation of employees who wanted to work, and did work when pickets were not present. Unless specifically credited, Menacho's testimony is deemed doubtful.

3. Dodge and Hinshaw. Both of these witnesses, and particularly Dodge, gave straightforward, credible accounts of events, and generally are credited.

4. Store Managers. This group of witnesses was impressive. All the managers were straightforward, sincere, and prompt in their answers. None of them appeared devious or evasive. Each of them is credited, except as otherwise noted, in specific instances.

5. Based on the testimony of Bacon, and on the record as a whole, I find that at no time prior to the controversy herein has any union representative contended with Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's that employees have a right to refuse to work as scheduled in the absence of pickets during a strike. (Respondent's counsel sometimes refers to this as an "invisible picket line" theory.)

C. Individual Discharges

The factual situation relative to each dischargee is different, and each is discussed as follows.

Jack Alarcon: Alarcon, a member of Local 428, worked at times relevant herein at Respondent's store 508, under Store Manager Willis Cole and Assistant Store Manager James Finley. Alarcon worked an irregular schedule that changed each week.

Alarcon testified that the day before the Teamsters strike started he talked with Finley and asked whether or not he should report. Finley advised him to call the following morning to ask about pickets. Alarcon did as advised and talked with someone whose name he does not know, who advised him not to come to work. He was notified by the Union that the strike had been sanctioned, and he did not work during the strike. He checked for pickets during the sanction by driving to the store each day, and on each occasion pickets were present. After the first week, he drove by every other day. On the Sunday after the sanction was lifted he talked at the store with Finley, who said he had been discharged for not reporting to work after the sanction was lifted. He asked Finley what he could do, and Finley advised him to talk with Cole the following day, Monday. He went to the store on Monday and talked with Cole, who said he had been discharged for "not showing up for work." No one from the store had called to tell him he was scheduled to work. No one from Respondent's management or the Union had told him he could be discharged for not working as scheduled when pickets were not present, nor had anyone from management called to tell him no pickets were present, or that he should come to work. He told the Union about his discharge, and about a month thereafter attended a meeting of 18 persons, including store managers and representatives from the Union. He told Cole at the meeting that he did not know the sanction had been lifted. He attended a meeting at the union hall approximately 2 weeks later, together with union representatives and other discharged employees. Respondent's offer of reinstatement without backpay was discussed, and one employee talked about going to the NLRB concerning the backpay problem.

On cross-examination, Alarcon testified that prior to the conversation with Finley he testified to on direct examination Finley told him he was supposed to come to work if no pickets were present. He said he received advice during the strike from the Union and from Respondent that he was authorized to work if no pickets were present. He did not check his schedule for the week of September 4.

Willis Cole testified that he prepares or approves and nearly always posts all work schedules. Alarcon was scheduled to work the week of September 3, and throughout the strike. Alarcon, a part-time employee, usually worked at night as a stock clerk. Alarcon did not report to work or call in when he was scheduled to work on September 8 and 9. Head clerk Matt Erkle and grocery clerk Jim Finley attempted without success to reach Alarcon by telephone. Alarcon called the store on Sunday, September 10, but Cole was not in. Alarcon came to the store to see Cole on September 11, and said he had not heard the strike sanction had been lifted, nor had he received any letter from the Union. Cole replied that Alarcon had missed two shifts and it was necessary to replace him, so he was discharged. Cole said he learned Thursday afternoon (September 7) that the sanction had been lifted. He learned that fact from clerks who came in to get their schedules, and who said they heard on the news and on the Union "hotline" about the sanction having been lifted. Approximately 15 or 20 employees came to work or got in touch with the store on Thursday afternoon. The only three clerks who did not report as scheduled were Alarcon, Carlos Lopez, and Daniel Alvarado. (The latter two are discussed elsewhere herein.) During the strike, 50 to 60 percent of the employees honored the picket line and did not work. Picketing was constant throughout the strike, 24 hours each day and 7 days each week. Alarcon was discharged for not reporting to work as scheduled after the sanction was lifted. At the time of discharge, he checked Alarcon's work schedule and timecards.

Discussion

To the extent of any discrepancies between the testimony of Cole and Alarcon, Cole is credited. Cole's version of events is credited.

It is noted at the outset that there is no evidence that Respondent was out to "get" Alarcon or any other employee because of his or their union or other protected activity. The record does not support the argument that Respondent, as a policy matter, decided to punish employees for honoring the picket line. Respondent was organized by and bargained and contracted with the Union, and there is no evidence of any attempt by Respondent to interfere with union activity of employees. So far as the record shows, Alarcon was not treated differently from other employees similarly situated.

It is also noted that the store involved herein, as all other of Respondent's stores, was a busy place with a complicated work schedule involving long hours of operation and a sizeable number of employees. Notice is taken of the relatively low profit margin of retail grocery stores, and the consequent necessity of close scheduling and prudent use of employees' time. Cole credibly testified that Respondent's policy is to discharge employees for not reporting for work without excuse or advance notice, and that policy has the support of common sense. Alarcon did not report for work on two consecutive days. Respondent attempted, without success, to reach Alarcon by telephone. All but three employees came to work or reported the day the sanction was lifted, and only those employees, of all who honored the picket line, were discharged. Alarcon contends that he did not know the sanction was lifted, but that contention is not credited. All except three of the employees scheduled to work on September 8 and 9 reported to work or called in, and Respondent did not know why Alarcon was not in that group. Respondent was justified in concluding that Alarcon, a part-time employee, was not interested in coming back to work, or was indifferent to his obligations.

The legal issue involved in discharging Alarcon for not reporting to work as scheduled, after the sanction was withdrawn, is discussed below.

Daniel Alvarado: Alvarado, a member of Local 428, was a part-time courtesy clerk at Respondent's store 508 during times relevant herein. The store manager was Willis Cole, and the assistant manager was James Finley. Alvarado's schedule was irregular, and changed each week.

Alvarado testified that he was notified approximately August 9 by letter from the Union that the Teamsters strike had been sanctioned by Local 428. He was scheduled to work that day, but seeing pickets at the store he did not work. He did not work thereafter during the sanction, but he drove by the store three or four times to check for pickets. He telephoned the store and talked with Finley to check for pickets,[26] but was not told the pickets were absent. He was told "always" that pickets were present. He was notified by union letter dated September 8 that the sanction had been lifted. The day he received the letter, September 9, he reported for work sometime between 12 and 1 p.m. When he arrived he talked with Cole:

> I had asked him if the schedule was up for me to work. He said that he couldn't help me with that because I had not shown up for work Thursday or Friday, and he filled out a termination notice on me. I told him that I just received that letter that day, and he said he was sorry, he couldn't help me.
> Q. Had anyone from the store called you on Thursday, Friday or Saturday and told you that the sanction had been lifted and that you were scheduled to work.
> A. No.

No one from Respondent's management or the Union ever told him that he had to check the work schedule during the strike, that he had to check for pickets on days he was scheduled to work, or that he could be discharged if he failed to work as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from Respondent's management called him during the strike to say that no pickets were present or to ask him to come to work. He never received a discharge notice. He notified the Union of his discharge and attended a meeting at the union hall in late September or early October. Also present were Cole and two other employees who had been discharged (Alarcon and Carlos Lopez). They discussed the discharges, and a subsequent meeting was held in the union hall in late October. All discharged employees and union representatives attended. They discussed Respondent's offer of reinstatement without backpay and also discussed the comments of one employee who said the NLRB may be able to assist in getting backpay. The employees voted unanimously to accept the offer.

Cole testified that he is familiar with Respondent's policy that employees are supposed to work during a sanctioned strike if no pickets are present. He prepares or approves and nearly always personally posts work schedules for the store. Schedule preparation and posting during the strike was done in the same manner as prior to the strike. Alvarado was scheduled to work throughout the strike, including the week of September 3. His reporting time for Friday, September 8, was 8 a.m. and for Saturday, September 9, was 2 p.m. Alvarado did not report or call in for either Friday or Saturday. Alvarado came to the store at 4 or 4:30 p.m. on Saturday to check on his schedule, and Cole told him he was discharged for not reporting to work as scheduled for 2 days. Alvarado said he did not know the sanction had been lifted. Head clerk Matt Erkle and grocery clerk James Finley tried unsuccessfully to reach Alvarado by telephone on Friday and Saturday. The store employed approximately 35 employees, of which 15 or 20 came to the store to work or called in on Thursday. All scheduled employees reported or called in, except three—Alvarado, Lopez, and Alarcon. Cole worked on September 8 and 9, from store opening until closing. Approximately 50 or 60 percent of the employees honored the picket line and did not work during the sanctioned period. Picketing was continuous, 24 hours per day and 7 days per week. Alvarado was discharged because he failed to work as scheduled after the sanction was lifted. Cole heard on Thursday about the sanction being lifted, when employees came to work and told him they heard it on the news. Approximately 15 employees reported on Thursday.

Discussion

As discussed in the case of Alarcon, there is no convincing evidence that Respondent personally was antagonistic toward Alvarado because of his union or other protected activity, or toward the Union. Alvarado was not treated disparately from other employees similarly situated.

To the extent of any discrepancies between the testimony of Alvarado and that of Cole, Cole is credited and his version of events is credited.

As discussed elsewhere, the store involved here, as all other of Respondent's stores, was busy and utilized employees at nearly all hours. Close scheduling was imperative, and scheduling was a complicated process because of the store's long hours and varied operations. Cole's testimony that Respondent's policy is to discharge employees for unexcused or unauthorized absences was logical and believable. Attempts to get in touch with Alvarado on two separate days were not successful. Alvarado's contention that he did not know the sanction had been lifted was not credible, in view of the publicity given to the event, and the fact that all employees except Alvarado, Alarcon, and Lopez reported for work or called in. Regardless of Alvarado's reason for not reporting, Respondent was not responsible for that fact, and it was not incumbent upon Respondent, so far as the record shows, to run Alvarado down and ask him to come to work. Alvarado should have reported for work within a reasonable time after the sanction was lifted. What was a reasonable time can be inferred from the fact that nearly all employees returned to work or reported in immediately or soon after the sanction was lifted. Respondent was justified in considering Alvarado's failure to report or call in as negligent or intentional. Possibly, discharge was a too severe penalty, but that is not a matter for the Board to consider. Whether or not Alvarado's discharge was a violation of the Act is discussed below.

Alex Avlakeotes: Avlakeotes did not testify. Counsel stipulated that Avlakeotes was an employee of store 509 during times material herein; that Avlakeotes' termination notice was prepared to show that he was terminated for not reporting to work when no pickets were present; and that Avlakeotes quit his job as of September 9, 1978.

Peter Jimenez, manager of Respondent's store 509, testified that Avlakeotes was a frozen food clerk at the store. Jimenez testified that Avlakeotes was scheduled to work 5 days during the week of September 2, but did not report for work during that week, nor did he call the store on the telephone. Jimenez prepared Avlakeotes' termination notice on September 5, based on his personal knowledge, reports of other employees, and the store's work schedules. He talked with Avlakeotes on Monday, September 11, and Avlakeotes said he was quitting before being fired. Jimenez replied, "I still was officially telling him he was terminated because he hadn't reported to work." Avlakeotes stated "he had another job bartending and that he wasn't going to work during the strike anyhow." Avlakeotes was terminated because he did not work when no pickets were at the store. Avlakeotes could have learned about his schedule by calling in, without having to cross the picket line to read the schedule.

Discussion

Based on Jimenez' testimony, which is credited, it is clear that Avlakeotes was terminated for not working when no pickets were at the store. It may be, as counsel stipulated, that Avlakeotes quit his job on September 9, but that does not alter the fact that Respondent fired Avlakeotes prior to Avlakeotes' quitting. Jimenez testified that Avlakeotes already had been fired by September 11. Whether or not Avlakeotes had been notified of his discharge, Jimenez had initiated the paperwork and, by his own testimony, notified Avlakeotes of the discharge, prior to Avlakeotes' stating that he quit his job. Even though Avlakeotes had been working elsewhere prior to September 11, he had not quit his job prior to talking with Jimenez, and he told Jimenez that he would not work during the strike. Therefore, the question is a legal one, as to whether the discharge was a violation of the Act, i.e., whether or not Respondent legally could discharge Avlakeotes for not working when no pickets were present. That question is discussed infra.

Daniel Gonzalez: Gonzalez, a member of Local 428, worked at Respondent's store 509 during times relevant herein, as a bread clerk on a regular schedule, 6 to 11 a.m. on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday each week. The store manager was Peter Jimenez, and the assistant store manager was Randy Rose.

Gonzalez testified that he learned of the Teamsters strike in August, and soon thereafter was notified by letter from Local 428 that the strike had been sanctioned. On the morning of the sanction he called the store on the telephone and talked with bookkeeper Debbie Barrios, who told him there was a picket at the front door, but none at the back door. She said, "You could come in the back door like some of the other people are doing." He replied, "I had talked to the Union and they informed me that the strike had been sanctioned and it was my legal right to cross or not to cross, depending on what I chose." And she said, "we'll see what happens during the day." He did not go to work during the strike, but he checked for pickets, every day for 3 weeks, and every other day thereafter. He checked each day he was scheduled to work by driving to the store at 6 or 7 a.m. Pickets always were present when he checked. He talked with Jimenez at 6 a.m. the day after the sanction was lifted, and Jimenez said he was discharged for "failure to report to work when there were no pickets." He reported the discharge to the Union. No one in management or the Union ever told him that he was supposed to check for pickets, or that he could be discharged for not working as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from management called him during the strike to tell him no pickets were present, or to ask him to come to work. He told the Union about his discharge, and in late September attended a meeting of terminated employees, members of the Food Employers Council, and union officials. The strike, picket lines, and work attendance were discussed. He attended a second meeting with most of the same people, plus store managers. He explained his actions, which generally were denied by Jimenez. He attended a third meeting of union officials and terminated employees in late October. The employees were told about Respondent's reinstatement offer without backpay, provided acceptance was unanimous. All the employees decided to accept the offer and to seek backpay through the NLRB.

On cross-examination, Gonzalez denied that no pickets were present when he was scheduled for work on September 11 and 12. He said that even if no pickets had been present when he checked at the store he would not have gone to work. He said he was only checking on "the status of the picket line." He changed his earlier testimony concerning September 11 and 12, and said he worked those 2 days.

Jimenez testified that Gonzalez' scheduled hours were the same prior to and during the strike. Jimenez said he based Gonzalez' termination on his own knowledge, reports of employees, and the work schedules. He said he told Gonzalez that the latter had been discharged for not working when no pickets were present.

Discussion

To the extent that there are discrepancies between the testimony of Gonzalez and Jimenez, the latter is credited. It is found that Gonzalez did not work as scheduled on some days when there were no pickets at the store, and that he was discharged for that reason. The legal issue thus raised is discussed below.

Robert Hammond: Hammond did not testify. Counsel stipulated at trial that Hammond was an employee at Respondent's store 549; that he was covered by Local 428's contract with Respondent, that the Teamsters picketed store 549 continuously from midnight, August 9–12, 1978; that there was picketing after August 12, on dates counsel could not agree to; that Hammond was terminated for not reporting to work on days he was scheduled to work when no pickets were present; and that Hammond was advised by letter dated August 31, 1978, signed by Richard Hinshaw, that he had been terminated for failing to report for work as scheduled.

Vincent Spanno, manager of store 549, testified that he prepared Hammond's termination notice, based on the work schedule involved, on Hammond's timecards, and on his personal knowledge of the absence of pickets on the dates set forth in the termination notice. When Hammond was scheduled to report to work.

Michael Lamb, assistant store manager of store 549, testified that he told Hammond and Hutson about his conversation with Menacho, discussed above, and that Hammond and Hutson worked the night of August 19.

Discussion

Lamb's testimony that Menacho told him that employees were required to work as scheduled if no pickets were present, which testimony was denied by Menacho, is credited.

Spanno's testimony that, on the dates shown in Hammond's termination notice, no pickets were present when Hammond was scheduled to report for work is credited.

The legal issue involved in Hammond's discharge is discussed below.

Arturo Herrera: Herrera, a member of Local 428 at times relevant herein, was employed as an apprentice clerk, on probation in Respondent's store 505, on a schedule that changed each week. His store manager was Lyle Born.

Herrera testified that he learned by letter from the Union that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike. He worked the day of the strike, but not thereafter. He checked his schedule almost every week of the strike, and he checked for pickets almost every day. Pickets always were there when he checked. He learned from his father that the sanction had been lifted, and that information was verified in a telephone call to the Union. The same morning he learned the sanction was lifted, he called Born on the telephone and asked about his schedule. Born did not tell him, and said it was Herrera's responsibility to know his schedule. He went to work that day at approximately 9:30 a.m. and checked his schedule, which was different from, and earlier than, his usual schedules. Soon thereafter he talked with Born:

> He asked where I was at that morning, and I said I normally don't work 7:00 in the morning to 4:00 in the afternoon, and all he said, all he could see was that I voluntarily quit. And, well, there wasn't much I could say then, so I just said all right.
> But I had asked to stay, to work from 9:30 til 6:30 that night, but he said he was sorry, he couldn't do it.

No one from the store called to advise that the sanction had been lifted or that he was scheduled to work or that no pickets were present. No one from Respondent's management or the Union ever told him that he could be discharged if he did not work as scheduled when no pickets were present. He informed the Union of his discharge, and attended one board of adjustment meeting concerning his discharge.

Born testified that Herrera was a produce apprentice, who usually worked early shifts, starting at 5 a.m. because produce had to be trimmed for display early in the day. Born prepared or approved all schedules and their posting. When the sanction was lifted, the produce department head was on vacation and the department was being operated on a makeshift basis. Produce employees worked early shifts, often starting at 4, 5, or 6 a.m. After the orientation period of 13 weeks, employees sometimes started later in the day. Later in the week, or when three employees were available for the department, one employee worked from noon to 9 p.m. During the strike the store closed at 7 p.m., and all employees were scheduled for hours earlier than usual. Usually three employees worked in the department. Born learned on September 7 that the sanction had been lifted. The schedule for that period had been posted on Friday, September 1, effective September 3–9. Because the produce head was on vacation and there were only two employees in the department, Herrera was scheduled to work early on September 8 and 9. All the stores' approximately 50 employees either came to work or called in on September 8, except Herrera. All employees who were scheduled to work on September 8 and 9 worked those days, except Herrera. Herrera did not report for work or call in on either September 8 or 9. He never saw Herrera in the store during the strike, nor did he hear from Herrera during the sanctioned period. The first time he heard from Herrera was on Monday, September 11. Born testified:

> It was in the morning about nine o'clock in the morning. He phoned and asked—He said that he just heard the sanction had been lifted and he wanted to know what his schedule was. And I told him that he had been scheduled at 6:00 a.m. the 8th and 9th and being that he didn't show up for those shifts, I took it as a voluntary quit.
> Q. What was his response, if any?
> A. Not much. He didn't really offer any excuses as to why he did not come in.

About August 20 he talked with Lou Menacho, a business agent for Local 428, while other employees were present. Menacho had been talking with other employees when Cole arrived. Menacho said he had been explaining to the employees that if pickets were not at all doors, they could come to work through doors not being picketed. Menacho said all entrances and exits had to be picketed in order for the picketing to be "bona fide." Menacho also explained that the employees were obligated to check their schedules, and to check every morning for pickets and if no pickets were present the employees were obligated to work. One of the employees asked Menacho whether he could come to work through the back door if no pickets were at that door, and Menacho replied yes.

Menacho testified that he talked alone with Born on one occasion during the strike, but they only discussed "generalities." Menacho testified that he talked with three employees of store 505 the same day:

> Well, they asked me if they were going to get in trouble working in the store and I told them that it was their option. If they came to work and there were no pickets there, it was their option to go to work. We perferred [sic] if they didn't as long as there was a sanctioned picket line out there. As long as they didn't cross a picket line, it wasn't really violating a principle.
> Q. Did you say to either Mr. Born, Mr. Windes or Mr. Kitchell that there had to be pickets at every door or the employees had to go to work?
> A. No, I didn't.

Menacho denied telling employees that if no pickets were at the back door they could come to work.

Discussion

To the extent there are discrepancies in the testimony of Herrera and Born, Born is credited. Further, Born's recitation of events is credited.

Menacho was not a convincing witness. In view of the questions concerning his reliability in this, and other instances discussed elsewhere, Born, who was a straightforward witness with a convincing demeanor, is credited to the extent that his testimony differs from that of Menacho.

There is no convincing evidence that Respondent personally was antagonistic toward Herrera because of his union or other protected activity, or toward the Union. There is no evidence that Herrera was treated in a disparate or arbitrary manner.

Born credibly explained that Herrera was needed in the produce department on September 8 and 9, and was scheduled for work on the early morning shifts of those days. Herrera testified that he usually worked from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m., or 11 a.m. to 8 p.m., but Herrera amply demonstrated that he was a confused witness, with a poor memory. For instance, he had much difficulty remembering when schedules were posted at the store, and for what days. Even after extensive questioning, he could not recall the scheduled days with accuracy. Nor did he remember who the assistant store manager was, nor the day he reported to work after the sanction was lifted. Born's testimony that Herrera usually worked the early morning hours was logical and is credited.

Herrera did not remember when he returned to work, but Born credibly testified that it was September 11, after Herrera had failed to report to work, without calling in, for 2 days. There is no evidence that Respondent was required to seek out Herrera, or to remind him to come to work. All other of the stores' employees returned to work, or called in, on September 7 and 8. Born was justified in assuming that Herrera did not intend to return to his job. The return of all other employees establishes that Herrera's absence on September 8 was not reasonable. Further, the record is clear that the lifting of the sanction on September 7 was public knowledge.

The legal issue involved in Herrera's discharge for not returning to work after the sanction was lifted is discussed infra.

Kathy Holland: Holland did not testify. Counsel stipulated at trial that Holland was an employee of store 519, and subject to the contract between Local 428 and Respondent, at times material herein; that picketing at store 519 was continuous from August 10–14, 1978; that picketing was sporadic from August 14 until September 1, 1978; that Holland was terminated for not reporting to work on days she was scheduled to work when no pickets were present at the store, for weeks ending August 19 and August 26, 1978; and that, by letter dated September 8, 1978, signed by Hinshaw, Holland was advised that she had been terminated for her failure to report for work as scheduled.

Mariano Capodiece testified that he was manager of store 519 in August 1978, and one of the store employees was Holland, who was a part-time journeyman clerk and who worked on an irregular schedule. During the week ending August 19 picketing began to be sporadic, with pickets appearing off and on during the day and, on some days, appearing not at all. There were no pickets on Labor Day, and after that, there were no pickets most of the time. He always either prepared work schedules himself, or approved schedules prepared by his assistant. The practice relative to schedules after the strike started was the same as it was prior to the strike. He prepared Holland's termination notice, based on the fact that she did not report for work at any time after August 12, although there were times when she was scheduled to report, when no pickets were present. His knowledge of the absence of pickets and the sporadic nature of picketing was based on personal observation and reports of employees. Based on his knowledge and reports from employees, Holland did not call the store after August 12. During the first week of picketing, Holland crossed the picket line to work. He did not hear from Holland, either after he prepared her termination notice or after the sanction was lifted. He attended the first board of adjustment meeting, at which Holland did not appear. He understood at the meeting, from Claude Fernandez of the Union he believed, that Holland's case was dismissed because she voluntarily quit her job. He was asked if he would accept the quit, and he said yes.

Chris Anderson, the store bookkeeper at times relevant herein, corroborated Capodiece's testimony relative to notices to employees (R. Exh. 7), the sporadic nature of the picketing, the occasional absence of pickets at the rear entrance, and related matters. Anderson was a convincing witness, and her testimony is credited.

Discussion

The principal issue concerning Holland is whether or not she quit her job prior to Respondent's termination of her. Capodiece credibly testified that Holland did not work after August 12, and that she did not thereafter get in touch with anyone at the store. Holland's termination notice states that she "discontinued reporting for work." "Has not reported for scheduled work shifts" during the weeks ending August 19 and 26, 1978, and last worked August 12, 1978. The notice is dated September 20, 1978, effective September 7, 1978. Capodiece credibly testified that he understood from someone at a board of adjustment meeting, probably Fernandez, that Holland's case was dismissed because she voluntarily quit her job. Fernandez, Menacho, Soares, and Wallace, all of whom attended the board of adjustment meeting, all testified, and none of them contradicted Capodiece on this issue.

It is clear, as a factual matter, that Holland quit her job August 12, 1978. The General Counsel did not show otherwise. Stipulations of counsel on this issue are ambiguous, but regardless of their content, the facts show that Holland was not an employee of Respondent from and after August 12, 1978. Whatever happened thereafter does not create a legal issue, so far as Holland is concerned. There is nothing to show that Holland, the Union, or Respondent considered her to be an employee after said date. No legal issue is involved in Holland's case.

Richard Hutson: At times relevant herein Hutson, a member of Local 428, worked on the stock crew at Respondent's store 549, under Store Manager Vincent Spanno and Assistant Store Manager Michael Lamb. Usually, he worked from midnight until 9 a.m., with Sundays off, and had one other day off which varied from week to week. He learned informally, and later by letter from the Union, of the sanction by Local 428 of the Teamsters strike.

Hutson testified that the day after he first learned of the sanction he went to the store, but did not work because of the presence of pickets. Thereafter, he checked for pickets each night he was scheduled to work, except 2 days when he was ill, and each time he checked, pickets were present and he did not work. On one occasion, August 19, no pickets were present and he worked. Approximately 1 month after the strike began and prior to the sanction being lifted, he and some other employees talked with Spanno about returning to work, and Spanno told all of them they had been discharged. No one from management or the Union ever told him he must check his schedule, and check for pickets during his scheduled starts, or that he could be discharged if he failed to work as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from management ever called him to advise that no pickets were present, or to ask him to come to work. He informed the Union of his discharge and attended two board of adjustment meetings concerning the termination. The first was held a month or so after the discharge, attended by discharged employees, union representatives, and representatives of Respondent. They discussed pickets and what constituted a picket line. The second meeting was held a month or so later, attended by much the same group, plus some witnesses from the store. They discussed the same subjects as before. Prior to the second meeting he, Rendon, and Mitchum visited the NLRB.

On cross-examination, Hutson testified that his termination notice shows him as a voluntary quit rather than as a dischargee. Thereafter, he began working for Fry's, and still later, for Manor Market. He did not discuss the termination notice with Spanno, or ask him about it, because his first reaction was to ask union representatives about it. He did not talk with Spanno when he worked August 19, nor does he remember talking with Spanno about the strike, prior to its inception. He never was told that he was permitted to enter the back door of the store, if there were pickets only at the front door. He was reinstated by Respondent, and thereafter on November 3 or 4 quit his position. When he was reinstated by Respondent, he quit working for another store in order to return to Respondent, and subsequently returned to his pre-reinstatement employer after quitting Respondent.

He attended the second board of adjustment meeting because Respondent improperly considered him a voluntary quit for allegedly not working August 14, 16, 17, 21, 22, and 26. He did not attend the meeting at which Respondent's offer of reinstatement was considered.

Spanno testified that he did not talk with Hutson during the strike, and that he prepared Hutson's termination slip, based on work schedules and timecards.

Lamb testified that he talked with Hutson on Saturday, August 19, and gave him information received from Lou Menacho of the Union, i.e., that if there were no pickets at work scheduled time, employees had to go to work, and further, that employees could go in the back door if no pickets were there. Hutson worked that same night, August 19, when no pickets were present.

Discussion

Hutson appeared to be a confused witness with a rather poor memory. However, his testimony concerning the nature of his departure from the store's employment appeared truthful, was corroborated by Rendon and Mitchum, and is credited. Although Spanno referred to Hutson as a "voluntary quit," it is clear and found that Hutson was discharged.

Hutson testified that he checked for pickets each night, but Spanno testified that Hutson's absences were shown on work schedules and timecards. Hutson testified that he would have worked had there been no pickets, and the record shows that he did work in the absence of pickets on August 19. However, Lamb testified that he had informed Hutson during the day of August 19 that Menacho had told him that employees "had" to work as scheduled, if there were no pickets. As found elsewhere herein, the testimony of Lamb relative to Menacho is credited. In any event, in view of Hutson's generally unconvincing testimony and Spanno's credibility, Spanno's testimony that Hutson did not work when scheduled and when there were no pickets is credited.

It is found that Hutson was discharged by Respondent for not working as scheduled during the strike sanction, in the absence of pickets. The legal issue involved is discussed below.

Jerry Lee Kimber: At times relevant herein Kimber, a member of Local 428, worked for Respondent's store 538, as a member of the night stock crew. His schedule was irregular, and changed each week. The store manager was Larry Stevens, and the assistant store manager was Dave (not otherwise identified).

Kimber testified that he learned informally of Local 428's sanction of the Teamsters strike, and received no formal notification from the Union. He called the store to find out if pickets were present, and learned that they were. Thereafter, he called and drove by the store several times to learn if pickets were present. They were present each time he checked, but on some occasions no one answered the telephone and he was unable to check. On a date he does not remember, but which was "a couple of days" after the strike was over, fellow employee Richard DiMartini called him and said Kimber was scheduled to go to work that night and that Kimber should report for work. Kimber was "totally exhausted," and declined to go to work. He went to the store the following day and talked with Stevens, who said he had been discharged. No one from management or the Union ever told him to check his schedule during the strike, or to check for pickets on work scheduled days, or said he could be discharged for failing to report as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from management called him during the strike to advise him about pickets or to ask him to come to work. He does not remember how long it was before he talked with Stevens that he learned that the sanction had been lifted, nor does he remember how he learned that fact. He told union representatives about his discharge, and attended two meetings to discuss the discharge. At one of the meetings, union representatives discussed with discharged employees Respondent's offer of reinstatement on former schedules, with benefits but without backpay, provided the employees' acceptance was unanimous.

On cross-examination, Kimber testified that he had been a real estate agent since October 1977, and was working only part-time for Respondent. While working for Respondent, he sold real estate 8 or 9 hours each day. In his pretrial affidavit, he stated that he learned about September 6 that the sanction had been lifted. His discharge conversation with Stevens was approximately September 15. He did not check his schedule during the strike. His pretrial statement was true, wherein he stated:

> I did not call in during the week after sanctions were lifted. I did not report to work during this period, September 7th–September 15th, because I was busy with my job as a realtor.

Kimber was reinstated, and quit in November 1979 to sell real estate.

Stevens did not testify. Kimber's termination notice[27] shows that he was terminated for failure to appear at work September 8 and 9, and that Kimber had not been heard from for "over 6 weeks."

Discussion

Kimber's testimony was confusing and incomplete. He seemed to imply that DiMartini called on behalf of the store, a couple of days after the strike was over, to tell him to come to work. However, DiMartini's position was not described—it is not clear whether DiMartini was a friend, a coworker, a management agent, or something else. In his pretrial affidavit, which he could neither affirm nor deny in his testimony so far as dates were concerned, Kimber said he knew that about September 6 the sanction had been lifted, yet the sanction was not lifted until September 7. He said he could not remember whether he knew about September 6 that the sanction had been lifted. Kimber could not put a date on DiMartini's call, yet he said he said he reported for work the following day, while in his affidavit he said he did not report to work at all between September 7 and 15. Further, he testified that he did not go to the store immediately after DiMartini called because he was "exhausted," yet he stated in his affidavit that he did not go to the store between September 7 and 15, because "I was busy with my job as a realtor." He acknowledged at trial that the affidavit was true.

Under such circumstances, the General Counsel's contention that Kimber was fired because he did not work as scheduled during the sanction is not persuasive. Kimber's testimony is too unreliable to provide a basis for finding that Respondent illegally fired him. By his own testimony, Kimber did not report to the store for at least a week after the sanction was lifted. He did not testify that his reason for not reporting was lack of knowledge that the sanction was lifted, nor was he fired an unreasonably short time after the sanction was lifted. Patently, he was indifferent to his job with Respondent since he was busy with his real estate job. Respondent was fully justified in considering Kimber as having abandoned his job, and in discharging him for that reason.

It is found, as a factual matter, that Kimber was fired because he did not return to work after the sanction was withdrawn. The legal issue involved is discussed below.

Carlos Lopez: Lopez, a member of Local 428, was a part-time clerk apprentice at times relevant herein, working at Respondent's store 508 on an irregular schedule that changed every week. The store manager was Willis Cole and the assistant manager was James Finley.

Lopez testified that he learned from a letter he received from the Union that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike. The day before the strike started he talked with Cole and asked what he should do. Cole replied, "Well, there's pickets outside. You're not supposed to come to work. But if there's no pickets you're supposed to be at work." Thereafter, he honored the strike, but he called in every day for 3 weeks to check for pickets. He talked with Cole or whomever answered the telephone. He received a letter from the Union during the morning of September 9 advising that the sanction had been lifted. He called and talked with Finley on the telephone at 10:30 or 11 a.m. and asked about the strike. Finley said he was supposed to have been at work on Friday, and missed again on Saturday, and that as far as he was concerned Lopez was discharged. He then talked with Cole, who told him the same thing. No one had called on Thursday, Friday, or Saturday to tell him the sanction had been lifted and he was supposed to be at work. No one from Respondent's management or the Union ever told him it was his duty to check the work schedule during the strike to check for pickets or that he could be discharged for not working as scheduled when pickets were not present. He informed the Union of his termination, and a few weeks later attended a meeting with other employees who had been discharged, store managers, and others. The discharges were discussed. A few weeks later he attended another meeting at the union hall, and the discharged employee discussed with union representatives Respondent's offer of reinstatement without backpay, provided acceptance of the offer was unanimous. The employees decided to accept the offer, and to pursue their backpay claims through the NLRB.

On cross-examination, Lopez testified that employees "were supposed to call in to get our schedule and I did this." He said his calls to the store were to check on pickets, and to check his schedule. He never went to the store to check for pickets—he only called in on the telephone.

Cole testified that he is familiar with Respondent's policy that employees are supposed to work during a sanctioned strike if no pickets are present. He prepares or approves, and nearly always personally posts, work schedules for the store. Schedule preparation and posting during the strike were done in the same manner as prior to the strike. Lopez usually worked a late afternoon or evening shift. Lopez did not come to work as scheduled on Friday, September 8, and came to the store at approximately 5 p.m. on September 9. He told Lopez that the sanction was lifted Thursday afternoon and he had been scheduled for work the Friday and Saturday but had not reported, hence, he was discharged. Lopez replied that he had been busy working for Tropicana Foods. Matt Erkle, head clerk, and James Finley, grocery department head, tried unsuccessfully to reach Lopez by telephone on Friday and Saturday. The store employed approximately 35 employees, of which 15 or 20 came to the store to work or called in on Thursday. All scheduled employees reported or called in, except three—Lopez, Alvarado, and Alarcon. Cole worked on September 8 and 9 from store opening until closing. Approximately 50 or 60 percent of the employees honored the picket line and did not work during the sanctioned period. Lopez was discharged because he failed to work as scheduled after the sanction was lifted. Cole learned on Thursday about the sanction being lifted, when employees came to work and told him they heard it on the news.

Discussion

To the extent of any discrepancies in the testimony of Lopez and Cole, Cole is credited, and Cole's version of events is credited.

As discussed in the case of Alarcon and Alvarado, there is no convincing evidence that Respondent personally was antagonistic toward Lopez because of his union or other protected activity or toward the Union. Lopez was not treated disparately from other employees similarly situated.

As discussed elsewhere, the nature of the store's business necessitated close and complicated scheduling of employees' work. Cole's testimony that Respondent's policy is to discharge employees for unexcused or unauthorized absences was logical and is credited. Attempts to get in touch with Lopez on two separate days were not successful. Cole's testimony that Lopez said he did not report for work because he had been busy working for another employer was not rebutted and is credited. Lopez did not give any convincing reason in his testimony for his failure to report for work after the sanction was lifted. Regardless of why Lopez failed to report, there is no evidence that it was Respondent's duty to seek him out and ask him to come to work. Lopez did not report for work a reasonable time after the sanction was lifted; such reasonable time is shown by the fact that nearly all other employees returned to work on Thursday and Friday as scheduled. Although discharge may have been somewhat severe as discipline, that matter is for Respondent's decision. The legal issue involved is discussed below.

Elizabeth Mahon: Mahon, a member of Local 1179, began working in the summer of 1978 at Alpha Beta's store 515, as a part-time apprentice checker. Her store manager was Dewey Mayer. Mahon was on an irregular schedule, which changed every week.

Mahon testified that the day after she was notified by Local 1179 of the fact that the Retail Clerks had sanctioned the Teamsters strike, she talked with Chuck Mattson, a union representative, explained that she had no experience in such a situation, and asked what she should do. Mattson said to call Mayer and find out whether or not the store was being picketed. If there were pickets, she should not enter the store; if there were no pickets, she was "to go in to work." She called Mayer, who said pickets were at the store. She said she could not come in if there were pickets, and he replied, "Would you please come in in plain clothes and work?" She said she would check with Mattson, which she did. Mattson said if she crossed the picket line, she would be subject to a heavy union fine. She called Mayer and said she could not do as he requested. She called Mayer thereafter on each of 3 days after the sanction was in effect, and was advised that pickets were present. On the third day she also called Mattson, asked if she had to call the store each day, and was informed, "I didn't have to call every day, that if they needed me, or the pickets were gone, if I was able to come to work, and I had a schedule, they [the store] would call me." Thereafter, she did not call Mayer or personally check to see if pickets were present at the store. Mahon was in Los Angeles September 4, 5, and 6. She learned from a news broadcast the evening of the day the sanction was lifted that such was the fact, and she also was notified of that fact by letter from the Union. The following morning she asked her husband to call Mayer for her, and was advised she had been discharged. She went to the store that day and talked with Mayer, who gave her a discharge notice and advised her that she had been terminated for failure to report for work on 6 days when she was scheduled to work and there were no pickets present. The termination notice is dated September 20, 1978, effective August 21, 1978. She said Mattson had told her that Mayer would notify her if no pickets were present. No one from Respondent's management or the Union had told her that it was her duty to check her work schedule during the strike, to check for pickets, or that she could be discharged if she did not work when no pickets were present. No one from Respondent's management called her during the strike, nor did she call the store to check her schedule or to check for pickets after the third day of the sanction. She talked with Mattson about her discharge, and on September 25 Mattson told her Respondent refused to rehire her, and that they considered her to be a voluntary quit, however, they would give her a good recommendation. Mattson said there was nothing more he could do for her.

Mayer testified that work schedules which he always approves and posts and sometimes prepares were prepared and posted during the strike in the same manner as before the strike. Mahon was scheduled to work during the strike, on the same basis as prior to the strike. The work schedule for the week of August 13–19[28] shows that Mahon did not report for work on August 15–19, although she was scheduled to work on those days. The schedule for August 20–26[29] shows that Mahon was scheduled to work August 21–25, which was a normal prestrike schedule. Mahon did not come to work on August 21, and she was discharged that day by Mayer. Picketing commenced the afternoon of August 9, on a 24-hour basis, and continued through August 12. No pickets appeared after August 12, and that fact is based on personal observation. On August 13 and 14 he called some employees in order to reactivate the store, but most of the employees had been calling in each day. Mahon did not call in on August 13 or 14, and Mayer tried on three occasions to get in touch with Mahon by telephone. He discharged Mahon on August 21 and so informed her husband, who called the store to find out if any picketers were present. The husband said Mahon was in Los Angeles, and Mayer replied that there were no pickets, and she should be back at work. On September 8 Mahon and her husband came to the store, and Mayer explained that he expected Mahon to come to work after the pickets left, but that she did not, and he could not get in touch with her, therefore he discharged her. Of all the store employees, totaling approximately 45, only Mahon and Curtis McCullom did not return to work after the pickets left, and both employees were discharged. The Union took no action, so far as Mayer knows, other than to call Mayer on the telephone to ask why Mahon was discharged.

Discussion

Mayer's testimony was firm, given without hesitation or uncertainty, and convincing. Mayer is credited. It is found there were no pickets at the store from and after August 13, 1978. There is little discrepancy between Mayer's testimony and that of Mahon. It is clear that Mahon intentionally did not check for pickets after the first 3 days of checking, and that in so doing, she relied solely on Mattson's advice. She never discussed the subject with any member of Respondent's management. However, as discussed supra, Mahon and all other employees had ample and continuous written notice from Respondent that absence from work when no pickets were present could result in disciplinary action.

It is equally clear that Mahon did not report for work as scheduled, for 6 successive days when there were no pickets at the store, and that she was discharged because of those absences.

A subsidiary issue is presented so far as Mahon's reason for absence from work is concerned. There is no showing that Mahon absented herself from work during the 6 days involved because of her sympathy with the Teamsters. It appears that her absence was occasioned solely by her failure to check for pickets, since she testified on cross-examination that when she called the first 3 days of picketing she was prepared to go to work if no pickets were at the store, and the sanction still was effective at that time. The legal issue thus presented is whether or not motive for failure or refusal to work during a sanctioned strike is relevant. That issue is discussed infra.

The principal issue is whether or not Mahon was discharged in violation of the Act. That issue also is discussed infra.

Josie Melendez: Melendez, a member of Local 428, worked at Ralph's Grocery Company store 94, at times relevant herein, as a part-time cashier, on a varying schedule 4 or 5 days, 24 to 32 hours per week. Her manager was Darrell Sniffen, and Sniffen had two assistant managers, Jan Harrington and James Shelton. Melendez was discharged because of failure to report to work as scheduled in the absence of pickets.[30] She attended a board of adjustment meeting concerning her discharge on a date she could not remember, but which she testified was sometime in January or February 1979. She accepted Respondent Ralph's offer of reinstatement with seniority but without backpay conveyed to her by a union representative, and returned to her job in January or February 1979.

Melendez testified that she learned from Local 428's letter of August 9, received and read by her, that the Local had sanctioned the Teamsters strike. She went to work the next day she was scheduled, but did not enter the store because of the picket line that was in effect. She called Sniffen from a telephone booth and told him she could not go to work because of the picket line. He told her to come to work "and look the other way." She replied, "no," and Sniffen gave the telephone to Harrington, who told her to come to work as scheduled, an hour ahead of time, and to call from a telephone booth. Thereafter, she checked for pickets two or three times each week, either by calling the store on the telephone, by going to the store, or by having her niece go to the store. On three or four occasions each week, she called the store and talked with "different people" to tell them she was not going to come to work because of the picket line. On Friday or Saturday of the week she was fired, someone other than Sniffen, but she does not remember who, told her on the telephone that no schedule was posted for the following week and that "it was a day-to-day basis." Thereafter, she did not check to see if there was a schedule until she had her son call on September 6. On the Sunday before she was discharged, Shelton called her on the telephone and asked her to go to work, and she refused, saying that she could not return to work until Local 428 told her to. Prior to that time, no one from the store had called her. On September 6, the day she was fired, she instructed her 13-year old son to call the store for her, and tell them she "wasn't going in." Her son later told her she had been discharged. Later that day she called Sniffen on the telephone and asked why she had been discharged, and he replied that it was because she did not come to work when there was no picket line. She said she "figured the line was still there" and Sniffen replied that "he couldn't be calling all the employees to tell them there was no line." Melendez testified that no one from the Union or store management ever told her that she was required to check for pickets each day she was scheduled, and that if she did not work in the absence of pickets, she could be discharged. She received in the mail a copy of Local 428's letter of September 8, notifying members that the strike sanction had been lifted. She notified the Union the day after her discharge, and attended the board of adjustment meeting referred to above.

On cross-examination, Melendez testified that Respondent's rules are posted on a bulletin board near the timeclock, and she "figured if you don't call in if you're sick or something they'll fire you from any job"; such a conclusion is "common sense." She denied ever having seen the work schedule for the week ending September 2,[31] or the schedule for the week ending September 9.[32]

Sniffen testified that he prepared the work schedules for all employees, and posted them each Friday morning to cover the following week, from Sunday through Saturday. From two to six pickets appeared at the store on August 8, and thereafter picketed 24 hours each day, for approximately 28 consecutive days. There were no pickets at the store from and after Thursday, August 31. His statements relative to pickets were based on personal observations, and on employee reports. Beginning August 31, Sniffen, Harrington, and Shelton began calling employees to come back to work, since there were no pickets at the store. By the following day, September 1, all scheduled employees except Pat O'Brien were back at work. Seven or eight of those employees were called on the telephone, but the remainder, approximately 10, came in voluntarily. However, Melendez did not come to work on Friday, September 1, as scheduled, nor did she work on Saturday, September 2, as scheduled. He had called Melendez on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, but no one answered the telephone. Harrington also attempted to call Melendez on Saturday, but with no success. Shelton tried without success to call Melendez on Friday, but reached her on Sunday, September 3. Shelton reported that Melendez said she would not return to work until instructed by the Union to do so. Sniffen called Melendez on Thursday morning, September 5, and told her she should return to work, but she refused to do so until the Union told her to return. He told her that if she did not come to work her refusal could become cause for discharge. Melendez replied that in such case she would be terminated. As shown by the schedule, Melendez did not work on September 5 and 6. Sniffen called Respondent's personnel manager Gayle Fahr and explained the Melendez matter, and was told that Melendez should be called once more, and that if she refused to come to work she should be discharged. Sniffen called Melendez again, but could not reach her. His understanding of company rules was that unexcused absences for 3 days was grounds for discharge, and prepared Melendez' proposed discharge, which was the basis of Fahr's notification to Melendez. In October or November Sniffen attended a board of adjustment meeting relative to Melendez, at which time her discharge was discussed. Sniffen testified that other employees regularly checked schedules during the strike sanction, personally and by telephone, and that some employees, possibly 12 or so, crossed picket lines to check.

[30] Melendez was not given any documentary notices of discharge.

[31] R. Exh. 22.

Sniffen testified that during the first week of picketing he overheard Union Representatives Herb Sisti and Lillian Sugimoto tell employees that if there were no pickets at the back door employees could come to work, even if there were pickets at the front door, and that "we really don't want to back the Teamsters."

Discussion

Sniffen and Melendez generally agreed on the ultimate facts involved in this issue, but they disagreed on many details. Sniffen was an impressive witness. His answers were prompt and firm, and he gave the impression of a forthright and candid witness. Melendez' testimony was not of equal calibre. She seemed unsure of herself, and was not convincing in her recitation. To the extent that the testimony of Sniffen and Melendez differs, Sniffen is credited, and his version of events involved in this issue is accepted as accurate.

Based on Sniffen's testimony, it is found that there were no pickets at Respondent's store involved herein from and after the first morning shift of pickets on August 31; that Sniffen, Harrington, and Shelton made several unsuccessful attempts to get in touch with Melendez on and after August 31; that Melendez refused to come to work on September 3, 5, and 6 after Sniffen and Shelton got in touch with her and asked her to, and that she said she would not come to work until Local 428 told her to; and that all other employees did work as scheduled from and after August 31. Finally, it is found that Melendez refused to come to work after she was informed that she was scheduled to work and there were no pickets at the store.

Melendez contends that she regularly checked for pickets, personally, by telephone, and through intermediaries. That contention is given little credence, particularly in view of Melendez' position that she would not come to work, regardless of the presence or absence of pickets. The legal issue involved in Melendez' discharge is discussed below.

Carol Mitchum: Mitchum, a member of Local 428, was employed at times relevant herein as a clerk in Respondent's store 549. The store manager was Vincent Spanno and the assistant store manager was Michael Lamb. She worked on a regular schedule, from 6 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. She learned informally on August 9 that the Teamsters strike had been sanctioned by Local 428, and learned of that fact later in the day, by letter from the Union. Counsel stipulated that there was picketing continuously from midnight, around the clock, on August 9–12.

Mitchum testified that she talked with Lamb on the telephone Thursday morning, August 10, after learning that pickets were at the store, and told Lamb she would not report for work that day, to which he replied okay. She talked with Lamb the following day when she went to get her paycheck:

> He told me that I could be considered a no-show because he felt—he said there were no pickets there that morning. And I told him that I did not know that I had to check for picketers. It was a sanctioned strike and all I needed in order not to work was that letter saying it was a sanctioned strike by my Union.
> Q. To your knowledge, was Mr. Lamb the person in charge that day?
> A. Yes he was.

Lamb did not say that she could be terminated if she did not work when no pickets were present. Later that day she called the Union, and said she felt threatened by what Lamb had said. She was not told by anyone at the Union that she was required to check for pickets, or to work if there were no pickets. Thereafter she did, however, check for pickets each morning she was scheduled to work, prior to her schedule, for approximately 3 weeks, at which time there ceased to be schedules. Pickets always were present when she checked. On the third Friday after picketing commenced, she went to the store and talked with Spanno, and said she was sorry, but she could not cross a picket line. Spanno said he understood, and "that there was definitely no hard feelings." She checked for a schedule that day, and there was none. No one in management or the Union ever told her she should check her schedule while honoring a picket line, or to check for pickets, or that she could be discharged for not working as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from management ever called her to say there were no pickets or to ask her to come to work. She was notified by union letter that the sanction had been lifted, and went to the store the following day. Spanno notified her and other employees that they had been discharged. She attended a board of adjustment meeting concerning her discharge, approximately the end of September. Discharged employees, union representatives, and Food Employers Council representatives were present. They discussed the discharges and related matters. There was a second meeting, approximately in mid-October, attended by some of the same persons and also by Spanno and Lamb. A third meeting was held the end of October, at the union hall, attended by discharged employees and union representatives. The employees were told that Respondent offered reinstatement with full seniority and the same schedules, but with no backpay, provided the offer unanimously was accepted. The employees protested, and the offer was discussed at length. Terry Rendon advised the employees that the NLRB had informed her, as well as Mitchum, that they should accept the offer and seek backpay through the NLRB. During the meeting, Rendon called NLRB concerning the other employees, and informed them that the NLRB said they should do the same. The employees then voted to accept the offer.

On cross-examination, Mitchum testified that she did not know, of her own knowledge, whether or not she was scheduled to work during the week of August 27. Spanno never told her that schedules had been discontinued. She does not know who told her that.

Spanno testified that Mitchum called him on the telephone August 25 to check for pickets, and stated that she was not going to work because of the strike. He told her she was obligated to work if no pickets were present, and she said she would not work while there was a strike. He told her no pickets were present the day she called on her scheduled shift. He prepared Mitchum's termination notice, on the basis of the work schedule. The schedule shows there were no pickets at Mitchum's starting time.

Lamb testified that early in the strike he told Mitchum when she came to the store to pick up her paycheck that she must come to the store when scheduled, to check for pickets. She said she would.

Discussion

So far as knowledge of what Respondent expected relative to work when no pickets were present is concerned, it is clear, as discussed elsewhere herein, that Respondent fully notified all employees, by posting notices and mailing notices to employees, that it expected such work. Thus, whether or not Spanno also made such a statement to Mitchum is immaterial.

Spanno was an impressive witness. His testimony concerning events, and that Mitchum did not work as scheduled when pickets were not present, is credited. The legal issue presented by the facts is discussed below.

Norma Myers: Myers, a member of Local 428, worked at times relevant herein, at Respondent's store 509. Jiminez was store manager and Rose was assistant store manager. Myers was a grocery clerk, and her work schedule changed each week. She learned of the strike sanction when she received notice in the mail from the Union. She learned of picketing the first night of such activity, when she was at the store.

Myers testified that she talked with Jiminez at the store a few days after the strike began:

> Well, I talked to Pete and I told him that I really didn't like the whole idea of the picketers being there and I was afraid of what they might do, and that I needed a steady income and a steady income wasn't going to be provided for me by only being able to work when there wasn't picketers there. And that I really had thought about it and felt that if we had sanctioned the strike, then it meant that we were going to uphold the strike as long as the strike lasted, or until we dropped the sanction. That they didn't have to have people on the doors in order for that to be a strike. And I really wasn't going to work through the whole thing, throughout the strike. So I told him about it and he said, he didn't really blame me, because his daughters had gone to work for somebody else during the strike also. And, that it made sense to him. And I said, okay, I'll see you when the strike's over. He said, okay, bye.[33]

After that conversation, Myers did not check for pickets at the store. She had another conversation with Jiminez at a Labor Day picnic, and Jiminez teased her about having a "nice little vacation" from work. She heard about the sanction being lifted on the radio the day it happened and she later received a letter from the Union telling her the sanction had been discontinued. On the day of the lifting she called Jiminez on the telephone and asked about coming to work, and Jiminez told her she had been discharged for failure to report for work when there were no pickets. No one from Respondent's management, or from the Union, had told her she was subject to possible discharge if she failed to work as scheduled when there were no pickets. No one from management called her during the sanction to advise that there were no pickets or to ask her to come to work. She reported the discharge to the Union, and approximately a week later attended a board of adjustment meeting. Also in attendance were other employees who had been discharged, as well as union representatives from the Food Employers Council. The discharges were discussed at the meeting. A week or so later a second meeting was held, attended by much the same group, plus store managers involved in the discharges, including Jiminez. The discharges again were discussed. A few weeks later a third meeting was held at the union hall, attended by the dischargees and by union representatives, who told the employees that the Union had received an offer to reinstate employees to their prior positions, on their former schedules, without backpay, provided the offer unanimously was accepted. The employees were angry, and objected until one employee told the others that NLRB representatives had advised her that the employees should accept the offer, then file a claim with the NLRB for backpay. The offer then was accepted by the employees.

On cross-examination, Myers testified that she was on vacation from August 23 through September 3, during which period of time she worked at a grocery store unrelated to Respondent. On Friday, September 1, she made no effort to ascertain what her schedule was for the following week, nor did she make any such effort thereafter, until she called Jiminez on September 8. After her reinstatement she again was terminated by Respondent for swearing at her supervisor. She did not report for work on September 5, 6, or 7, nor did she check for pickets on those days. She did not receive a termination notice. She worked after the sanction until picketers appeared.

Jiminez testified that Myers was scheduled to work during the week of September 5 when no picketers were present at the store. He had only one conversation with Myers, which was at the store, during the second week of the strike. Myers told him that she was going to "honor the strike," and would not be coming to work. He told her that it was her choice, if no pickets were present, but if there were no pickets, she was obligated to check her schedule, and work if scheduled. She said she would not do that, and he told her that, in such a situation, she would have to suffer the consequences. He did not hear from Myers until the strike was over. He based Myers' termination notice on her work schedule, and talked with her on September 9 when she called on the telephone to get her schedule. He informed Myers that she had been discharged because she had failed to report for work as scheduled, when no pickets were present, on September 6, 7, and 8. Rose generally corroborated Jiminez.

Discussion

The essential facts involved in Myers' discharge are not in dispute, but the versions of Myers and Jiminez differ somewhat in detail. Although those detailed differences do not control any finding, Myers is credited to the extent that any discrepancy is considered. So far as picketing is concerned, Jiminez is credited, and it is found that Myers was discharged as Jiminez testified, i.e., because she did not work as scheduled, when pickets were not present, on September 6, 7, and 8. The sanction was withdrawn on September 7, but Myers already by then had been terminated, thus, the legality of the termination is in issue, as discussed below.

Jackie Niswonger: Niswonger, a member of Local 428, worked at times relevant herein as a part-time clerk and checker in Respondent's store 523. The store manager was Terry Zink and the assistant store manager was Tony San Fillipo. Often her work schedule was in the evening, from 5 to 10 p.m. or 6 to 11 p.m.

Niswonger testified that shortly before the strike she talked with Zink, and said that, since she never had been involved in a strike, she would like to know what her rights were:

> At that time he told me that the company wouldn't hold it against you if you chose not to cross picket lines. But I would have to let him know, and I would have to stick with my decision because he had a schedule to write; I couldn't work one day, and then decide I didn't want to work the next day because of the schedule; and to let him know. It was my choice. The company wouldn't hold it against you.

She received a letter from the Union advising her that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike, and she knew of pickets appearing at the store. She does not remember when pickets appeared, but "we were one of the last stores to get picket lines." She worked during the strike until picket lines appeared and, when pickets first appeared, she called Zink on the telephone and said she did not want to cross the picket line. She called the first week to get her schedule, but did not call thereafter. She drove to the store every day or every other day to check for the presence of pickets, and they were always there when she checked. She heard informally that the sanction had been lifted, and also received a letter to that effect from the Union. Shortly after she first heard, she called Zink on the telephone and asked for her schedule. He said she had been terminated, because she did not work on two or three dates when no pickets were present. No one from management ever told her she had to check her work schedule during the strike, or that she had to check for pickets when she was scheduled to work, or that she could be discharged if she did not work as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from management called her during the strike to advise that no pickets were at the store, or to ask her to come to work. She advised the Union of her termination, and a couple of weeks later attended a meeting at the Union concerning her discharge. A few weeks later she attended a second meeting at the Union, at which Zink also was present. She testified, "Well, they [later explained as representatives of the Food Employers Council] asked to have a voluntary quit put on my record rather than a termination."

On cross-examination, Niswonger testified that she filed a claim for sick leave taken in August 1978. She would not have worked during the sanction, even if no pickets were present. Claudia Wallace, a union representative, suggested, at the second meeting relative to her discharge, that Niswonger be considered a voluntary quit rather than a dischargee, and Respondent later agreed to that suggestion, by letter. Before going to the meeting, she suggested to the Union that she be considered a voluntary quit, and at the time of the meeting she was employed at a store of an employer other than Respondent. Backpay never was discussed.

Zink testified that pickets first appeared at the store during the week of August 14 or 15, and picketing was continuous thereafter for approximately 2 weeks. After 2 weeks picketing was very sporadic, and on some days no pickets were present. There were no pickets on August 29 and September 5. He worked 12 to 14 hours each day of the strike. Approximately a week before the strike he talked with Niswonger:

> Okay. I explained what I felt were their rights. I told them that if they came to work and there was a picket line out in front of the store, then they would have to make a decision on what they were going to do. But, they were to report to work every day as scheduled. If there was no picket line at the store, they were to come to work and complete their shift. And primarily just explained, basically, what I felt their rights and obligations were.
> Q. What was her response?
> A. She said that she understood.

Zink denied stating to Niswonger that he would need to know in advance whether she was willing to cross the picket line. He called Niswonger on the telephone August 9 because she was not at work as scheduled, and no pickets were present. Niswonger later called back and said she would not come to work because she could not get a babysitter. He told her she would be discharged if she did not work as scheduled in the future. She worked August 11 and 12, as scheduled, when there were no pickets, but did not work thereafter, as scheduled. She did not work as scheduled on August 29 or September 5, when there were no pickets. She was discharged after not working on September 5, and papers were sent through regular channels for the discharge. No termination notice was sent to Niswonger. He advised her on the telephone, September 9 or 10, that she had been discharged. During the first week of picketing he talked with Lou Menacho of the Union, at which time 10 to 15 employees were present. Several employees asked Menacho questions concerning the definition of a bona fide picket line, and their obligations. Menacho defined a picket line as not including pickets sitting down in front of the store, and not including pickets present at some entrances but not at others. Further, Menacho stated:

> He said they were obligated to report to work every day that they were scheduled. He said that if there were no pickets, they were obligated to go inside the store and work their shift. He said that if they got inside the store and they were working and pickets showed up, they were obligated to complete their shift. And he said that if they failed to do so, it could result in their termination.

Zink attended a board of adjustment meeting at the union hall on October 3. Also in attendance were representatives from the Union and the FEC, Niswonger, and others. Zink said Menacho stated that he had told employees they were obligated to report to work as scheduled, and if no pickets were present, they were obligated to report for work. Menacho agreed that he had made such a statement. Union representatives asked if Respondent would consider changing Niswonger's discharge to a voluntary quit, and Respondent's representatives agreed to the change. Nothing was said concerning Niswonger's right to refuse to work in the absence of pickets.

The store manager prepared all work schedules, and Zink reviewed and approved them. The store had approximately 50 employees, and some employees were on duty 24 hours each day, on various shifts. Only 2 or 3 employees other than Niswonger honored the picket lines. Absence of pickets was verified by Zink's personal observations, and through reports of employees to Zink. Only one schedule was maintained during the strike. If an employee did not report for work, a replacement was called in. Niswonger was not discharged for refusing to cross a picket line.

Menacho testified that he talked with Zink during the sanction, and that no employees, or anyone else, was present:

> Well, Terry was complaining about the Teamster pickets. They were making noise. He claimed that they were drinking beer and wanted me to talk to them and then he asked me what was a bona fide picket line, so I—We got into a discussion on that. I told him that as long as there was somebody out there with a picket sign either in their hand or near by, that as far as I was concerned, that was a bona fide line.
> Q. Do you recall anything else being said?
>
> A. He asked me if there were no pickets out there, did the people have to come to work and I said that it was their option. That if there weren't any pickets there, we preferred that they didn't go to work. It was their option to go to work or not.
> Q. Did you tell him that if pickets were sitting down that employees could enter through the back door?
>
> A. No.
> Q. Did you tell him that the employees had to go to work if there were no pickets?
> A. No.

Menacho testified that at the second board of adjustment meeting Zink "tried to say that I told him that the members were obligated to go to work if there were no pickets at the store," and Menacho said "that wasn't true."

Scott Shields, head clerk of store 523 at times relevant herein, corroborated Zink's testimony concerning the nature and times of picketing. Shields testified that a group of approximately 10 employees talked with Menacho at the store early in the strike. Zink also was present. The employees asked Menacho about their status during the strike, about requirements of a bona fide picket line, and about the possibility of being fined. Menacho replied:

> If there is no picket line, we are obligated to work. In essence, we were supposed to be there. Other people asked questions as well, one to define what a picket line was and to what degree, as far as—he was stating that if there is a picket at the front door and not at the back door you can go in the back door, that would be up to you.

Thereafter, Shields stated, "a lot of the people seized that opportunity to work." Menacho denied that Shields was present when he talked with Zink.

Discussion

Niswonger seemed to have a poor memory, and was not a convincing witness. Zink appeared quite straightforward and impressive, and to the extent that their testimony differs Zink is credited. It is found that Niswonger did not report for work on August 9 and 29, nor on September 5 as scheduled, and that no pickets were present at the store when she was scheduled to work.

Zink did not testify concerning Niswonger's testimony relative to her quitting rather than being discharged, but regardless of that testimony, it is apparent that Niswonger was discharged, and the legal issue is considered below on that basis.

Zink was a more credible witness than Menacho. Zink's testimony concerning Menacho's statement was convincing, and was corroborated by Shields. Zink and Shields are credited on this point. It is further noted that many employees at various stores worked during the sanctioned period, yet were not fined by the Union. The inference is strong that some of them entered through nonpicketed doors, even during picketing at other doors.

The credited testimony of Chris Anderson on this point is revealing. She credibly stated:

> Q. Did you follow any practice with respect to reporting to the store during the strike?
> A. Yes, I phoned into my store to talk to either my store manager or the man in charge, to inquire if there were pickets there, or I would drive down there. I live real close to my store. I would drive to the store and see if there were pickets up or not.
> Q. Could you explain to the Administrative Law Judge why you did either of those things?
> A. Well, I did not want to cross a picket line, but I wanted to work. I wouldn't have worked if there were pickets up. So I wanted to make sure that they weren't there when I was supposed to go to work.

Q. When you drove to the store, what, if anything, would you do?

A. I usually would just drive right into the parking lot and, if no one was up front, then I would drive around to the back and see if there were pickets in the back, which there weren't—I think we hardly ever had any pickets in the back—and then I'd just park and go to work if there was no one there.

Florence O'Day: At times relevant herein, O'Day, a member of Local 428, worked as a flower woman at Respondent's store 509 on a part-time, regular schedule. The store manager was Peter Jiminez and the assistant store manager was Randy Rose.

O'Day testified that she received a letter from the Union notifying her that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike. Thereafter, she had a conversation with Jiminez, and told him she did not want to come to work during the strike because she was afraid of violence. Jiminez said it was her choice, whether or not she came to work. There were pickets at the store that day, and she did not come to work thereafter. She was new in the Union and did not know what she was supposed to do. Her fellow employees told her she should check at the store to see if pickets were present, even if she did not come to work. Thereafter, she checked for pickets each day before she was scheduled to go to work, personally or by telephone, for the first couple of weeks. She then began checking only once or twice each week. Pickets always were present when she checked. No one from Respondent's management or from the Union told her she could be discharged if she did not work as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one called her from the store to tell her no pickets were present or to ask her to come to work. On September 9 she received a letter from the Union dated September 8, 1978, advising that the sanction had been lifted, but she did not report for work the following Saturday, for which she was scheduled. She reported for work as scheduled the following Monday, September 11, and Jiminez told her, "You are terminated on a technicality," but he did not explain. She said she would report the matter to the Union, and he said, "Go ahead. Maybe they'll get your job back for you." She went to a meeting the end of September, attended by several employees, union representatives, and members of the FEC. All the discharges were discussed. She attended a second meeting a week or so later, at which the same general group was present, plus the store managers involved, including Jiminez. Jiminez stated at the meeting that she was discharged August 21 because the picketers were at an 8 o'clock coffeebreak when she was scheduled to work. She attended a third meeting a week or so later, at which the discharged employees and union representatives were present. Respondent's offer to reinstate the employees without backpay, provided the employees unanimously agreed, was discussed and approved. After the meeting Rendon said she was going to seek the assistance of the NLRB, and all the employees decided to do the same.

On cross-examination, O'Day said she does not know who she talked with when she called the store to ask about pickets; she never talked with Jiminez on the telephone. She said she would not have worked when she called in, even if pickets were not there, since it was a sanctioned strike. She did not go to the store on September 6, 8, or 9, which were regularly scheduled days for her, nor did she call the store on those days. There were other days on which she neither went to, nor called, the store.

Jiminez testified that he was on vacation during the beginning of the week of August 12, and when he returned to the store there were no pickets. During the following week, August 14–19, pickets were present most of the time. None were there on Saturday of that week. The following week picketing was sporadic, and no pickets appeared the last 4 days of the week. A few pickets were present early in the week ending September 2, but none were present "towards the end of the week." The following week, beginning September 5, no pickets were present. The department head prepared all work schedules, and Jiminez reviewed and approved them. There was no separate strike schedule; strike replacements were listed on the schedules with regular employees. Schedule patterns were not changed during the strike. Preparing, approving, and posting of schedules were the same during the strike as prior to the strike. O'Day did not report for work during the strike. Randy Rose, the department head, and Ernie Mock, the produce head and O'Day's supervisor, advised Jiminez almost daily that they had not heard from O'Day. Sometime during the course of the week of August 19 he talked with Menacho and Soares of the Union, and Menacho asked Jiminez if anyone had walked through the picket line. Jiminez said no, that no pickets were present when the employees came to work that morning. Menacho said employees were obligated to come to work if they were scheduled and if no pickets were present. Menacho also said that a checker, Claire Barnum, told him she had come through the back door when no pickets were there, and that he told her she could come to work if there were no pickets at the back of the store. Jiminez' knowledge of picketing was based on personal observation, and reports of employees. Jiminez prepared O'Day's termination notice based on her written schedule, and talked with her on September 11. He told her she was terminated because she did not work as scheduled when there were no pickets. O'Day was scheduled to work on September 8 and 9, after the sanction was lifted, but she did not come to the store or call in. Employees could, and regularly did, call on the telephone to get their schedules. Jiminez said on cross-examination that he did not remember talking with O'Day about strike violence, or about anything else. He testified that he may have told O'Day that he really did not want to discharge her, but that he did not remember saying anything about a "technicality" concerning her discharge. He said he attended a board of adjustment meeting concerning O'Day's discharge, and there gave the reason for the discharge. Of the store's 47 employees, approximately 40 worked during the strike. Prior to O'Day's discharge, but after the strike sanction was lifted, District Manager Donald Vadnais had instructed Jiminez that anyone who failed to report as scheduled, when there were no pickets, should be discharged.

Rose testified, and generally corroborated Jiminez.

Menacho testified that he and Soares visited Respondent's store 509 in August 1978 and spoke with Jiminez, who asked Menacho if the Union was going to do anything about an employee named Claire (Barnum). Menacho replied:

> I said if somebody saw her cross a picket line, then it would be up to the individual to cite her to the executive board and then they would take whatever action they deemed as necessary. As far as I was concerned, I didn't see her cross the picket line, so there was nothing I could do to her.
> Q. Did you say anything further about her or her working at the store?
> A. Not that I recall.

He denied telling Jiminez that if no pickets were present employees were obligated to work, denied asking Jiminez if anyone had crossed the picket line, and denied asking Jiminez if there were any pickets at the back door. He does not know why the sanction was lifted, although part of the reason was that the employees had been out of work for a long time. He thought the striking Teamsters who were doing the picketing "did a fairly good job with the people they had." The lifting of the sanction had an adverse impact on the Teamsters strike, and was a politically charged, highly sensitive action. He told employees that if there were no pickets when they came to work, they could go to work and finish their shift, even if pickets appeared during the shift. Menacho said he knew some union members worked behind picket lines, and a "large number" of them, approximately 100, were fined by the Union for that reason. One of the reasons he visited stores was to ascertain if some union members were working behind picket lines; he checked approximately 20 Alpha Beta stores (all of them) during the sanction period.

Soares, who was secretary-treasurer of Local 428, testified that he was with Menacho when they talked with Jiminez, but that he does not remember the conversation, although Menacho did most of the talking, which was "noncontroversial."

O'Day's termination notice shows that she was discharged for "Discontinued reporting for work" on August 20 to 26, and August 27 to September, when no pickets were on duty.

Discussion

O'Day was terminated for failure to work as scheduled, when no pickets were present. Details of the discharge generally are not in dispute. The legal issue created by the facts is discussed below.

Soares' testimony adds little, if anything, to the testimony of Menacho. Jiminez testified that Menacho told him that if they were scheduled to work and no pickets were present, employees were obligated to come to work during the sanction. Menacho denied Jiminez' testimony on this point. As discussed above, Jiminez' testimony on this point is corroborated by other witnesses, and is credited.

The legal issue raised by the discharge is discussed below.

Linda Parrette: At times relevant herein Parrette, a member of Local 428, worked at Respondent's store 533 as a bookkeeper. She was on a regular schedule, 6 days each week, Monday through Saturday. Her starting times were 12 a.m. Monday, and 4 a.m. Tuesday through Saturday. The store manager was Harvard Holley, and the assistant store manager was Larry Moots.

Parrette testified that she learned informally of the sanction of the Teamsters strike by Local 428 during the evening of the sanction, and later was so advised by a union letter sent to her in the mail. She talked with Moots the following day:

> I told him that we had been notified that the strike had been sanctioned, and that we were told that when we finished our work shift, to leave and honor the pickets. And I told him that since I was going to be off the next day, the weekend and Monday, that I would call him Monday evening and check as to what the status was of the strike.

When she returned home Monday evening, she called the store and told someone, whom she does not remember, that she would not cross a picket line. Thereafter, she refused to cross the picket line until the sanction was lifted. She checked with the store by telephone to see if pickets were there each day or every other day during the sanction, and never was told that no pickets were present. On Friday, after the sanction was lifted the preceding day, she talked with Holley on the telephone and asked for her schedule, and Holley told her that she had been discharged "because I had not come to work during the strike." Holley said nothing about pickets not being present on days she was scheduled to work. No one in management or the Union ever told her she was obligated to check for pickets on scheduled workdays, or that she could be discharged for not working as scheduled when there were no pickets. No one from management called her during the sanction to tell her no pickets were present or to ask her to come to work. She informed the Union of her discharge, and attended a meeting approximately the end of September. Present were three discharged employees and union representatives. She never received a termination notice. She attended a second meeting concerning her discharge in October. Present were discharged employees, union representatives, a member of the FEC, and Holley. They discussed her discharge. A third meeting was held the end of October at the union hall, attended by discharged employees and union representatives. The employees were informed of Respondent's offer of reinstatement with benefits but without backpay, and there was much discussion of the offer, which had to be accepted unanimously, if at all. One employee discussed the possibility of going to the NLRB with the problem of the backpay.

Holley testified that pickets first appeared at the store at approximately noon on Thursday, August 10. Picketing that week was intermittent, the pickets arriving anytime between 8 a.m. and noon, or sometimes not at all. Picketing was less frequent and more sporadic the second and third weeks of the strike. He worked 10 to 14 hours each day. The last day Parrette worked was Thursday, August 10. She was scheduled to work Friday, August 11, but did not do so. She called in and asked about pickets, and he told her that pickets were there, that she was required to report to work as scheduled, and that her schedule would remain posted. Parrette had said she had no intention of working, and would see Holley "when the strike was over," which prompted Holley's remarks. Parrette did not report for work the weeks of August 19 and 26, or for a day she was scheduled during the week ending September 9. He prepared Parrette's termination notice, and when she called in on September 8 he advised her that she had been terminated because she failed to report to work as scheduled when there were no pickets. Another employee, Sue Trujillo, took over Parrette's duties during the strike. Based on his personal knowledge and reports of employees, Parrette did not call the store during the strike, except on two occasions to ask about pickets. Holley's knowledge of the presence of pickets was based on personal observation and reports of employees. All except three of the store's employees refused to cross picket lines. He attended one board of adjustment meeting in late September at which Parrette, union representatives, and a Food Employers Council representative were present. He explained at the meeting that Parrette was terminated because she did not work as scheduled when no pickets were present. Holley denied that he ever said to Parrette, or anyone else, that Parrette was discharged because she failed to work during the strike or refused to cross picket lines.

Discussion

There is little discrepancy between the testimony of Parrette and Holley, but to the extent there is any, Parrette is credited.

Holley's testimony concerning the absence of pickets until 8 o'clock or so in the morning and their sporadic picketing and occasional total absence is consistent with the nature of picketing at all stores involved in this controversy, was corroborated by Trujillo, and is credited. It is clear that Parrette could have reported for work on several occasions at her regular shift time in the absence of pickets. Holley's testimony that Parrette did not work on the days named in the termination notice, and that she could have reported on those days before pickets came on duty, is credited. However, that fact does not control the issue, as discussed below.

Regardless of whether or not Holley told Parrette she had to report to work each morning as scheduled, the fact remains that she did not report on days when no pickets were present at reporting time, and it is that fact which must be considered in settling the legal issue involved, rather than what Holley may have said Parrette must do.

Ralph Ramirez: At times relevant herein, Ramirez, a member of Local 428, was employed at Respondent's store 516, as a part-time courtesy clerk. The store manager was Christopher Parnello and the assistant manager was Gregg Powell. Ramirez received a letter from the Union informing him that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike.

Ramirez testified that on the first day he was scheduled to work after the strike was sanctioned he talked with Powell and told him he could not cross the picket line. Powell replied, "Fine, it was all right." Thereafter, he did not work during the strike, but checked the work schedule, as instructed by Powell. Approximately 3 or 3-1/2 weeks after the strike started, Ramirez talked with Parnello and asked for 2 days off to visit relatives, and Parnello said "that'd be all right, be fine." He either went to the store, or called on the telephone, every day he was scheduled to work. On three or four occasions when he went to the store he saw no pickets, but did not report for work because he was "honoring the strike." He talked with Powell 2 or 3 weeks after the strike began:

> He said that if I wanted to work, they could, you know, they could let me in through the back door or I could just walk into the front, that they wouldn't recognize me.
> I told him, well, I can't work because I'm honoring the picket line; and he goes, well, all right.

He was informed on a Saturday by letter from the Union that the sanction was lifted, and he reported for work the first day he was scheduled to work thereafter, on a Monday (September 11). Parnello told him he had been discharged for not reporting to work on the preceding Friday, and Parnello did not give him an opportunity to explain that he did not get the letter from the Union until Saturday. No one called from the store to tell him that the sanction had been lifted, or that he was scheduled to work. No one from the Union told him it was his obligation to check for pickets. No one from management or the Union told him he could be discharged for not working as scheduled when no pickets were present. No one from management called him during the strike to advise that no pickets were present, or to ask him to come to work. He informed the Union of his discharge and attended a meeting in October, also attended by another employee, and by Parnello, a lawyer from Respondent, and two union representatives, at which his discharge was discussed. He attended another meeting approximately 2 weeks later at the union hall. Also in attendance were other employees who had been discharged and two union representatives. Respondent's offer of reinstatement without backpay, provided acceptance was unanimous, was discussed. Also discussed was the possibility of seeking backpay through the NLRB.

On cross-examination, Ramirez testified that he left his house on Friday to visit relatives out of town, and prior to leaving, had not heard that the sanction was lifted. His schedule nearly always was posted on Saturday, and he does not remember whether or not he checked his work schedule for the week of September 3, or whether or not he was scheduled to work on Friday or Saturday, September 8 or 9.[34] In any event, he knows that he was scheduled to work on the Friday (September 1) before he was terminated.

Parnello testified that he usually prepared the store's work schedules, but if someone else prepared them, he always approved them. He posted the schedules himself every Friday. When he returned from vacation August 9 pickets were present at the store. They were there "constantly" for approximately 10 days and, thereafter, picketing was very sporadic. No pickets were present from Thursday afternoon, August 31, until Tuesday, September 5. Thereafter, picketing again was sporadic. Ramirez usually worked on Fridays and Saturdays, and two other days during the week. Another employee, named Greco, told Parnello that Ramirez had agreed to work part of her shift on Saturday, September 2, in addition to working his own shift. (Ramirez denied having made this arrangement.) Ramirez did not report for work on September 2, and no pickets were present on that day. Ramirez was scheduled to work Friday and Saturday, September 8 and 9, but did not report on either day. He called Ramirez on the telephone on Friday, but there was no answer. He called again on Saturday, and was told that Ramirez was out of town. He never talked with Ramirez about the latter taking time off, other than on one occasion prior to the strike. When Ramirez came to work on Monday, September 11, he was discharged for not coming to work on Friday and Saturday, September 8 and 9:

> I was waiting for Ralph at the time clock, because I didn't want him to punch in when he came to work, because I was going to terminate him. I had his termination all prepared. When he came in, I told him that he was terminated. I told him why. He challenged that. I explained to him. He, also, said that he hadn't heard about the sanction being lifted, because he was out of town. I asked him why he was out of town. He said, because I wanted to see my grandparents. And then he said—And then I said, why didn't you show up for work last Saturday? He said, well, I just didn't. He says, I was out of town, then, too. I explained to him that Kathy Greco had said that she was going to work for him and that he had said, okay, and asked him why he changed his mind.
> He said, because I decided to go out of town instead. And that was basically the extent of the conversation. I got him to sign the termination and that was it.

When he prepared Ramirez' termination notice, he relied on the work schedules, and he showed the notice to Ramirez, although he did not give him a copy since it was a document for management use. All of the store's regularly scheduled employees, other than Ramirez, returned to work on September 8 and 9. Approximately half of the employees honored the picket line during the strike. Parnello said he talked with Menacho about August 20:

> . . . I approached—Well, he was in the store. I approached him. I was working in the meat department that day. I approached him when I saw him in the store. I started talking to him as normal and I told him about the lousy picketing going on. And asked him about, what is a picket line and he explained to me that if they can't put up a decent picket line and they're not at the door when they first show up for work, then let your folks come to work.
> Q. Did he say anything else?
>
> . . . .
> THE WITNESS: He said that if there wasn't, what he considered a bonafide picket line, if there weren't pickets at every door, any door that was uncovered would be—For example, we didn't have any pickets at the back door, ever. He said, let your—come through the back door.

On cross-examination, Parnello testified that he discharged Ramirez for not working on September 8 and 9 and on the previous Saturday, September 2.

Menacho testified that he talked with Parnello during the strike, but only in "generalities." He denied telling Parnello that if the Teamsters could not put up decent picket lines, the employees could go to work through the back door.

Discussion

Neither Parnello nor Ramirez was a totally convincing witness, but between the two Parnello appeared more credible than Ramirez. To the extent that their testimony differs, Parnello is credited.

Menacho was not a convincing witness. To the extent that their testimony differs, Parnello is credited over Menacho. The Union's and Menacho's attitude toward the picketing is illustrated by the testimony of Pamela Scott, discussed elsewhere, and the testimony of Chris Anderson, who stated:

> Q. Did you receive any instructions or any information from someone at the union when you called that first time?
> A. They told me to call in or report to work to see if I was scheduled to work and that I was expected to work if there were no pickets.
> Q. Do you know who you spoke to?
> A. No, I don't.

Ramirez was discharged because he did not report for work for 2 days after the sanction was lifted, which would appear to place him in a category different from employees who were discharged because they did not work as scheduled during the sanction in the absence of pickets. However, Parnello testified that Ramirez also was discharged because he did not work as scheduled on September 2. That date was not included in the termination notice, but it is apparent from Parnello's testimony that the date was considered when the discharge was effected. Therefore, Ramirez' discharge must be considered in the same fashion as those employees who were discharged for not working during the sanction. The legal issue thus presented is discussed below. Ramirez' testimony that he would not work even in the absence of pickets, while the sanction was in effect, is credited.

[34] Ramirez later testified that he did remember checking the schedule, either on Friday or Saturday, September 1 or 2.

Terry Rendon: Rendon first started working for Respondent at store 511 in 1976, and during times relevant herein worked at store 549 as a journeyman clerk under Store Manager Vincent Spanno and Assistant Manager Michael Lamb.

Rendon testified that she learned by letter dated August 9, 1978, which she received from the Union, that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike. On August 10 she was informed by a fellow employee that pickets then were present at the store, and that same day she called Lamb and told him she was not coming to work that day because of the presence of pickets. Later the same day she and two fellow employees went to the store to get their paychecks, and talked briefly with Spanno, but did not go to work. Thereafter, Rendon did not work during the sanction of the strike by Local 428. She called the store each Friday to check the schedule, and spoke to "the person in charge." When she called approximately the third week of the strike, she spoke with Mike Alexander, the head clerk, who told her "that there was no schedules, that he only had schedules for the scabs." She checked for pickets when she was scheduled during the strike before her shift or shortly thereafter. She learned of the sanction being lifted on the day it was removed, and she received a letter from the Union advising her of that action. She reported for work the following day and asked Spanno for her schedule, and he said she had been terminated. No one from management or the Union ever told her that she was subject to discharge if she did not work when there were no pickets, and no one from management called her during the sanction and asked her to come to work. She received a notice of discharge. She advised the Union of her discharge, and attended a meeting concerning the discharge, the end of September. Other employees, union representatives, and representatives of Respondent were there. They talked about discharges of several employees, and about the reason for the discharges. She attended a second similar meeting a week or two later, at which those present argued among themselves concerning the presence or absence of pickets and related matters. She attended a third meeting relative to her discharge on October 25, at which only discharged employees and union representatives were present. McLoughlin stated that there was an offer from Respondent to reinstate the employees on their former schedules, with seniority, but with no backpay, but only if there was unanimous agreement among the employees to accept the offer. Rendon already had gone to the NLRB prior to the meeting, and a representative advised her to return to work without backpay if necessary, since she could "keep going on further" with her claim for backpay, through the NLRB. She then filed a charge with the NLRB. A fellow employee, Richard Hutson, was with her at the time. The employees talked and argued among themselves, and Rendon told them about her advice from the NLRB. She then called the NLRB to ask if other employees could follow the same course recommended to her, and the answer was yes. She so informed the other employees, whereupon all of them agreed to accept the offer.

On cross-examination, Rendon testified that she worked on August 9, and that pickets appeared at the store after she began working that day. Thereafter, she checked the store for pickets on each morning she was scheduled to work. She had been told by union representatives that the Union had no objection to her working if there were no pickets.

Spanno testified that pickets first appeared at the store on August 9, and picketing during the second and third week thereafter was very sporadic and inconsistent. The last time pickets were present was the day before Labor Day. He was present at the store 6 days each week during the strike, from 5 or 5:30 a.m. to 6 or 7 p.m. His observation of the irregular hours and days of picketing was confirmed to him by other employees. During the early part of the strike, employees asked about their obligation to work and he replied that, if pickets were not present, they should work their scheduled hours. During the second week of the strike he, Lamb, and Doug Michaelson talked at the store with Lou Menacho, a Local 428 business agent, and George Soares, a Local 428 representative. Lamb asked Menacho what a picket line was, and Menacho replied:

> His remark was that they had to have a picket at each door walking and if there wasn't any in the back door, the boys could come through the backdoor, if there wasn't any in the front they could come through the front. That was his definition.

Spanno asked Menacho about the employees' obligation to come to work, and Menacho replied that they were "responsible for coming to work scheduled shifts if there wasn't any pickets, that they had to go to work." On August 21 he talked with Rendon and another employee, in the office:

> . . . Terry Rendon was in the store with Hammond to pick up her check and I had the checks. I asked them why they hadn't been reporting to work and the remark from Terry Rendon was she wasn't going to cross a picket line. I informed them that at their scheduled times there were no pickets and that they had the responsibility to work those scheduled shifts.
> Q. Was there a response to that?
>
> A. Just yes. Terry said she wasn't working because there was a strike and that was it.
> Q. Did you say anything more?
> A. No, I did not.

On the dates shown on Rendon's discharge slip as work absences, no pickets were present at the scheduled starting times. Spanno attended the board of adjustment meeting during the first week of October, and explained that Rendon was discharged because she failed to report to work when there were no pickets. Rendon and other employees contended that pickets were present at their scheduled starting times. Nothing else was stated in defense of absence from work. In August 1978 the store had from 50 to 55 employees, 45 of which were members of Local 428. Approximately 80 percent of the employees came to work regularly during the strike. Schedules were made up each week on the assumption there was no strike, and if employees did not come to work as scheduled, replacements were called in and their names incorporated with the regular schedule. There was no separate schedule for strike replacements. Rendon never called the store to check for pickets.

Lamb testified that he was a member of Local 428 in August 1978. He prepared work schedules for the store, and Spanno approved them. During the first week of the strike pickets were at the store all the time, 24 hours each day. During the next 2 weeks picketing was sporadic and irregular. Pickets arrived at 8 or 8:30 a.m., well after he arrived, and became fewer in number. Lamb personally observed the hours and irregularity of picketing. Lamb corroborated Spanno's testimony relative to their conversation with Menacho. He never talked with Rendon during the strike, and denied Rendon's testimony that he did. He kept a close watch on the pickets, their absence or presence, and made notes of their activity as instructed by Spanno. The only four employees who did not work in the absence of pickets were Rendon, Mitchum, Hutson, and Hammond.

Menacho denied the statements attributed to him by Spanno and Lamb.

Discussion

Spanno and Lamb were impressive witnesses, and they are credited. It is found that Rendon did not work as scheduled, when pickets were present at the store, and that she was discharged for that reason. The legal issue relative to these facts is discussed below.

So far as the conversation with Menacho is concerned, Spanno and Lamb are credited.

Pamela Scott: Scott, a member of Local 428, worked at Respondent's store 519 during times relevant herein as a checker on an irregular schedule that changed each week. Her store manager was Mariano Capodiece and the assistant manager was George Chatfield.

Scott testified that she learned about the strike while on vacation in Los Angeles, and called Capodiece on the telephone. Capodiece said employees were coming to work through the back door when pickets were at the store. When she returned home she had received a letter advising her that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters strike. She went to the store as scheduled on August 16, but saw picketers and returned home without reporting to work. She did not work thereafter during the sanction. She learned, informally from news media and formally by letter from the Union, that the sanction was lifted. She immediately called Capodiece on the telephone, who said she had been terminated for not coming to work, and who also said no one had heard from her since the first day she called. She replied that she was under the impression it was a sanctioned strike and employees were not supposed to go to work. She received a letter from Richard Hinshaw, Respondent's director of labor relations, northern California division,[35] notifying her of her termination. No one from management or the Union told her that if she did not work as scheduled when there were no pickets she could be discharged. No one from management called her during the strike to advise her that no pickets were present or to ask her to come to work. She attended a board of adjustment meeting in early September, also attended by representatives of the Union and Respondent's management, at which her discharge and surrounding circumstances were discussed. She attended a second meeting of union representatives and employees who had been discharged by Respondent. Those present discussed Respondent's offer of reinstatement with no penalties and no backpay, but with seniority, provided the employees unanimously agreed to return to work. The employees were angry, but decided to accept the offer and pursue their backpay claims through the NLRB.

On cross-examination, Scott said she called the Union from Los Angeles when she heard about the strike, and someone, whom she could not identify, told her "if picketers are there, you are not supposed to report in. If there are no picketers there, you are supposed to report in." Shortly thereafter she called Capodiece, but did not ask about her schedule since she still was on vacation. She later called the Union again, and was told "it was a sanctioned strike." She never went to the store after the first occasion on August 16, but she called the store on one occasion only to see if she was scheduled to work the following day, and was advised that she was. She did not report for work that day as scheduled. She did not know that she was scheduled to work on August 17, 18, and 19.

Capodiece testified that Scott went on vacation in mid-July and was scheduled to work August 16, 17, 18, and 19, but she did not report for work on those days. During those 4 days pickets were present, but on a sporadic basis and not when Scott was scheduled to work. Scott was scheduled thereafter to work the weeks of August 26 and September 2. He prepared Scott's termination notice, and he personally knew no pickets were present on the days shown on the notice, when Scott was scheduled to work. When Scott called and talked with him, he told her she was scheduled to work at 4 p.m. August 16, and that she was supposed to report for work then, if no pickets were present. She did not report as scheduled, or call in. Other employees who were union members reported to work on the same shift Scott was scheduled for, and those employees told Capodiece that no pickets then were present.

Capodiece's testimony relative to the sporadic nature of the picketing, and related matters, credibly was corroborated by Chris Anderson, the store's bookkeepker at the time.

Discussion

Scott and Capodiece agree that Scott did not come to work or report for work on days she was scheduled to work. Capodiece's testimony that no pickets were present on those days and that other employees who were union members did report to work on those days is credited.

[35] G.C. Exh. 12.

The legal issues involved in Scott's termination are discussed below.

Craig Wroblewski: Wroblewski, a member of Local 428, worked at Respondent's store 517 at times relevant herein on an irregular schedule under Store Manager Martin Falkowski and Assistant Store Manager Frank Perry. Wroblewski testified that he learned that Local 428 had sanctioned the Teamsters' strike by calling the Union the day of the sanction, and by letter received from the Union a couple of days later. He first observed pickets at the store on August 14. He went to the store that day, but did not report for work. Thereafter, he did not work during the sanction. On August 18 he and other employees asked Falkowski why two schedules were posted, and Falkowski replied that one was a strike schedule and one was a nonstrike schedule. The employees asked if they must check their schedules every week, and Falkowski replied that they did not have to come to the store, since the schedules would be the same each week. Wroblewski's schedule was somewhat different on the two posted schedules. He went to the store "most every day," at approximately 7 or 8 a.m. and talked with the picketers from 10 minutes to an hour. Pickets were present each time he checked. The day the sanction was lifted, Falkowski called him on the telephone:

> Well Martin—he said "This is Martin from Alpha Beta." And he asked me if I knew that the sanction had been lifted at four forty-two or something like that today. And I said no, that I didn't.
> And he said "Well it doesn't matter anyway because I've terminated you for not showing up for work during the strike." And he said if you have any further questions call Local 428.
> Q. Was anything else said?
>
> A. I don't remember.
> Q. Did he make any reference to specific days?
> A. Oh, yes. He said something like on August 11th and on September 7th or something—I don't remember what days. He gave like three different days that he said I didn't show up for work. And that there were no pickets there.

No one in management or the Union told him that he should check his work schedule during the strike, that he should check for pickets on days he was scheduled to work, or that he could be discharged if he did not work as scheduled if no pickets were present. No one from management called him during the strike to advise that no pickets were present, or to ask him to come to work. He informed the Union of his discharge and a week or two thereafter attended a meeting at which terminated employees, union representatives, and representatives from the Food Employers Council were present. The discharges and attendant circumstances were discussed. Approximately 2 weeks later he attended a second meeting with the same people, plus managers of stores from which employees had been discharged. The same matters were discussed. A week or two thereafter, discharged employees met with union representatives at the union hall. They discussed Respondent's offer of reinstatement without backpay, provided the agreement to return was unanimous. The employees agreed to the offer, and decided to pursue their claim for backpay through the NLRB. Wroblewski already had talked with NLRB representatives on the telephone about the problem. On cross-examination, Wroblewski testified that even though he checked for pickets almost every day he would not have worked during the sanction, even had no pickets been present. He did not check for pickets on September 3. He did not come to the store or call on Friday, September 1. He was told by union representatives that he could work if no pickets were present, if he wanted to.

On redirect examination, Wroblewski testified that he would not have worked even in the absence of pickets, because it was a sanctioned strike. He believed he was "protected" if he did not work in the absence of pickets, because the strike was sanctioned by Local 428. Someone from the Union, whom he cannot identify, told him he would not be fired if he did not check for pickets. He denied receiving any correspondence from Respondent during the strike.

Falkowski testified that he was a store manager during the 1973 meatcutters strike, and the managers were told by Respondent's labor relations representatives prior to the strike that retail clerks were obligated to work in the absence of pickets; if pickets appeared while employees were on their shift, they had the option of finishing the shift, or leaving. Managers were advised in 1978 that the policy of 1973 still was in effect. The first picket in 1978 appeared on August 10, and picketed singly. Organized picketing commenced August 14 at 11 a.m. Thereafter, picketing was around the clock, except for a few days. Wroblewski was scheduled to work Friday, August 11, from 1 to 10 p.m. He punched in at 1 a.m., punched out for lunch at 5 p.m., and never returned to work. Falkwoski worked the entire day, and went home at 6 p.m., as always. No pickets were present during the entire day of August 11. Falkowski testified:

> . . . I called him the following day when I became aware of the fact he didn't return to work. I asked him why he didn't return to work. He said, well, there's a strike. And I informed him that if there are no pickets then he is obligated to work his scheduled shift, and informed him that if pickets showed up while he was working, then yes, he could go home if he felt so inclined. But there were no pickets that day.

Wroblewski was scheduled to work at 10 a.m. on August 14, but did not report for work. Pickets appeared at 11 a.m. Falkowski came to work at 7 a.m. and personally checked for pickets. On August 21 Wroblewski was scheduled for work at 9 a.m. Pickets did not arrive until 10:10 a.m., based on Falkowski's personal observation. Wroblewski arrived at 10:30 a.m. and talked with the picketers. Falkowski asked why he did not report for work, and Wroblewski replied that he was there in the morning and pickets were present. Falkowski said he had been there since 7 a.m. and there were no pickets. Falkowski then said Wroblewski was subject to discharge if he did not report for work as scheduled if no pickets were present. On September 3 Wroblewski was scheduled for 8 a.m., but did not report to work. Pickets appeared at 8:20 a.m. Falkowski attempted, without success, to reach Wroblewski by telephone on September 5. He finally reached Wroblewski on September 6 and told him he was terminated as a voluntary quit because he failed to report to work for 3 days.

On cross-examination, Falkowski testified that his knowledge of the presence of pickets was based on personal observation and verification of employees' reports.[36] Falkowski prepared all regular schedules, and the department head prepared all schedules for replacements during the strike; separate schedules were maintained. The store had approximately 55 employees, of which approximately 25 to 30 continued to report for work even though pickets were present. Three employees other than Wroblewski were discharged for not working as scheduled when no pickets were present. Employees were to be discharged when they failed to report for work on three occasions; store managers were so advised by the district managers. Falkowski prepared Wroblewski's discharge, based on his own notes and work schedules.

Discussion

Falkowski was a firm, straightforward, and convincing witness. Wroblewski was not. To the extent that their testimony differs, Falkowski is credited. It is found that Wroblewski did not report for work as scheduled at times when pickets were not present, and that he was discharged for that reason. The legal issue is discussed below.

So far as past practice of Respondent is concerned (meatcutters strike of 1973), the issue involved is discussed below.

Issues and Discussion

A. Possible Deferral to Arbitration

Respondent argues that "Deferral to arbitration of the underlying contractual issues is appropriate."

It is first noted that the NLRB, in the exercise of its jurisdiction to hear and decide unfair labor practice cases, has jurisdiction to resolve questions of contract interpretation, regardless of the fact that some other forum, or an arbitrator, also could hear and decide the same contract issue.[37] The fact that contract interpretation is involved, does not, per se, oust the NLRB from the controversy. Respondent refers to the 8(a)(3) charges as possibly "bogus," but it is clear, as discussed herein, that those charges are not "bogus."

Respondent further argues that deferral of some issues would result in "an unwarranted bifurcation so as to cloud rather than illuminate those issues," and states that the issues easily could be framed for an arbitrator, resulting in an early decision. However, that argument is based on a self-serving conclusion not warranted by the record. First, Respondent apparently concedes that the issues are not limited to contract interpretation; several other matters are presented, including consideration of statutory principles. Second, this case does not involve an arbitrator's award—Respondent asks that the issues first be presented to an arbitrator, rather than to the NLRB. Thus, Servair[38] cited by Respondent is not controlling. There, the issue involved an arbitrator's award.

Under such circumstances, the question of deferral to future arbitration must be answered in accordance with principles adhered to by the NLRB. Under the Collyer[39] doctrine, as modified by General American Transportation Corp.,[40] the Board possibly may defer to contractual arbitration in cases involving alleged violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, but not of Section 8(a)(3), which is involved herein. Further, as in Amcar,[41] the charges herein were filed by individual employees, and as in Amcar, a question is presented as to whether the position of Locals 428 and 1179 is aligned with that of the charging individuals. That question, involving possible waiver of a statutory right, has been discussed at trial, in briefs of counsel, and in this decision. Finally, as in Amcar, a question of statutory interpretation, as well as of contractual interpretation, here is involved.

In view of the foregoing, it is found that this controversy is one which properly should be decided by the NLRB, rather than being deferred for arbitration under the contract between the Union and Respondent.[42]

B. Discharge of Employees Who Did Not Report for Work as Scheduled During Strike Sanction When Picketers WERE NOT Present

This group of employees differs from the group of employees who did not report for work after the sanction was lifted. The latter group is discussed below.

Some essential facts are not in dispute, or are clear from the record. First, the Teamsters strike, at times relevant to this discussion, was a lawful, primary strike.[43] Second, picketing by the Teamsters was sporadic and inconsistent; there were times and days when no pickets were present at some stores. Third, Respondent and all of its employees were fully aware of the primary strike, its duration, its sanction by the Union, and Respondent's [36] Falkowski's testimony was supported by his notes, made contemporaneously with events to which he testified.

[41] ACF Industries, 247 NLRB 1056 (1980). The deferral portion of the administrative law judge's decision was not disturbed by the Board, although other portions were modified.

[42] As argued by the General Counsel in her posttrial brief, deferral would be improper under Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963), to an arbitrator pursuant to agreement of some of the union locals affected by this controversy, but not including Locals 428 and 1179, which said agreement was effected during a recess in these proceedings. Such a deferral would be untimely and, for the reasons discussed above, contrary to Board principles.

[43] Respondent's argument that the strike sanction was converted to a primary strike because some employees involved herein accepted strike benefits is found to be without merit.

contention that employees were expected to work when no pickets were present.

1. Right of employees to engage in sympathy strikes

The NLRB and the courts consistently have held that "[t]he right to strike, including the right to engage in sympathy strikes or refusals to cross other unions' picket lines, is a right guaranteed by the Act."[44] In a case frequently cited for the proposition that sympathy strikers are making common cause with those involved in a primary dispute, Judge Learned Hand listed sympathetic striking as concerted activity constituting mutual aid or protection, and thus falling within the protection of the Act.[45]

The statutory right to honor picket lines and engage in sympathy strikes may be waived,[46] but such waivers will be found only under stringent conditions.[47] Further, collective-bargaining agreements may provide that union members are not required to cross picket lines.[48]

The NLRB repeatedly has held that, since those who honor picket lines are making common cause with primary strikers, sympathy strikers of the same employer have the same status as the primary strikers.[49]

The NLRB and court cases do not draw a clear distinction between refusals to work and refusal to cross picket lines when considering the nature of protected sympathetic activity. For example, in Lexington Shipbuilding Co.,[50] the Board affirmed an administrative law judge's decision wherein he discussed staying away from work as a sign of sympathy for the strike, and refusing to cross a picket line, as though the two types of actions were synonomous.[51] In Texas Foundries,[52] the Board stated, id. at 1681, inter alia:

> . . . the work of these employees ceased as a consequence of and in connection with the then current labor dispute between the Union and the Respondent. It is further found that these employees, by identifying themselves with the Union and by ceasing to work during the strike, gave aid, support, and assistance to the Union and joined and made common cause with the strike and concerted activities of their fellow union members who were within the bargaining unit.

In finding a violation of, inter alia, Section 8(a)(1) of the Act for discharges of sympathetic nonunit strikers, the Board concluded (101 NLRB at 1683):

> It is no defense to the Respondent that the nonunit employees were not primarily and directly involved in the controversy that gave rise to the strike. Their refusal to come to work while the strike was in progress constituted an act of assistance to the labor organization conducting the strike, within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act.[53]

The basic law on this issue thus is clear. Whether the issue is framed in terms of a statutory right to honor picket lines, or in terms of a broad statutory right sympathetically to refrain from working during a strike whether or not pickets are present, the result is the same. The Board's repeated use of language to the effect that sympathy strikers may refrain from working, and may make common cause with the primary strikers "during the course of a strike" establishes that sympathetic strikers may refuse to work even though pickets actually are not present. The analytical key is the concept that sympathizers are making common cause with primary strikers; that cause would be defeated if the sympathizers were half-hearted, and struck only in the presence of the picket line.

Much trial time was devoted to testimony concerning the motives of employees. The General Counsel introduced testimony to establish that employees regularly checked their schedules and checked for the presence or absence of picketers. Employees and union representatives took the position, at adjustment board hearings and at trial, that picketers always were present, and that employees were fired because they refused to cross picket lines. That testimony was not material or relevant, if the General Counsel's view of the law of the case is correct, since under that view employees would not be concerned with whether pickets were present at the stores. In any event, as found above, it is clear that employees were fired because they did not report for work as scheduled when, as a factual matter, pickets were not present. On the other hand, Respondent introduced testimony to show that some employees failed or refused to work during the strike when pickets were not present for purely personal reasons, unrelated to the strike. The question thus is presented as to whether or not motive is relevant to this issue.

The Board long has held that motive for one's refusal to cross a picket line is not relevant to a determination of whether such refusal is protected activity under the Act. A leading case regarding this issue is Montag Bros., Inc.,[54] wherein the Board found that the motives of two nonunit women who refused to cross an unauthorized picket line and return to work were irrelevant (one had expressed fears of reprisal; the other had indicated her support for her husband, a union adherent). Foundries,[55] the Board again rejected the employer's defense to an illegal discharge complaint that the dischargees were not truly sympathetic, but feared for their personal safety should they cross the picket line. "Whether employees engage in concerted or strike activities must be judged by the character of their activity," the Board held.[56]

The case cited most frequently in sympathy striker motive cases is Cooper Thermometer Co.,[57] The Board stated in that decision:

> . . . the focal point of inquiry in determining whether Kraucalis' refusal to cross the picket line to perform production work was a protected activity must of course be the nature of the activity itself rather than the employee's motives for engaging in activity.[58]

The Cooper Thermometer case was cited and supported by the trial examiner (and sustained by the Board) in Tenneco Chemicals,[59] wherein the trial examiner stated "Easton's motives in honoring the picket line are not a legitimate subject matter for inquiry."

While the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has held that an employee's refusal to cross a picket line because of fear of physical harm was not protected activity (the court reasoned that such fear was not "common cause" with the primary strikers),[60] the Board specifically has disavowed the Fourth Circuit's view, and continues to find that motive for refusing to cross picket lines is irrelevant.

Based on the foregoing, it is clear that the legality or illegality of discharge of employees who were discharged because they did not work as scheduled in the absence of pickets cannot be decided on the basis of motives of those employees in failing or refusing to work. Unless the right to refuse to work was waived, in one form or another, employees were entitled not to work during the Teamsters strike, regardless of their reason for staying off the job.[61]

2. Possible waive of the right of employees to withhold their services during a sanctioned strike

a. Contractual provisions

Basic law on contractual waiver is not in dispute and is of longstanding duration; if such waiver exists, it must be clear and unambiguous; if it exists, sympathy strikers are not protected by the Act and are subject to discipline or discharge.

The contractual provisions here involved, quoted above, are not clear and unambiguous. The phrase principally relied on by Respondent to show unambiguity, i.e., "to pass through any picket line," in fact is not exactly descriptive. Respondent argues that inclusion in the contract of section 17.3 "warrants, if not compels, the conclusion that the parties understood that the broadly based no-strike clause prohibited sympathy strike activity with the exception of those situations specified in Section 17.3." However, that argument avoids the issue. The General Counsel does not contend that section 17.3 does not authorize sympathy strikes. Rather, it is argued that the section does not preclude refusals to work during a sanctioned strike, even though pickets are not present. It is quite clear from the record that even though picketing was sporadic at most stores, that inconsistency was not uniform. Absence of pickets occurred at different times, and on different dates, at various locations; but at some store locations picketing was uniform and consistent. The parties and all employees throughout the store system were fully aware of the Teamsters strike and its sanction by the Retail Clerks. The strike and sanction were given broad coverage in the media, by mail posted by the Union and by Respondent, by personal conversations, and by a union "hot-line." There is no doubt about the awareness of all persons involved, concerning the fact that the strike was in progress, and that the strike was being honored by some Retail Clerks, whether or not every door of every store was being picketed. It may well be that most employees worked at those times, and on those dates, when pickets happened not to appear, but that fact does not alter the continuing nature of the strike and its sanction, nor does it dilute the right of some employees to exercise their statutory right to engage in a sympathy strike. At first blush, it appears possible that Respondent jumped at the opportunity to discharge employees the minute they failed to report to work, and supported their actions on the basis of a technicality, but the record does not support that conclusion. Only a handful of the total employee complement was discharged; there is no evidence that Respondent wanted to rid itself of the employees who were discharged; and it is clear that Respondent took its position as a matter of principle, rather than because of union or employee animus. In any event, this issue did not arise because of a disagreement concerning the basic right of employees to engage in sympathetic action. Rather, it arose because of the mechanics of that action, and the limited nature of the language of section 17.3 of the contract.

The trial examiner stated the law on this issue, as follows, in Newspaper & Mail Deliverers (Interborough News),[62] and that language was affirmed by the Board:

> The significance of a picket line lies in the fact that it serves as notice of a dispute at the place being picketed. But it is not necessary that each and every entrance to struck premises be picketed in order to convey notice that the premises as a whole are strike-bound. In this case the employees delivering newspapers were actually on notice through other means that the Respondent had resolved to picket Interborough's entire Independent Subway System operations, and, though pickets were actually posted at only certain subway entrances, the employees could properly view the remainder of the entrances as likewise out of bounds in the eyes of the striking union.

The same principle underlies the decision in W-I Canteen Service.[63]

Respondent diligently has sought, and continues to seek, arbitration of the dispute concerning the meaning of section 17.3 of the contract. Some of the discharged employees have contended continuously since they refused to work that they did not want to work even in the absence of picketers because they felt they had the right to withhold their services. Respondent has taken every opportunity, even in the absence of retort by the Union, to advance its interpretation of the contract. Respondent introduced at trial extrinsic evidence to support its interpretation of the contract. Under such circumstances, it cannot reasonably be concluded that the contract is clear and unambiguous. If a waiver is to be established, it must be through some medium other than the contract of the parties.[64]

b. Collective-bargaining history

Not only does the contract of the parties fail to establish the waiver alleged by Respondent, there is no evidence that the bargaining history shows an intent, or attempt, to effect such a waiver.

Section 17.3 of the contract has been in agreements between the Union and food industry employers since the 1940s, but the evidence at trial was limited to post-1970, when those employers first were represented by the Food Employers Council. Respondent introduced no evidence to establish discussion of, or agreement to, the waiver by the Union or employees of their right to refuse to work as scheduled during a sanctioned strike when no pickets are present. Further, no employee was shown to have been discharged or disciplined in the past for refusing to work in such a situation.[65]

c. Past practice and work policies

Respondent contends, and the record shows, that the policy of Respondent Alpha Beta and Respondent Ralph's provides that employees may, at the option of the two Respondents, be disciplined in the event of unauthorized or unexcused absences. The two Locals, 428 and 1179, acknowledge that policy, and do not challenge it. The policy has the support of common management sense, as discussed above, in view of the large sales volume and busy nature of the grocery stores involved. However, that policy and its enforcement do not resolve any issue herein.

Respondents notified all employees, both by mail and by formal notices posted in stores at prominent places, that employees were obligated to work as scheduled in the physical absence of pickets.[66] So far as the record shows, no employee challenged that position or complained to the Union about it. Menacho made such a statement to employees, and acknowledged his agreement with the position to store managers. However, neither of those circumstances constituted a waiver of the kind urged by Respondent. Respondent's August 14 letter and the notices posted in stores by Respondent were unilateral statements which, so far as the record shows, never were communicated to the Union, or acquiesced in by the Union. No link was shown by Respondent between the statements contained in that letter, and the contract of the parties, or its bargaining history. There is no basis on which to conclude that Respondent's letter, or any statements made therein, became part of the contract between the parties, or constituted a separate agreement or waiver of employee rights. In view of such facts, the letter not only does not support Respondent's contentions relative to a waiver but constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged by the General Counsel.[67] Menacho's statements to employees and store managers, discussed above, appear to show his agreement with Respondent's position. However, those statements must be assessed in context. Menacho was a lower-echelon representative of the Union, and there is no evidence that he was authorized or directed to make such statements. Menacho was not a contract negotiator of the Union, and there is no evidence that his statements were anything more than his personal opinion. He made the statements only to a few of the thousands of Respondent's employees, and he made them in the stores, in the presence of store managers, and in the heat of battle. Such conditions give little opportunity for reflection, argument, or confirmation with union officials. Under such circumstances, Menacho's statements did not constitute a waiver of employee rights as alleged by Respondent.[68] It is further found that failure of the Union to protest or challenge Respondent's position of waiver during board of adjustment grievance meetings did not constitute agreement with Respondent's position.[69] The Union was not required then to agree or disagree with Respondent. As pointed out above, the Union, at that time, was preoccupied with but one matter—the jobs of the employees, some of whom had worked for Respondent several years. McLoughlin was quite concerned about those [63] 238 NLRB 609 (1978). As pointed out in the General Counsel's brief, the fact that sympathy strikes are authorized by the contract does not compel the conclusion that employees have waived all their rights inherent in the right to engage in such strikes. Here, the issue involves the method in which employees showed their sympathy, as much as it involves the right under which they proceeded. Keller-Crescent Co., supra.

[64] Whether or not the Union contended prior to trial herein that the employees had a right not to work as scheduled when no pickets were present is irrelevant.

[65] Hinshaw testified that there have been such discharges in the past, but that testimony appeared self-serving and unconvincing, was not supported by any documentation or recitation of facts, and is not credited.

[66] The Union also sent letters to the employees, telling them they were authorized to work if requested to do so in the absence of pickets. Many employees took advantage of that offer, since it relieved them of any worry about possibly being fined for working. However, those letters neither suggested nor stated that employees must work in the absence of pickets, nor did they state, expressly or implicitly, that the Union had waived or would waive the right of employees to refuse such work if they so desired.

jobs, and was doing all he could to get the employees back to work as soon as possible. The principal topics of discussion were the facts of discharge and the status of picketing.

Respondent introduced testimony and evidence concerning an agreement reached by the Retail Clerks and FEC during a butchers' strike in 1973, alleging that the agreement showed past practice of the parties herein to waive the right of employees not to work during a sanctioned strike when no pickets are present. In that instance, it was agreed that the stores, which sold both meat and merchandise, would cease selling meat products, and that union members who had been honoring the strike would return to work. However, that agreement does not stand for the proposition urged by Respondent. The agreement did not require that employees must work in the absence of pickets; it merely removed from employees the burden of possible union reprisal in the event they worked when no pickets were present. No waiver of employee statutory rights was involved.[70]

Finally, Respondents contend that a waiver of employee rights is shown by the conversation between Mahon and Chuck Mattson, a union business representative, discussed above in "Findings of Fact." Mattson did not testify, and Mahon's testimony is not credited in its entirety. It is not clear from Mahon's ambiguous statements that Mattson did, as contended by Respondent, agree with Respondent's position relative to a waiver when he talked with Mahon. However, assuming arguendo that he did, such a private statement was an expression of opinion and did not, standing alone, establish that a waiver existed. The statement was not tied in any manner to the Union, or to the contract between the parties. The statement is much the same as those of Menacho, discussed above, and does not establish a waiver for the same reasons Menacho's statement did not.[71]

3. The settlement issue

It is found, above, that neither the Union nor its members ever waived, contractually or otherwise, the statutory right of Respondent's employees to engage in protected sympathetic activity, and that Respondent illegally discharged 15 of their employees (named below) in violation of that right. Those 15 employees were discharged because they failed to report for work during the sanctioned period of the strike. Employees discharged for failure to report after the sanction was withdrawn are considered separately below.

Respondent contends that the settlement agreement of October 25, discussed above in the "Background Summary," was a "final and binding" resolution of all 21 discharges contested herein, and that the settlement agreement should be deferred to.

So far as the group of 15 is concerned, deferral is not warranted because it is clear that the agreement results in deprivation of employees' statutory rights without the consent of the employees or their union. Deferral under Spielberg[72] would be improper, since the discharges were not pursued to an impartial tribunal, i.e., to an arbitrator pursuant to provisions of the contract of the parties.[73] The agreement of the parties was a private one, following pre-arbitration board of adjustment meetings.

Deferral to the settlement agreement would be repugnant to the Act, since, as shown above, the 15 discharges were unlawful. Existence of a settlement agreement which perpetuates those unlawful discharges does not preclude Board action to rectify the wrong.[74] The issues discussed herein were not discussed or resolved at the board of adjustment hearings, or otherwise, prior to trial. Further, the employees who were discharged never agreed to accept the offer of Respondent to return to work without backpay, as an abandonment of all their rights under the Act. They immediately talked with the NLRB, and commenced pursuit of backpay under the Act.[75] Local 428's agreement with Respondent may have been "final and binding" so far as those parties were concerned, but their agreement did not preclude the individuals from acting on their own, relative to backpay.

C. Discharge of Employees Who Did Not Report for Work as Scheduled After the Strike Sanction Was Withdrawn

The factual situation relative to all 21 employees is discussed in detail, above. So far as Kimber, Alarcon, Alvarado, Lopez, and Herrera are concerned, the record is clear that they were discharged for cause. The importance of dependable work attendance in Respondent's stores is discussed above. Whether or not this group of employees was discharged within a time that the General Counsel may consider "reasonable" after the sanction was withdrawn is irrelevant. The employees were fully aware of the strike and the sanction, and it was incumbent upon them to report for work as scheduled after the sanction no longer protected them in their absences. The General Counsel implies that it was incumbent upon Respondent to get in touch with employees and ask them to return to work, but that was not Respondent's responsibility. Further, it is noted that nearly all employees did report for work on their first shifts after the sanction was lifted.

As previously discussed, the record does not show a personal or union animus on the part of Respondent, nor does it show that Respondent discharged the five employees in retaliation for their actions, or for any reason other than the necessity of having full employee complements on hand for business. Only a few of Respondent's many employees are involved in these proceedings, and at no place in the record is there an indication of pattern reprisal or design. These five employees chose not to comply with normal and reasonable rules relative to work attendance, and they were discharged for that reason. At the time of discharge, those employees were not under the umbrella of protection afforded the other 15 employees, by the law relative to sympathetic strikers.

[70] Cf. Amcar, supra.

[75] Respondent argues that not all of the 15 discharged employees pursued their cases with the NLRB. That fact is irrelevant, since statutory rights, rather than contractual rights, control the issues.

The settlement agreement covered these five employees as well as the other 15. There is no basis on which to go behind that agreement, since a violation of the Act is not involved. The agreement was worked out between Respondent and the Union, and covered reinstatement of the five without backpay. If the five employees accepted that agreement and returned to work, that was their choice, and there is no basis on which to hold that the agreement is repugnant to the Act. Section 17.1 of the bargaining agreement is a proscription of strikes or work stoppages, the only exception being provided by section 17.3 relating to sympathy strikes. Section 17.3 is limited to sanctioned sympathy strikes. Once the sanction was withdrawn, the protection of section 17.3 also was withdrawn, and section 17.1 was effective. Under principles normally applied in alleged 8(a)(3) violations, the five were discharged for cause unrelated to the Act.

Kathy Holland: As discussed above, Holland was not discharged. She simply quit working on August 12, and her quit was recorded by Respondent as "Discontinued reporting for work." That quit was not challenged by any union official during trial or otherwise. Holland did not testify, and no credibility resolution relative to her case is necessary. Holland did not attend any board of adjustment hearing, or otherwise indicate any interest in this controversy. She did not call or visit the store after August 12. Until August 12, Holland crossed the picket line to work. The Union dismissed Holland's claim at the first board of adjustment meeting.

Under such circumstances, there is no legal issue upon which to base a recommendation that Holland be reinstated by Respondent. She was not discharged because she did not report for work as scheduled in the absence of pickets. She terminated her own employment soon after picketing commenced, and never thereafter asserted, through herself or the Union, a right to be permitted to return to work.

B. Validity of the Sanction

Respondents argue that because the membership of Local 428 did not vote on the issue of whether to sanction the Teamsters strike, the sanction was invalid, and any sympathy strike action taken by alleged discriminatees was unprotected.[76]

The bargaining contract provides that employees may refuse to work while honoring a strike sanctioned by the Retail Clerks Bay Area Council. The Council sanctioned the strike, and whether the Council had authority to impose a sanction under Local 428's constitution and bylaws is irrelevant to the issue of whether the Teamsters strike had been properly sanctioned under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement. Respondents argue that because Local 428's bylaws require that executive board decisions must be approved by the membership, a failure to submit the board's decision to sanction the Teamsters strike to the membership makes such decision improper. However, the record shows that the membership of Local 428 approved the executive board's action at their regularly scheduled meeting in September 1978. Even had the membership not approved the board's action, McLoughlin credibly testified that authority to sanction another union's strike is vested in the Council rather than in local unions, and that there is no provision in the contract or bylaws requiring the membership to vote on the Council's action. Local 428's bylaws provide that employees can be fined for crossing or working behind a sanctioned picket line established by a union other than the Retail Clerks, if the sanction also is approved by the local's executive board and the local has given notice to the membership affected by the picket line. Such approval and notice were given here. This argument by Respondent is found to be without merit.

[76] There is no contention that the sanction of Local 1179 was invalid.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondents set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with their operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It has been found that Respondents unlawfully discharged the following employees:

Terry Rendon	Craig Wroblewski
Richard Hutson	Ralph Ramirez
Robert Hammond	Alex Avlakeotes
Carol Mitchum	Norma Myers
Linda Parrette	Florence O'Day
Jackie Niswonger	Daniel Gonzalez
Pamela Scott	Josie Melendez
Elizabeth Mahon

All employees except Mahon were reinstated by Respondents, with seniority and benefits, but without backpay. I will, therefore, recommend that Respondent Alpha Beta offer Mahon her former job or, if that job no longer exists, a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to her seniority and other rights and privileges. I will recommend that Respondents make whole all the above-named employees for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, by payment to them of sums of money equal to that which they normally would have earned, absent the discrimination, less net earnings during such period, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida

Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). It will be further recommended that Respondent preserve and make available to the Board, on request, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary and useful to determine the amounts of backpay due and the rights of reinstatement under the terms of these recommendations.

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Alpha Beta Company and Ralph's Grocery Company are, and at all times material herein have been, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Retail Clerks Union, Local 1179 and Local 428, AFL–CIO are, and each of them is, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling their employees in letters that the employees were to report for work as scheduled in the absence of pickets during a sanctioned strike, or risk disciplinary action.

4. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees because of their protected activity.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Kohler Company and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, Local Union 833. Cases 30–CA–7372 and 30–CA–7644

23 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 16 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge Walter J. Alprin issued the attached decision. The Union filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief, cross-exceptions, and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Kohler Company, Kohler, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] In the absence of exceptions we adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating employees regarding their support for the bargaining positions taken by the Union.

We adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by unilaterally removing the stock clerk position from the bargaining unit. In so doing, we particularly rely on the Respondent's admission that it redefined the stock clerk job description for the purpose of removing that position from the bargaining unit, and we note that such action is not a right granted the Respondent by the contractual management-rights clause.

While we adopt the judge's finding that the Union waived its right to bargain over the Respondent's decision to subcontract certain janitorial work which the unit employees previously had performed, we disavow the judge's discussion based principally on Westinghouse Electric Corp., 150 NLRB 1574 (1965), of the criteria for determining whether unilateral subcontracting violates the Act. See Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984) (opinion by Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter and concurring opinion by Member Dennis).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER J. ALPRIN, Administrative Law Judge. Charges in these cases were filed on October 1, 1982, April 1 and 11, 1983, and May 5, 1983, and complaints issued on December 8, 1982, and May 12, 1983. The cases were consolidated and heard before me at Sheboygan, Wisconsin, on 5 days between September 12 and December 8, 1983. Briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent on January 17, 1984. The cases involve allegations of threats to remove bargaining unit work from the plant, of threats to refuse to process grievances, of issuing discriminatory oral and written work warnings, of subcontracting unit work, and of removing an employee from the bargaining unit, all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND BACKGROUND

Kohler Company (Respondent), with principal business facilities at Kohler, Wisconsin, and other facilities elsewhere, including South Carolina and Texas, manufactures and wholesales plumbing products, engines, and generators. It admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Local Union No. 833, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, representing the following unit of Respondent's employees at Kohler, Wisconsin:

> All production and maintenance employees, including all planning and general clerical employees, all production inspection employees, all maintenance employees, all utilities engineering employees (all operations at power house and gas utilities), all iron foundry employees, all casting finishing employees, all mill room employees, all enamel shop employees, all warehouse employees, all brass employees, all pottery employees, all engine employees and all generator employees; but excluding all supervisory and administrative employees, all general office and clerical employees, all draftsmen and engineers, all employees in industrial engineering, all technicians (engine development, generator development, quality assurance and inspection, pottery, iron foundry lab, mill room and gas service), all doctors, nurses, and clerical employees in Medical, all employees in personnel, training, safety and recreation departments, all employees in chemical and physical laboratories, research and development departments, all production planners and schedulers, material control clerks and timekeepers, all employees in real estate division and landscape, all confidential employees, watchmen, gatemen, courtesy vehicle driver, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union and Respondent have entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements over the years, the pertinent agreement running from December 23, 1980, through October 1, 1983.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Threats to Remove Bargaining Unit Work

1. Facts

In December 1981, Respondent added to its Wisconsin plant the new process of injection molding, on which wage scales were not in effect. In January/February 1982,[1] Respondent sent the Union a wage proposal for those positions of $4.50 per hour. This and other proposals were addressed at a grievance meeting on April 7. Respondent's notes of that meeting state that Kenneth Conger, Respondent's vice president for administration, began the meeting with a statement, inter alia, that:

> Business conditions are very bad . . .
> Kohler Co. should freeze c-o-l, impose 10 percent (wage) cut, etc. We're not doing this today but we must try to avoid further problems.
> The average Kohler factory employee earns over $20,000/year (on a 40-hour week).
> Spartanburg (South Carolina) and Brownwood (Texas) rates considerably lower. When times are tough, $20,000 is too much. It means that when Pottery puts in a new product, we must look at advantages of other locations.
>
> We must now look at: . . .
> (IV) Rates for new jobs—and for new businesses. We must be competitive with Sheboygan and Wisconsin.
>
> This must be a joint effort—if we don't get relief, the jobs won't be there.
> We'll come back in 2-3 months, if business doesn't improve, to inform you of further necessary moves.

In the discussion following, Conger specifically stated:

> When business improves, we'll face a tight labor market. We'll have to decide where to produce product.

The meeting ended with a statement by management, regarding the new injection molding process, that:

> We're debugging now, this is a new and different operation. $6.50 rate will apply temporarily.

At another grievance meeting, held May 13, the subject of rates arose again. Respondent's notes of this meeting indicate that its representatives made the following statements:

> I understand you won't negotiate any new pay standards.
> Let's keep the jobs here. $6.50 per hour is $13,000 plus per year. There are many jobs in Sheboygan that don't pay more than $13,000–$15,000.
>
> If you refuse to recognize our need to be competitive, we'll have to tell 4th floor (Board of Directors) to forget it—move the jobs elsewhere.
> We're not talking about just four people. We're talking about future—when maybe 200 people could be involved.

Union President Lettre testified that Conger's statements at that meeting were that Respondent was speaking about not only injection molding. Conger testified that he "would recommend to the Board for consideration that injection molding be removed if the union and company could not agree to rates, and the new processes not be put in Kohler, Wisconsin if some agreement could not be worked out." (Emphasis added.)

The issue of rates was not settled. On August 2, the Union initiated an action against Respondent in the local Federal district court. Conger addressed a letter to an official of the International Union on August 25, in which he reiterated, "The issue simply is whether jobs of this type will be added in Wisconsin or whether they will have to be assigned to areas where fair, but lower, pay scales are now in existence. . . . Injection Molding currently involves only two employees and is never likely to require a large number of workers, so the impact of this particular operation is not of great significance. But we are talking about a principle which potentially will involve the location of hundreds of new jobs as we expand into new products and new materials."

At the meeting held July 1 on a grievance regarding a reduction in pay rate for casting in the pottery division, Union Steward Klabechek and Local Union President Lettre testified that Respondent's head of industrial engineering, Del Miller, stated the problem involved the reduced pace of the workers and that, as Klabechek reported, "if these people didn't want to increase their pay, to make up the difference in the money they were losing, that they could make the pottery cheaper down in South Carolina and that the cull was less . . . there and if we did not settle these rates, that it would be removed down there."

Conger and Miller testified that no such comment was made. Notes of the meeting made by Respondent do not reflect such a conversation. Notes made by the Union were not produced though, in lieu of issuing a requested subpoena the Union's president was directed by me to produce them if available. His testimony was that the notes were not available. The individual who took the notes for the Union was not produced as a witness.

The contract between Respondent and the Union has no provisions directly limiting transfer of bargaining unit work, whether of new and experimental work or of work which had been done for a long period of time. The management functions provision of article II in fact provides in part:

> It is agreed that the management of the Company and its business and the direction of its working forces is vested exclusively in the Company, and that this includes, but is not limited to the following: to direct and supervise the work of its employees; to hire, promote, transfer or lay off employees; or demote, suspend, discipline or discharge employees for cause; to plan, direct and control operations; to determine the amount and quality of the work > needed, by whom it shall be performed and the location where such work shall be performed; to introduce new or improved methods or facilities, or to change existing manufacturing practices, designs, methods and facilities. . . . The Company's exercise of the foregoing functions shall be limited only by the express provisions of this contract and the Company has all the rights which it had at common law except those expressly bargained away in this agreement and except as limited by statute. This Article shall be liberally construed. [Emphasis added.]

2. Discussion

The complaint alleges two threats to remove bargaining unit work: one by Conger at the meeting of May 13 and one by Miller at the meeting of July 1. Without resolving the direct conflict of testimony as to what statements were made or not made by Miller on July 1, let us first examine Respondent's arguments, which I find prevailing even if the statement were made as alleged.

Respondent argues that since the actions allegedly threatened were themselves not illegal, the alleged uttering of the threats could not themselves have been illegal. On January 25, 1984, the Board on remand reversed its prior holding in Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982), and held that an employer subject to the Act is permitted to move operations from union to nonunion plants in order to avoid higher union wages, unless a collective-bargaining contract specifically prohibited such a move, and providing the employer has satisfied any obligation to bargain with the union regarding the move.

A change in location where specific work is to be done and in the personnel doing it are subjects of mandatory bargaining and, ordinarily, under the precepts of Milwaukee Spring II, supra, while management can unilaterally make these changes it must still bargain with the union regarding them. However, where there is a broad management-rights clause in the existing bargaining agreement, as exists here, the Union has already been given its opportunity to bargain and has waived it. Since the proposed changes do not themselves violate the Act, the proposals themselves cannot constitute a violation. Therefore, the proposals to move unit work to other plants if acceptable wage rates could not be negotiated, the Union having waived its right to bargain over such a move, were not "threats in violation of the Act."

B. Subcontract Cleaning Service

1. Facts

Cleaning Respondent's facility was accomplished by production sanitation personnel, who are members of the bargaining unit, or by office janitorial personnel, who are not. Respondent and the Union have not always been consistent in applying this differentiation. In the early 1970s, production sanitation personnel cleaned all of building 5N, including offices, while in 1975 newly converted office space in the same building was cleaned by office janitorial personnel as were areas of the plumbing office and the employee safety, benefits and recreation departments. From 1975 to 1978 various changes took place in cleaning offices at the generating plant and in the service parts section, and no clear distinction arose as to which group was assigned to clean restrooms utilized by both production and office workers.

In 1981 Respondent began construction of a new distribution center (the DC) for warehousing, shipping, and receiving operations which had been treated as part of the production rather than the office work, the cleaning of which would normally be done by unit members. Shipping and warehouse production employees, and brass department employees were tranferred to the DC between March 1982 and April 1983.

Cleaning of the DC was at first done by each individual working there, for himself, whether of production or of office area. On a comparison of cleaning costs when the work was done by bargaining unit personnel, by nonunit personnel, or by outside contractor, Respondent contracted the cleaning work in the DC to an outside agency commencing September 8. That agency more or less evenly divides its time between cleaning production areas and office areas. At the time the outside agency began its work a number of unit-member sanitation workers were laid off, purportedly because of a "lack of work."

The Respondent has contracted out work of the bargaining unit in other instances dating from 1973. Such subcontracts have related to work in the plumbing and specialty products division, the pottery division, the sanitation division, and the engine division, and to window cleaning.

2. Discussion

An employer is obligated to bargain on the issue of contracting out work done by members of the bargaining unit. Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964). In determining whether unilateral subcontracting violates the Act, the Board examines the following five criteria:[2] Whether it was motivated solely by economic conditions; whether it "comported with the traditional methods" of Respondent's business operations; whether it significantly varied from past practice; whether the union had opportunity to bargain on the changes at general negotiating meetings; and whether it had a demonstrable adverse impact on bargaining unit employees. General Motors Corp., 257 NLRB 820, 823 (1981), and cases cited therein.

The facts stated above show that the Union, in negotiating the current contract with its broad management-rights provision, had an opportunity to bargain the issue. It is also shown that the contracting out was based only on an economic basis, and that though bargaining unit employees were injured by Respondent's action there was no union animus. Finally, there is a history of contracting out certain suboperations and window cleaning as a prior and traditional business practice. In the totality of the evidence it is clear that Respondent retained the right to contract out the janitorial work, and thus the action did not constitute a violation of the Act.

C. Position Reclassification

1. Facts

Respondent employs more than 20 stock control clerks (SCCs) throughout its operations, with differing functions. Cassie Stemper was the SCC in the maintenance stores department, within the bargaining unit, until she was discharged in December. When the position became vacant, in the normal course of operations it was reviewed to determine retention and classification. The initial supervisor's evaluation, approved by his superior, was that on the basis of work to be performed by the employee the position should be retained but reclassified out of the bargaining unit. This request for reclassification, also reviewed by the personnel manager, the chief of wage and salary administration, and the vice presidents for technical services and for administration, received final approval in January 1983, and an employee then on layoff was hired to fill the position as a nonmember of the bargaining unit.

Respondent's basis for changing the position classification was that a continuing evolution in position requirements had taken it from a factory clerical post to one which was "office administrative." Respondent had over the years similarly reclassified positions so as to remove them from the bargaining unit, with only few union grievances being filed. The Union was aware that this particular position was being reviewed, and after learning of the reclassification promptly protested by letter of January 28, 1983.

Stemper, the prior employee, testified that the position had become more complex over the years, but only because of the introduction of computers to be operated in accomplishing the same results that had always been achieved. The only change in the position after she left was the utilization of still another computer, the APPO System, referring to accounts payable, purchase order, in collating purchase orders with billings. That computer had been available prior to Stemper's discharge, but was not used as the function was performed through separate and noncomputerized correspondence.

2. Discussion

As a refinement of the concept enunciated in Fibreboard Corp., supra, that unilateral acts in derogation of the bargaining agreement may constitute a violation of the Act, the Board has held that "the reclassification of a position from a bargaining unit job to a nonunit job is a mandatory subject of collective bargaining if the reclassification has an impact on bargaining unit work." Fry Foods, 241 NLRB 76, 88 (1979), enfd. 609 F.2d 267 (6th Cir. 1979). The functions of the position involved did not go through any great change prior to its reclassification. In considering those criteria the Board applies to Fibreboard situations, as per Westinghouse Electric Corp., supra, we see that in this instance, though the employer's practice followed the history and tradition of its business operations, and though the Union may be said to have concurred through acquiescence to the broad management-rights clause, not only was there an adverse impact on bargaining unit employees but the employer made this unilateral change with no discernible economic foundation. Under the circumstances, the only cause for the change must have been to remove the position from union protection. On that basis, I find the unilateral removal of this position from the bargaining unit to constitute a violation of the Act.

D. Threatened Refusal to Process Grievances

1. Facts

The collective-bargaining agreement between the parties provides a five-step grievance procedure. Generally an employee complaint may be settled with his foreman within 2 days; appeal from a foreman's decision may be settled within 2 days by the departmental supervisor; appeal from a departmental supervisor's decision may be settled within 3 days by the divisional superintendent; appeal from a divisional superintendent's decision may be settled within 10 days by the company bargaining committee; and appeal from a decision by the company bargaining committee can be taken to compulsory arbitration.

Between April 7 and July 1, grievance meetings among the company bargaining committee and union representatives covered a number of disputes, including such matters as wage rates on the new injection molding process and on the tank room casting rate, time off for stewards to conduct investigations, and the transfer of employees at lower wage rates to the new distribution center. On August 2, the Union brought suit against Respondent on some or all of these issues in the local Federal district court, and sometime prior thereto requested the local county district attorney to bring criminal charges for an alleged failure to pay union stewards according to the contract.

In mid- to late-August 1983, Respondent's administrative vice president Conger asked Union President Lettre to meet with him in an attempt to settle some of these matters. Lettre testified that Conger said:

> I would have to stop threatening him and his constituents about NLRB charges and Federal Court. He said if I go to the NLRB or Federal Court, he will leave those grievances set on the side; he will not settle any more and they will sit on the side like he did to the (dispute over use of the) Osborn (machines) back in 1977.

Conger testified that in view of the union attempt to file criminal charges and the institution of suit in the Federal court, he "talked tough" at the meeting to the extent of telling Lettre that grievance settlements would not be achieved by coercive union efforts.

2. Discussion

As is immediately apparent, there is no way in which Respondent could refuse to process grievances. If it refused to take action within the prescribed short time period the grievance would be moved by the Union to the next step, and ultimately to mandatory arbitration. Further, it should be noted that the alleged threat to refuse to process grievances if the Union went to the Board and to the Federal court was supposedly made after the August 2 filing in the district court. I credit the testimony of Conger that on behalf of Respondent he did no more than tell the Union that its activities were not conducive to and would not help the peaceful settlement of grievances and not that he threatened to refuse to process the grievances on which the disputes were based.

E. Discipline of Employee Klabachek

1. Facts

In nonserious cases, there is a four-step disciplinary process. An oral warning for a first violation is followed by three written warnings, the last being designated a final warning,[3] and a violation thereafter is cause for discharge. Warnings are not the subject of grievance and arbitration, but a union letter of protest to any warning will be kept in the personnel file. Discharge after final warning can be grieved and arbitrated.

Richard Klabachek is a pottery caster and is also the Union's chief steward in the pottery division. Though there is no record of an oral warning, he was issued a written warning for insubordination taking place January 30, 1982, at which time he allegedly was involved in a dispute with his foreman, Mark Jelenk, and directed obscenities and derogatory statements to Jelenk in the presence of other employees. The Union filed a letter of protest.

On Thursday, October 7, 1982, a routine inspection of pottery castings by two supervisors revealed cracked outlets, and further investigation showed that 6 of the 24 bowls cast by Klabachek in 1 day were defective. Jelenk looked at the rejects and showed a portion to Klabachek, who agreed that there was dust on the outlet areas. This would interfere with a proper joint, and render the ware useless. Klabachek denied responsibility for the defect but Jelenk, having discussed it previously with the supervisors, prepared and issued a written warning for high losses and poor workmanship.

The following Monday, October 11, General Supervisor Massari went to Klabachek's work area to discuss the matter with him. Massari testified that during the conversation Klabachek raised his voice, and made statements to the effect that his foreman "was lying again." Klabachek testified that his statement had been that the foreman had told him he had been ordered to issue the warning by his supervisors, and that such was the basis of the written warning "unless he's lying again." In any event, Massari discontinued the discussion and had Klabachek, with his shop steward, come to his office, where Massari told Klabachek to consider himself given an oral warning for insubordination. Massari and Klabachek also discussed the issue of poor workmanship, and Massari, believing there to be a question of the seriousness of the loss, reduced the written warning to an oral one. However, that Friday, October 15, when the work reached the dry finish department, it was discovered that of Klabachek's 24 pieces a total of 20, not 6, were defective. On that basis Massari had another meeting with Klabachek and reinstated the written warning, though Klabachek insisted that the fault lay not in the workmanship but in the clay.

The same day, October 15, Klabachek complained about the clay to Pottery Superintendent Wirth, who promised to relay the complaints to Massari and to William Conroy, the slip-glaze supervisor, who had the responsibility of preparing proper clay. On Monday, October 18, Conroy went to Klabachek's work area to discuss the matter. Heated words were exchanged by both, and Conroy prepared a written warning for insubordination.

2. Discussion

Though no charge was filed as to the disciplining of Klabachek, there is no restriction against including the allegation in the complaint resulting from an investigation of other charges. However, there is in the record no evidence of a nexus between Klabachek's union membership, office, or duties, on the one hand, and, on the other the warnings issued to him. There is here not even a Wright Line[4] issue of requiring a preponderance of the evidence that the employer would have instituted the disciplinary action even absent some protected conduct by the employee. If there were such issues, however, I would find that Respondent successfully carried the shifted burden of proof, and showed that issuance of the one warning for poor workmanship and the two warnings for insubordination would have occurred whether or not Klabachek had engaged in protected activities.[5]

F. Coercive Interrogation

1. Facts

Employees in the old distribution center were paid on a piece rate. In early 1982 Respondent proposed that employees tranferred to the new distribution center in June 1983[6] be paid on an hourly wage rate. The Union agreed, but negotiation continued as to the particular rates, and as to the pay grades to be assigned. On March 15, Respondent prepared its final offer of grade classifications and offered it to the Union on March 29. There remained, however, a dispute regarding the "slots," or specific steps within a pay grade, to which individual employees would be assigned. The union demand was that all employees in the new distribution center be placed, at the time of transfer and change in method of compensation, in the top bracket of their respective pay grade.

Respondent agreed only to review individual slot assignments, and on Friday, April 1, decided on a more "liberal" assignment of slots. A typed copy was sent to and received by the Union early Monday morning,

[3] The written agreement between Respondent and the Union makes no provision for an oral warning, and does not specify that a particular number of written warnings issue before a final warning.

[4] NLRB v. Wright Line, 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981).

[5] The General Counsel's allegation that Klabachek was being "set up" for discharged has no support. If there are further warnings and Klabachek is discharged, the issue can be grieved and arbitrated. See United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984).

[6] All dates in this section are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

April 4. That afternoon the Union rejected the new offer by phone.

Respondent alleges that as a result of numerous employee complaints that they had been misinformed or uninformed by the Union of Respondent's offers, it scheduled a series of seven meetings of distribution center employees, by job classification, starting Tuesday at 7 a.m., to explain their offers. Respondent Representatives Le Mahiew and Ahrens testified that in each meeting employees were told that attendance was voluntary, that they could have union representation if they desired, that they could ask any questions, and what Respondent's proposals were. They testified that union representation, through Chief Steward Strochschoen, was present only during the second, third, and possibly the fifth meeting, while Strochschoen testified that he was present during the second through sixth meeting. Respondent admits that it polled the employees individually during the first two meetings as to whether they would accept Respondent's offer, but discontinued after Strochschoen's objection during the second meeting. Strochschoen testified that, with possibly one exception, they also polled employees in the third through sixth meeting. Respondent claimed that no union representation was requested during the first meeting, but a union employee testified that he requested and had been denied union representation at that meeting. Union members testified that they had been threatened with the loss of two slots in grade if they did not vote to accept Respondent's offer, but Respondent's witnesses testified that employees were merely provided with the information that if an agreement was not entered into their pay would be according to a prior offer, which was two slots less. Union employees also testified that Respondent threatened to "re-canvass the jobs" and fill them with other employees if agreement was not reached, which Respondent's testimony denied.

2. Discussion

The admitted polling of individual employees during the first and second meetings constituted an obvious situation reasonably tending to restrain or interfere with the employees' right[7] to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. It is thus of dubious value to quantify the extent of interference with rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act but, for the sake of settling credibility issues, I find that Strochschoen attended all but two of the meetings and that Respondent polled employees in the first meeting as well as in all but possibly one of the meetings Strochschoen attended. I was impressed with Strochschoen's forthright testimony, I do not believe that if offered union representation only one group of seven would request it. I also find that union representation was requested during the first meeting but rejected, and that the employees were given the clear impression that unless they voted contrary to the position of their authorized bargaining representative they would forfeit two pay slots. As to recanvassing of positions, however, the General Counsel was unable to present a preponderance of the evidence to prove that such a threat was in fact made.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act by unilaterally removing the position of maintenance stores stock control clerk from the bargaining unit, and by coercively interrogating employees as to their support of positions taken by their bargaining representative.

4. These unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act, it will be recommended that Respondent cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The Respondent, Kohler Company, Kohler, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Altering the composition of the bargaining unit by reclassifying a position to remove it from the bargaining unit while the incumbent continues to do bargaining unit work, without first negotiating with the Union.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees as to their support of positions taken by their bargaining representative.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative actions necessary to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.

(a) Cease giving effect to the reclassification of the position of maintenance stores stock control clerk from the bargaining unit unless and until Respondent has bargained in good faith with the Union concerning the reclassification.

(b) Post at its offices and places of business at Kohler, Wisconsin, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the Na-

Regional Director for Region 30, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally remove positions from the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees under circumstances when such interrogation reasonably tends to restrain or interfere with the employees' exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

KOHLER COMPANY

Hood Industries, Inc., and its Wholly Owned Subsidiary, B & K Transportation, Inc. and Teamsters Local 25, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America. Case 1-CA-14624

23 January 1985

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 20 March 1980 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding[1] finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. As a remedy for the 8(a)(3) violations the Board ordered the Respondent to reestablish its delivery operation and reinstate and make whole its delivery employees. Thereafter, on 25 April 1980, the Respondent filed a motion to reopen the record asserting that compliance with the Board's order to reestablish B & K Transportation, Inc. (B & K) would increase its monthly costs by about $20,000[2] and thereby endanger the Respondent's continued viability.

On 16 June 1980 the Board granted the Respondent's motion and ordered the hearing reopened to enable "the Board to determine the factual accuracy of Respondent's assertions, and further, if true, whether Respondent's continued viability would be endangered by our remedy."

On 3 December 1981 Administrative Law Judge Peter E. Donnelly issued his decision on order reopening the record. He found that the Respondent failed to demonstrate that the cost of reestablishing the trucking service would endanger the Respondent's economic survival and therefore recommended affirmance of the Board's earlier Order. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and moved for reconsideration of the Board's underlying Decision and Order, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent herewith and to modify the Board's Decision and Order reported at 248 NLRB 597.[3]

The Respondent learned in early 1978 that its trucking contractor James Foley had a terminal illness. It thereupon formed B & K to acquire Foley's trucks and equipment and to take over delivery of polyurethane foam products to its customers. B & K began delivery operations in April 1978,[4] and lost $406 and $3200 in its first 2 months. After only 5 or 6 months the Respondent terminated B & K's operations for reasons which have been found to be discriminatory. About November 1978 the Respondent began contracting its delivery work to outside local and long-distance trucking contactors. The Respondent's comptroller Raleigh testified without contradiction that the amount of the Respondent's delivered goods has increased since B & K's cessation of active trucking operations. The Respondent's statement of 1980 operations in evidence reveals that its contracting costs continued to average $30,000 per month through calendar year 1980.

As noted above, the Board ordered this proceeding reopened in order to evaluate the economic impact of the status quo ante remedy on the Respondent. Comptroller Raleigh introduced into evidence Respondent's Exhibit 1, which estimated total costs of $600,966 per year (or $50,080.50 per month) for B & K's resumption of the delivery function. Raleigh testified that he calculated those costs based on the Respondent's need to acquire six used tractors and employ six truckdrivers at $10.93 per hour.[5] In addition, Raleigh figured on the Respondent's hiring a full-time dispatcher, mechanic, and clerical at annual salaries of $15,000, $19,660, and $10,000, respectively. The Respondent's financial statement for 1980 introduced into evidence showed that it lost $146,000 in 1980 and that its liabilities at the time of the hearing exceeded current assets by $360,000. Independent certified public accountant Howard testified that he was familiar with the Respondent's financial condition and that in his professional opinion requiring the Respondent to expend the additional costs (set forth in R. Exh. 1) would adversely affect its continued viability.[6]

[1] 248 NLRB 597 (1980).

[2] The Respondent's motion on its face alleged estimated monthly costs of $51,428. An addition error shows that the monthly figure was understated by $9700 making the alleged monthly costs approximately $60,000 (as compared with an average of $30,000 per month paid to outside delivery contractors from December 1979 through March 1980).

[3] None of the Board Members herein participated in the underlying Decision and Order. The Respondent's motion for reconsideration of that decision is denied because it contains nothing not previously considered.

[4] B & K employed one part-time and four full-time drivers at $5 or $6 per hour. Its dispatching, payroll, and other administrative clerical functions were performed by Hood employees who had other full-time job responsibilities and lacked prior experience in the trucking business.

[5] The source of the estimated hourly wage for truckdrivers is a survey of average hourly wages in the Boston area as of August 1980 conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor (BLS).

Contrary to the judge, we perceive no basis for rejecting projected hourly rates derived from the BLS survey.

[6] Howard specifically noted that the Respondent could not afford a capital outlay of $120,000 for the purchase of six used tractors and would be viewed by lenders as an unattractive borrower of such funds.

The judge found that the Respondent failed to substantiate the above-proposed expenditures. He noted that there were flaws in the Respondent's method of computing some costs and that it did not adduce evidentiary support for employment of additional personnel. The judge further interpreted the Board's remedy as contemplating restoration of the B & K operation as it formerly existed. He concluded that the Respondent's cost figures were excessive and therefore discounted Howard's opinion that requiring such expenditures would endanger the Respondent's continued viability. Contrary to the judge, however, we find that the Respondent has sufficiently proved that reestablishment of the B & K operation would endanger its continued viability.

First, we find that the record evidence[7] supports the cost estimates in Respondent's Exhibit 1 in substantial part. Clear and undisputed evidence that the Respondent's volume of delivered goods has increased since B & K ceased operating supports the asserted need for one additional driver. It also negates the judge's premise that the reestablishment order limits the size of the business to that formerly operated by B & K. This is so notwithstanding alleged flaws or inaccuracies in the Respondent's method of calculating costs as found by the judge. An enlarged delivery function and B & K's former unprofitable operation point up the necessity for at least one full-time employee with knowledge of the trucking business to perform dispatching and other clerical or administrative duties for a reestablished delivery business. In addition, there is no dispute as to the reasonableness of approximately $20,000 for the annual salary of a mechanic. We conclude from the foregoing that the record evidence substantiates most, if not all,[8] of the approximately $20,000 of increased monthly costs which the Respondent projects for reestablishment of its delivery function.

Moreover, we find that requiring the acquisition of six tractors costing more than $100,000 would be especially problematic for the Respondent in its present financial condition. Under all the circumstances, we find that a reestablishment order would be unduly burdensome and is unnecessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.[9] Rather, we conclude that the Respondent's unfair labor practices will be sufficiently remedied by a full make-whole order covering the employees of the discontinued trucking business.

[7] Like the judge, we have used the cost figures adduced at the hearing rather than those contained in the Respondent's prehearing motion. In this regard, we note that Raleigh testified that he performed the calculations for the cost estimates appended to the prehearing motion, but that the only person with knowledge of the underlying data—former Vice President Lundstrom—was no longer in the Respondent's employ.

[8] We agree with the judge that the Respondent has not justified the $10,000 annual salary for a full-time clerical employee and that inaccuracies in the Respondent's method of ascertaining cost estimates from contractor billings could have caused some overstatement in cost figures for fuel consumption or in the precise number of driver-hours required. However, the clerical's salary and the other possibly inflated estimates account for only a relatively small portion of the $20,000-per-month increase in the cost of reestablishing B & K's trucking business. We disagree with the judge's position that the Respondent's selection of a 3-year (rather than a 5-year) period for depreciating tractors is probative evidence of the Respondent's efforts to maximize its cost projections.

AMENDED REMEDY

We shall order the Respondent to make whole the truckdrivers it discriminatorily terminated by paying to each a sum of money equal to the amount he would have earned as wages and other benefits from the date of termination to the date he secures equivalent employment, computed in accordance with the Board's usual formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[10]

ORDER

It is ordered that the Board's Order in 248 NLRB 597 (1980) is amended by deleting paragraph 2(a) and by substituting the following for paragraph 2(b):

"(b) Make whole John Wharton, Irving Sweetser, Roger Morrison, Nils Swanson, and Paul Brown for any loss of wages and other benefits they may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against them, with interest, in the manner set forth in the "Amended Remedy."

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the attached appendix be substituted for that attached to the Board's decision in 248 NLRB 597 (1980).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate our employees concerning union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that they would be discharged because of their union activity.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any employee because of the union activity of our employees.

WE WILL NOT contract out bargaining unit work because of the union activities of our employees.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain with Teamsters Local 25, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees in the following unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time chemical drivers, truck drivers and shipper-receivers employed by the Employer at 14 Audubon Road, Wakefield, Massachusetts, but excluding all office clerical employees, production and maintenance employees, managerial employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole John Wharton, Irving Sweetser, Roger Morrison, Nils Swanson, and Paul Brown for any loss of wages and other benefits they may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against them, with interest.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees in the bargaining unit set forth above with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment; and, if an understanding is reached, WE WILL embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

HOOD INDUSTRIES, INC., AND ITS WHOLLY OWNED SUBSIDIARY, B & K TRANSPORTATION, INC.

DECISION ON ORDER REOPENING RECORD

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND BACKGROUND

PETER E. DONNELLY, Administrative Law Judge. The original administrative law judge's decision issued on October 17, 1979. As set forth, it appears that Hood Industries, Inc. (Hood or Respondent) employed one James Foley to distribute its products. When Foley became terminally ill, Respondent formed B & K Transportation, Inc. (B & K) to distribute its products. It purchased all of Foley's equipment, trucks, and permits and began its own distribution operation in February 1978.

On April 6, 1979, Teamsters Local 25, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America (Local 25 or the Union) filed a petition to represent the truckdrivers and platform workers employed by B & K. After an election, the Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees on May 30, 1978. Shortly thereafter, the Respondent subcontracted the distribution operation being performed by B & K and discharged the drivers. The Union filed 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) charges on June 14, 1978. The judge decided, inter alia, that "Respondent's decision to cease its trucking operation and its actions in selling the equipment and terminating the employees who were members of the Union were motivated by a desire to discourage union membership and not to bargain with the Union." The judge ordered the Respondent to reestablish its trucking operation and reinstate the discharged drivers. In the remedy portion of this decision the judge also concluded that he did "not believe that it would be an undue hardship for Respondent to resume its trucking operation," and that "Respondent has not shown that the economic burden of purchasing trucks and resuming its trucking operations would endanger the continued viability of Respondent," so as to bring this situation within the ambit of the Board's decision in Great Chinese American Sewing Co.[1]

The Board, in a Decison and Order affirming the judge dated March 20, 1980 (248 NLRB 597), commented on the Great Chinese case, saying: "The Great Chinese case involved a unique situation, and the [Board] majority [Member Fanning, dissenting], rather than forcing the reestablishment of a clearly unprofitable operation, found that the policies of the Act were sufficiently fulfilled by a full make-whole order covering the employees of the terminated plant."

Thereafter, on April 24, 1980, Respondent filed a motion to reopen record to show that the future liability of the Respondent would be endangered by requiring it to reestablish its trucking operation. The motion enumerated various individual specific costs amounting to $51,428 per month which Respondent contends it would cost to reestablish the trucking operation, as compared to an average cost of $30,542 per month for December 1979 and January, February, and March 1980, representing the cost to contract out the trucking operations. Based on these figures, Respondent contends that the cost of reestablishing the trucking operation under the Board's order would increase its costs by in excess of $20,000 per month. This, argues the Respondent, would "endanger the future liability" of Respondent within the meaning of the Great Chinese case. This being the case Respondent contends that the remedy for the discriminatory shutdown should be limited to backpay for the discriminatees until they obtain substantially equivalent employment.

By Order dated June 16, 1980, over the General Counsel's opposition, the Board (Member Jenkins dissenting) granted the Respondent's motion to reopen the record in order to afford the Respondent "an opportunity to develop a record which would permit the Board to determine the factual accuracy of Respondent's assertions and further, if true, whether Respondent's continued liability would be endangered by our remedy."

[1] 227 NLRB 1670 (1977).

A hearing on these issues was held before me on February 25, 26, and 27 and April 6 and 7, all in 1981. Briefs have been timely filed by Respondent and the General Counsel which have been duly considered.[2]

FACTS

I. ESTIMATED COST OF RESUMING THE TRUCKING OPERATION

In support of its position, Respondent, at the hearing, introduced into evidence a document captioned "Proposed Costs to Set Up Trucking Operation" (R. Exh. 1). In totaling the various cost items enumerated therein, a total figure of $600,966 per year is advanced. In its motion to reopen record (G.C. Exh. 2(a)), the annual figure is represented to be $617,136, a discrepancy of some $17,000 per year, disclosing variances in the individual cost items when comparing the two submissions.[3]

The various cost estimates of the Respondent, as set out in Respondent's Exhibit 1, are as follows

A. Driver's Wages ($148,753)

To arrive at this figure, Respondent calculated the hours billed by subcontractors in 1980 to arrive at a figure of 5608 for local hauling and estimated the hours worked by subcontractors as to long-distance hauling at 7334 to arrive at a total of 12,942 hours plus 382 hours (8 days) of holiday pay for a total of 13,326 hours since holiday time displaces working time. None of the source documents were introduced to support these figures. Based on these figures Respondent calculated that six drivers were needed[4] 2000 hours per year, per driver, plus 1326 hours of overtime. Respondent assumed an hourly rate of $10.93 per hour, with overtime hours at time and half ($15.40) as derived from Bureau of Labor Statistics for the Boston area as of August 1980.

B. Layovers ($10,830)

It is not disputed that Respondent did not pay for layovers while B & K performed the trucking operation. The number of layovers was arrived at by determining which long-distance hauls done by subcontractors in 1980 required layovers and assigning the cost of $30 to each layover.

C. Clerical ($10,000)

Respondent contends that a resumption of the trucking operation would require the full-time services of a clerical employee at an annual salary of $10,000 to perform such functions as filling out fuel tax forms, obtaining necessary truck and trailer licenses, making up the payroll, paying vendors, and maintaining the books.

It is not disputed that B & K had not employed a full-time clerical. Those clerical functions incident to the B & K trucking operations had been performed by employees of the Respondent, including the secretary to the president, and Raleigh himself. The record does not show that these functions required 40 hours per week to perform.

D. Dispatcher ($15,000)

It is undisputed that B & K did not employ a full-time dispatcher when it performed the trucking operation. The function of the dispatcher was done by Hood Vice President Kenneth Lundstrom and Raleigh, as employees of Hood at no additional cost to B & K. Obviously the Board's Order requires only restoration of the status quo and Hood is not obliged to hire a full-time dispatcher. But Respondent contends that one would be necessary if the trucking operation were to be granted.

E. Mechanic ($19,660)

In the cost proposal the figure of $19,660 per year is based on an hourly rate of $9.83 per hour, which again was the hourly rate for mechanics in the Boston area in 1980 as determined by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. With respect to the services of a mechanic, it should be noted B & K had not employed a mechanic and obviously the Board's Order to reestablish the trucking operation would not obligate the Respondent to hire a mechanic.

F. Blue Cross-Blue Shield ($10,783)

While B & K performed the trucking operation it paid one-half of the monthly Blue Cross-Blue Shield premiums for employees with less than 1 year of service and all of the premiums for those with more than 1 year of service. Respondent bases its premium cost figure of $10,793 on the assumption that the discriminatees would be reemployed and that a mechanic, dispatcher, and clerical would be employed full time, although this had not been the case when B & K maintained the trucking operation.

G. Holiday Pay ($10,858)

Respondent bases this figure on the assumption that six drivers and a mechanic will be hired to resume the trucking operation, and apparently that these employees would be paid 8 hours at regular time in addition to their normal pay for the holiday at their rate of $10.93 per hour. When B & K performed the trucking operation, drivers received only 8 hours' pay for holidays.

H. Unemployment Compensation; FICA Expense; Workmen's Compensation Expense

Like the calculations on holiday and vacation pay, Respondent assumes the hiring of six drivers, a mechanic, a dispatcher, and a clerical employee at the wages noted above, in arriving at the cost figures for these items.

I. Fuel ($160,152)

In order to arrive at an annual figure for the fuel cost, Respondent divided the estimated total number of miles driven by 4.5 miles per gallon and then multiplied by the

---

[2] In the absence of exceptions thereto, Respondent's motion to correct transcript is granted.

[3] The testimony in support of the cost figures in R. Exh. 1 was presented by Douglas Raleigh, Respondent's comptroller.

[4] Only four full-time and one part-time drivers had been employed in the B & K trucking operation prior to its discontinuance, at a rate of $5 per hour.

estimated cost of $1.448 per gallon for fuel. Obviously this calculation depends on an accurate total mileage figure for its validity. The mileage figures were arrived at from bills submitted by the subcontractors of B & K. As to long-distance mileage, B & K was billed at a rate of 60 cents per mile and total long-distance mileage was thus computed. Local hauling was billed differently, at $18 per hour. Respondent translated this to a mileage figure by dividing the total cost of local hauling by a factor of 53 cents per mile. However, the record discloses that there is a considerable discrepancy between the actual local miles driven and the Respondent's mileage figures. In two instances, Respondent's calculations erroneously showed mileage figures twice as great as the actual miles driven.

J. Depreciation ($48,681)

Respondent recites depreciation as an expense and put the figure at $48,681 per year for six tractors.[5] Respondent elected to estimate depreciation under IRS rules over 3 years instead of 5 years, as IRS rules would have permitted, with the resulting increased yearly depreciation figure showing as an expense.

II. FINANCIAL CONDITION OF RESPONDENT

The bulk of the testimony concerning the financial condition of the Respondent is derived from the testimony of William Howard, a certified public accountant with the CPA firm of Alexanderia Grant and Company, which firm has audited the Respondent since 1976. Howard was asked to examine the Respondent's exhibits for the purpose of forming an opinion as to whether or not the Respondent's viability would be affected if it were required to resume the trucking operation. Howard testified that, assuming the accuracy of these cost figures, the additional cost would eliminate the stockholders' equity which would "seriously impact the future of the company." He also noted that the current liabilities, those to fall due before January 1, 1982, exceed assets by about $360,000 and Hood would have to look elsewhere to pay those liabilities. In testifying about the Respondent's weak financial condition, Howard also noted the loss of $146,000 in 1980, and testified that these liabilities and losses precluded the use of current assets as a source to fund the resumed trucking operation. Also, that borrowing would be difficult since a firm with a working capital deficit of $365,000 would be unattractive to lenders. Given these considerations, Howard concluded that there was a clear question as to the ability of Respondent to continue operating if it were required to resume the trucking operation.

III. ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATION

The first question for which the Board has ordered the record to be reopened was to "determine the factual accuracy of the Respondent's assertions" in its motion to reopen record. (G.C. Exh. 2(a).) However, at the hearing the Respondent introduced a different set of cost figures, differing both in total cost and obviously in several individual cost items (R. Exh. 1). By attempting to prove its case using the figures introduced at the hearing, Respondent has effectively abandoned the cost figures presented to the Board, and on which the Board acted in ordering the hearing to be reopened.[6] Accordingly, I am not able to determine the accuracy of the cost representations made in the Respondent's motion to reopen record. However it seems appropriate to address the accuracy of the cost figures presented at the hearing and I shall do so.

A. Drivers Wages

Respondent estimated that it would need six drivers at an hourly rate of $10.93 per hour, despite the fact that B & K, when performing the trucking operation itself, operated with only five drivers at $5 an hour. I am not satisfied that the Respondent has established the need for a sixth driver whether due to an increase in production, sales, or whatever, nor am I satisfied that drivers cannot be retained at less than 119 percent of what they were paid as employees of B & K. Accordingly, I conclude that this cost figure has not been proven and that an accurate cost figure would be considerably less.

B. Clerical Employee

While B & K performed its own trucking operation, the insubstantial clerical functions necessary were performed by employees of Hood. Respondent has not shown that a resumption of the trucking operation necessitates a change in this method of operation to the extent of employing a full-time clerical employee. Therefore, without such a showing, this cost figure to perform clerical functions is unsubstantiated.

C. Dispatcher

I am not satisified that the full-time services of a dispatcher would be required in order to conform to the Board's Order to reestablish the trucking operation. The dispatcher's function had previously been performed by employees of the Respondent, and I am not satisfied that reestablishment of the trucking operation would require the services of a full-time dispatcher for B & K.

D. Mechanic Employee

Obviously, as with the clerical and dispatcher, the Board's Order does not require the hiring of an individual to perform mechanical work. Certainly trucks will need to be maintained, but it would comport fully with the Board's Order to have the work done as it has been done previously. I cannot conclude that the assumption of the trucking operation requires the hiring of a full-time mechanic. Whether or not the yearly salary of $19,660 per year would be adequate for the services of [5] Respondent presently owns two tractors, a Peterbilt and a Mack. The Mack was retained as a "yard horse," when the B & K equipment was sold in 1978, replacing an older White, which was sold. The Peterbilt apparently was taken out of service on October 6, 1978, but is still owned by Respondent.

[6] The cost figures to restore the trucking operation in the motion to reopen record was $51,428 per month or $617,136 per year. The yearly cost figure in R. Exh. 1 is $600,966 per year or $50,080.50 per month.

outside maintenance on the vehicles, it is not possible to determine without more information.

E. Blue Cross-Blue Shield

With respect to the cost estimate for Blue Cross-Blue Shield coverage, the Respondent has included within that cost item coverage for a full-time clerical, mechanic, and dispatcher. As noted earlier, I am not satisfied that the Board's Order to resume the trucking operation requires their hiring, and thus I conclude that Respondent's cost estimate is excessive.

F. Holidays and Vacations

Similarly, with respect to the matter of holiday and vacation pay, those amounts are reducible by the amounts attributable to the mechanic, dispatcher, and clerical, whom I conclude that the Respondent is not required to employ. Moreover, Respondent's calculation appears to provide, as to the eight holidays, both regular pay plus 8 hours of holiday pay for each holiday, whereas previously they had been paid for only 8 hours of regular pay on holidays. Additionally, as noted earlier, I am not convinced that drivers would be unavailable to the Respondent at less than $10.93 per hour. All of these factors persuade me that the holiday and vacation cost figures could be substantially less than those advanced by Respondent.

G. Unemployment Compensation, FICA, Workmen's Compensation

Likewise, the unemployment compensation, FICA, and workmen's compensation premium expenses to the Respondent are exaggerated to the extent that they include payments for the mechanic, dispatcher, and clerical, the necessity for whose employment has not been shown.

H. Fuel Costs

With respect to the largest expense item, fuel, it appears to me to be substantially inaccurate and, as in those instances pointed out by the General Counsel, overstated. The fault lies with the above formula used to determine the number of miles driven locally, which produced seriously flawed mileage figures. In these circumstances, I conclude that the cost figure for fuel is substantially inaccurate, and not a reliable projection of fuel costs. Of course since vehicle maintenance costs depend on the same formula, they too are also flawed to that extent.

I. Depreciation

Respondent chose to project depreciation over 3 years rather than 5 years. The effect of this is to show a greater yearly expense than would have appeared if the 5-year depreciation option had been elected. While the Respondent contends that this is a business decision, beyond the scrutiny of the General Counsel, I conclude that it reflects a maximization of expense beyond what is necessary in order to resume the trucking operation under the Board's Order.

J. Financial Condition of Respondent

In evaluating the testimony of Howard, it is necessary to bear in mind that he was not responsible for, and apparently took no part in, the preparation of the document showing the proposed cost of resuming the trucking operation, or any of the other cost figures in Respondent's documents in evidence, with the exception of Respondent's financial statement (R. Exh. 7). Any opinion offered by Howard as to the continued viability of Respondent necessarily involves a comparison of the cost to resume the trucking operation with Respondent's financial position. I have concluded that the estimated cost figures to resume the trucking operation are substantially inaccurate and excessive. Accordingly, Howard's opinion, however valid it may have been premised on accurate projected cost figures, is fatally defective in view of Respondent's demonstrably inaccurate cost projections.

In summary, I am not satisfied that the figures advanced by the Respondent adequately reflect the cost of reestablishing the trucking operation. It appears that the real figures would be substantially less, although it is impossible to be definitive as to specifics in this regard, because the date in the record is insufficient. While it appears that some additional expense may be encountered by the reestablishment of the trucking operation, I am not convinced that this record shows that the continued viability of the Respondent has been endangered so as to bring the Respondent within the ambit of the Great Chinese case, supra.

In the instant case, Respondent shut down its trucking operation discriminatorily, and discharged the drivers in an effort to discourage union membership, and so violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. That is not in dispute in this matter. Respondent's motivation was discriminatory, not economic. In these circumstances, the traditional Board remedy provides, inter alia, for the reestablishment of the operation. However, the Board appears to have chiseled an exception for employers whose continued viability would be endangered by such reestablishment.

But as the Board notes in its original Decision and Order herein, supra, 248 NLRB 597 fn. 3, Great Chinese involved a "unique situation" and made its position clear in holding, "We continue to adhere to the well-established principle that, in cases involving discriminatory conduct, the restoration of the status quo ante is the proper remedy unless the wrongdoer can demonstrate that the normal remedy would endanger its continued viability. See Lion Uniform, Jamesville Apparel Division, 247 NLRB 992 (1980); R & H Masonry Supply, Inc., supra [238 NLRB 1044]."

In my opinion, a simple showing that reestablishing the operation would be financially detrimental would not suffice. There must be a showing, with accurate supporting data and financial documentation, that the Respondent's economic survival would be endangered. The Respondent in the instant case has not met this burden. Accordingly, it is my recommendation that the Board's Order in this case be enforced.[7]

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

23 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 4 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] We agree with the judge that dismissal of the complaint is warranted under the standards set forth in Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984). Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to consider the Respondent's alternative contentions or the judge's discussion and findings regarding alleged waiver and acquiescence and whether the parties' collective-bargaining agreement affirmatively permitted the changes at issue. Further, because there is no contention that the Respondent violated the Act by failing to notify and bargain in good faith with the Union regarding the proposed decision to relocate, we find it unnecessary to consider the Respondent's motivation for the decision or whether it was a mandatory subject of bargaining.

In the absence of exceptions we adopt pro forma the judge's discussion and findings at sec. II,A of his decision regarding the General Counsel's authority to seek dismissal or withdrawal of the complaint and the role of the Charging Party in the circumstances of this case.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER H. MALONEY JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case came on for hearing before me at Davenport, Iowa, upon an unfair labor practice complaint[1] issued by the Regional Director for Region 33 of the National Labor Relations Board, which alleges that the Respondent, Jaydon, Inc.,[2] violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. More particularly, the complaint alleges that the Respondent unlawfully transferred bargaining unit work from its organized plant in Rock Island, Illinois, to a new plant in Atlantic, Iowa, during the term of an existing collective-bargaining agreement, contrary to the terms of that agreement and without the prior consent of the Union. It asserts that the Respondent did so, in whole or in part, to avoid paying wage rates and benefits established by contract and in retaliation against the Union for refusing to make or accept midterm contract modifications. The complaint further alleges that, as a result of the relocation of work beginning about October 16, 1982, approximately 67 bargaining unit employees[3] were permanently laid off in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by telling employees who were to be laid off that they could obtain employment at the Respondent's new facility only by abandoning their rights under the existing collective-bargaining agreement, thereby bringing pressure on them to accept certain midterm contract modifications which the Respondent was seeking. Both the General Counsel and the Respondent, in posttrial motions to dismiss,[4] urge that the complaint be dismissed in light of the Board's recent decision in Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984), which was issued while the case was pending before me awaiting briefs. The Respondent also contends that the Union waived its right to object to a relocation of work to Atlantic, Iowa, and further argues that the complaint is barred by limitations. On these contentions, the issues herein were joined.[5]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

For a number of years, Jaydon, Inc. has operated a warehouse and distribution center at Rock Island, Illinois. It began operations in other premises in 1946 as a wholesale supplier of candy, fountain products, and punchboards but later grew into a large service merchandiser for nonfood items. It purchases these items in bulk from manufacturers, breaks them down into smaller orders, and sells and delivers the individualized orders to retail merchants, accompanying the sale with service, retailing advice, and advertising promotions. It now processes about 7000 different nonfood items normally found in grocery and drug stores. Its business exceeds $70 million in annual sales. The Respondent's president and chief executive officer Jay Gellerman estimated that Jaydon, Inc. now ranks sixth or seventh nationally among service merchandisers.

[1] The principal docket entries in this case are as follows:

Charge filed herein by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) and its Local 2137 (the Union or UAW) against the Respondent on February 9, 1983; complaint issued by the Regional Director against the Respondent on September 15, 1983; the Respondent's answer filed on September 22, 1983; hearing held in Davenport, Iowa, on November 29 and 30, 1983.

[2] The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an Illinois corporation which maintains its principal place of business in Rock Island, Illinois, where it is engaged in the wholesale distribution of nonfood grocery items to retail merchants. During the preceding calendar year, the Respondent sold and shipped from its Rock Island, Illinois facility directly to points and places located outside the State of Illinois goods valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[3] The names of these employees are not set forth in the body of the complaint but their identities are fully disclosed in stipulated exhibits and other documents admitted into evidence.

[4] The Charging Party vigorously opposes both motions and insists that the complaint be disposed of by a full decision and in accordance with the General Counsel's original theory of the case.

[5] Certain errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

The Respondent employs driver-salesmen and presumably other sales representatives in the 14-state area in which it operates. The dispute in this case involves the Respondent's operations in Iowa, where its major customer is Hy-Vee Food Stores, Inc. (Hy-Vee). Hy-Vee is a large retail chain which provides Jaydon, Inc. with more that $20 million of the Respondent's total gross sales and accounts for about 85 percent of its Iowa business.

The pattern followed by the Respondent in servicing Hy-Vee is that Jaydon driver-salesmen, who are located throughout Iowa, visit Hy-Vee's many retail outlets and solicit orders directly from store managers. These orders are phoned into the Respondent's headquarters in Rock Island and are then prepared in individual shipments destined for each particular store. This is done by a pick line manned by employees who pick the particular items ordered and, in the quantity ordered, assemble the order, and then cause it to be shipped to drop points throughout Iowa. Drop points are unmanned storage locations from which driver-salesmen pick up the orders and then transport them to the particular store which originally placed the order. The gravamen of the dispute in this case is that Iowa orders which were formerly picked and Iowa shipments which were formerly made from the Rock Island warehouse are now being handled from the Respondent's new satellite warehouse, located some 230 miles west of Rock Island in Atlantic, Iowa. As a result of this transfer a bargaining unit in Rock Island formerly consisting of about 230 employees was reduced first to 160 employees and now has only about 95 employees. The latter decline also resulted, in part, from the opening of a second satellite warehouse in Elkhart, Indiana. The facts and circumstances of the relocation to Elkhart are not directly at issue here but, in the original estimation of the General Counsel and the Changing Party, they provide an illuminating insight into what prompted the Respondent's pilot program in Iowa.

In the fall of 1979, the Union herein filed a representation petition, seeking a unit of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees at its Rock Island facility.[6] A so-called stip election agreement was concluded defining the appropriate bargaining unit as "all full-time and regular part-time maintenance and warehouse employees and truck drivers employed by the Employer at its Rock Island, Illinois facility" with the usual exceptions. The Union won the election, which was conducted on December 5, 1979, and was certified soon thereafter. Collective bargaining between the parties resulted in a contract, effective April 1980 through Febuary 28, 1983. (It was later extended until March 9, 1983.) The contract contained a provision describing the bargaining unit in almost the identical language which was used in the election agreement.

In early 1982, the Respondent was approached by Ronald Pearson, executive vice president of Hy-Vee, and was asked whether it could take some measures which would result in lowering the cost of items purchased. Pearson made no specific demands on the Respondent but suggested, among other things, that perhaps the Respondent and Hy-Vee could jointly operate a wholesaling operation in a warehouse at Chariton, Iowa, which Hy-Vee was planning to vacate. Another suggestion was that the cost of items sold to Hy-Vee could be reduced if Jaydon would also reduce the services extended to the 130 Hy-Vee grocery stores and its 18 Drug Town drug stores. Extensive driver-salesmen service, such as rack jobbing, had already been discontinued in 28 of these stores at the request of the store managers and ultimately 46 more stores reduced these services, a move which resulted in the layoff of about 20 Jaydon driver-salesmen.[7] At a meeting between Jaydon and Hy-Vee management on April 12, the Respondent informed Hy-Vee that it was thinking about establishing a satellite building at Atlantic, Iowa. The Respondent told Hy-Vee that it had a 50,200 square foot building lined up and was of the opinion that it could operate a warehouse there for about one-half of the labor cost it was then paying in Rock Island.[8] I credit Pearson's statement that Hy-Vee never demanded that Jaydon establish a warehouse in Iowa.[9] Throughout the period running from April until August 3, negotiations continued between Brady and Portes over the particulars of the lease of the Atlantic warehouse. On that date a lease was signed by the landlord and, on August 6, it was approved by Jaydon.

On July 13, 1982, Gellerman met with Hy-Vee management and informed them that a decision to open a warehouse in Atlantic had been made. On the following day, he met with union representatives but his statement to them on this subject was far more equivocal. The occasion for the second discussion was a routine third-step grievance meeting which took place at the plant between Gellerman, Operations Director Dennis Calvert, Personnel Director Kendall Kelly, UAW International Representative James Maddox, and various stewards and Local 2137 officials who normally attended third-step meetings. After the parties had completed a discussion of the grievances, Gellerman handed Maddox a letter which read:

> We have been notified by our largest customer that unless we are more competitive in our pricing and make major changes in our programs, they will be forced to buy their non-food merchandise direct from the manufacturers. They have officially noti-

[6] At this time, the Respondent had no other facilities. It controls a wholly owned subsidiary in Springfield, Missouri, some 450 miles away, but this subsidiary did not figure in any way in the election or the preelection campaign.

[7] Driver-salesmen are not a part of the bargaining unit in this case and have never been represented by a labor organization.

[8] The building in question is known as the Ebcor Building and was owned by the Kewanee Boiler Corporation. In a letter dated April 14, 1982, Kewanee Attorney Charles A. Brady forwarded to Herbert Portes, one of the Respondent's attorneys, the draft of a lease of these premises, together with an option to buy and an abstract of title opinion. Brady recited in his letter that he was taking this action at the request of Gellerman.

[9] Gellerman's testimony on this point was evasive and misleading. At first he stated that he was forced to offer "this program" at the insistence of Hy-Vee. Later, on cross-examination, he conceded that all that Hy-Vee was interested in was saving money and that the idea of opening a warehouse in Iowa came from Jaydon. Throughout his testimony, Gellerman generally was evasive, argumentative, and internally contradictory. I place little reliance on the testimony he gave, especially when it conflicts with other evidence in the record.

> fied us that in order to remain as their supplier we must fill orders at a location close to their warehouse in Iowa where the goods can be picked up by their trucks on a backhaul basis and delivered to their stores along with groceries they already deliver. They also intend to take over all in-store service and pricing of non-food merchandise.
> This particular chain, as well as other independent customers, contends, and they are right, that if we limit our services we can sell merchandise to them at a much lower price
> These customers state that if we cannot make the changes immediately, they will establish their own warehouse and eliminate Jaydon as their non-food supplier. To permit this to happen would be a serious blow to Jaydon and all of its employees. We are contemplating compliance with this request. We will have to make a substantial investment in a new warehouse and scale down our Rock Island operation. We could maintain our position and try to replace this lost business.
>
> The changes will result in the elimination of the night shift and approximately 15 to 20 other employees in the bargaining unit.
> If you desire to discuss this matter, please notify me as soon as possible. I am delivering a copy of this letter to the president of the local unit.

Maddox and the other union representatives were stunned by this letter and asked to have a brief caucus. When they returned, one of them asked Gellerman who the principal customer was that he referred to in the letter. Gellerman declined to mention a name but simply stated that everyone knew who it was. Gellerman was asked whether the decision to relocate a portion of the Rock Island operation was final and he replied that the decision was not final and that he would be willing to talk about it. He was also asked where the new warehouse would be. He replied that he did not know, saying they were still looking for a place and had not executed a lease, but it would be somewhere in the middle west.[10] I credit Maddox's testimony that he reminded Gellerman of his obligation under the contract to keep working in Rock Island. Maddox began to ask what it would take to keep the Respondent in Rock Island. Gellerman replied that relocating was not something the Company wanted to do but was something its customer was demanding that it do. The parties agreed to meet again on August 3 to discuss the matter further.

Shortly thereafter, the Union sent out a notice to its members, stating that the Respondent was planning to move a part of its operations to another State, perhaps in the early fall. It stated in the notice that the question would be discussed further at an upcoming union meeting on July 18.

On July 15, Maddox replied to Gellerman's letter of the previous day, stating that the Union would be prepared to discuss "this matter" with the Respondent at the meeting already planned for August 3. Maddox stated further, "When you have more detailed information, if you would send it to me, the Union would be in a better position to discuss the details, and offer any suggestions we might have."

On July 19, a newspaper article appeared in The Argus, a daily newspaper circulated in the Rock Island area, which stated:

> Jaydon, Inc., in Rock Island, is considering moving a portion of its operations to Iowa, a move that could cost the city up to 50 jobs.
> Jaydon vice president Jay Gellerman said the company notified employees of the possible move last week. "Nothing is a sure thing. We are just trying to give them advance warning on the thing," Gellerman said.
> Gellerman said the move was being considered because of "Changing business conditions" and a desire to move operations closer to Jaydon customers in other areas. He said he did not know where in Iowa the company might locate.
>
> The plans will probably be discussed at an August 3 meeting between Gellerman and United Auto Workers Local 2137, which represents Jaydon workers.
> The 50 jobs which could be affected include the entire night shift of 35 workers, and 15 to 20 others, according to Gellerman.
> Jaydon is a distributing company that delivers non-food items such as health and beauty aids and housewares to supermarkets, grocery stores, and convenience stores. Jaydon currently employs about 220 people at the Rock Island facility.

While Gellerman was in the process of telling the Union and the press that he did not know where the new facility might be located, his attorney was putting the finishing touches on the lease of the Ebcor Building in Atlantic. By letter of July 21, Portes informed the landlord's attorney of his agreement or disagreement with certain minor items contained in the second draft of a proposed lease. Portes' letter to the landlord, dated July 21, recited that some of Jaydon's employees had visited the premises and were concerned that the burglar alarm system be repaired, that certain leaks in the northeast corner of the building be repaired, and that the parking lot be regraveled. By letter of July 29, the landlord agreed to make certain requested repairs and signaled its agreement to most of Portes' other comments. In a further letter, of July 30, Portes told the landlord that he would be in Rock Island on August 3 and 4 and indicated that, if the landlord could get the revised lease to Rock Island prior to that time, Portes could review it and get it signed during his visit. The lease in final form was signed on August 3 by the landlord and on August 6 by Jaydon.

On July 26, 1982, Gellerman wrote another letter to Maddox. Addressing him as "Dear Jim," Gellerman purported to recapitulate the July 14 meeting by saying that he had informed the union representatives on that date that "in order to retain our largest customer it would be necessary to change our method of operation and such a change could involve a reduction in personnel in jobs both outside and within the bargaining unit represented by your union." The letter went on to state:

[10] Personnel Director Kendall Kelly testified that he had learned from Operations Director Dennis Calver prior to the July 14 meeting that the relocation was definite.

> As you can well understand, it is most difficult to predict the exact number of employees that will be involved. Our best estimate at this time is as follows:
> 1. Approximately 20 salesmen-drivers delivering merchandise to these stores will be terminated and there will be additional terminations as a result of the consolidation and restructure of our field operations.
>
> 2. Approximately 8 to 10 sales supervisors will be eliminated and those remaining will be required to undertake substantially increased duties.
>
> 3. All deliveries of health and beauty aids from Rock Island to the drop points serving these stores will be eliminated. Our best estimate at this time is that this will require:
>
> (a) The termination of the night shift operation in the Rock Island warehouse involving approximately 55 employees;
> (b) An estimated 3 to 5 truck drivers who, in the past, have delivered merchandise to the drop points serving these stores; and
> (c) An estimated 5 to 10 employees on the day shift in the Rock Island warehouse.
>
> You must understand that except with respect to the night shift in the Rock Island warehouse, the exact number of employees in the bargaining unit that will be affected cannot now be stated with certainty.
>
> As I indicated at the meeting we will negotiate with you in connection with the affect [sic] of this change of our operations on the bargaining unit including:
> (a) Your right to represent the employees at the new warehouse.
> (b) The transfer rights of employees at the Rock Island plant whose employment is terminated.
> If you have any specific proposals to present, I would appreciate it if you would send me a copy prior to our scheduled meeting on August 3.

Despite the fact that negotiations for the lease of the Atlantic warehouse were in their final stages, the identity or location of the warehouse had yet to be disclosed to the Union.

At the August 3 meeting, Gellerman used a blackboard to illustrate certain points he wished to get across to the union representatives. He said that the Company's largest customer was demanding that it move and that it would move if it could not change the customer's mind. He told the assembled group that Jaydon's competitors had been using satellite warehouses for years, that Jaydon's competitors were beginning to squeeze it, and that they felt that they could pick up new business if they had a warehouse elsewhere. There is a conflict in the testimony as to whether Gellerman disclosed the situs of the new warehouse at this meeting. Some say he mentioned Atlantic, others say that he was still talking about the possibility of opening a warehouse in Chariton, Iowa, the headquarters of Hy-Vee. There is also disagreement as to whether Gellerman stated at this meeting that the move was definite or still tentative. The Union expressed the desire to represent any employees hired at the new warehouse and to extend the contract to cover them. It also made inquiry as to what benefits would be paid to laid-off employees as part of their termination benefits. At this meeting, a discussion arose about whether concessions in the current contract could induce the Respondent to stay at Rock Island. Gellerman replied that the Company was not talking about concessions. It was telling the Union what was going to happen.[11]

On August 11, Maddox wrote to Gellerman as follows:

> This letter is a follow up of our meeting with you on 3 August 1982 and to list for you items which we should discuss at our meeting on August 25th.
>
> As to our conversation at the August 3rd meeting, the Union is willing to sit down and discuss and work out a reasonable solution, if possible, to prevent such a reduction in the work force at the Rock Island location, and if the decision has been anchored in cement to relocate part of your operation in another state, we feel you have an obligation to the employees affected to work out an orderly transfer of the work and personnel.
> Jay, as you stated in your letter dated 26 July 1982, you were willing to negotiate our right to represent the employees at a possible new location and we should work out the necessary details to accomplish that, which would expedite things and the affected bargaining unit employees should be given preference. We also need to work out details to cover affected employee on insurance coverage.
> I would hope we could work out a reasonable solution during these troubled times without going into more detailed information that our actuary would require, e.g. financial status, the need for such move based on cost saving, breakdown of labor cost and supervisory and other non labor wages and benefits.

On August 16, 1982, Gellerman replied:

> On the basis of our discussion at the August 3rd meeting, Jaydon signed a lease for a warehouse in Atlantic, Iowa and made and is continuing to make commitments with respect to relocating part of its operations in order to be able to serve its customers.

[11] Some witnesses place this remark at the first meeting in July, but I believe the preponderance of credible evidence establishes that it was made at the August 3 meeting. However, the tenor of the ensuing correspondence between Maddox and Gellerman on August 11 and 16 supports the view, and I find, that Gellerman did not disclose the location of the new operation to the Union until August 16.

In line with your letter of August 11, I wholeheartedly agree that Jaydon has an obligation to the employees affected by the partial change in the manner and method of our operations to negotiate with your Union in a good faith effort to work out the problems raised by that change in our operations.

To repeat our statement at the August 3rd meeting, we will be prepared on August 25th to discuss any and all matters relating to the effects of the change in our operations, including those items listed in your last letter and those previously raised in the August 3rd meeting. In order to facilitate our discussion at the next meeting, I can give you an idea of Jaydon's position with respect to a number of these issues.

First, regarding recognition of your union as the representative of the employees at the new location, it is our belief that we may not do so at this time without violating the law. We have not in the past, and we will not in the future interfere with the right of our employees freely to determine who, if anyone, will represent them in respect to the terms and conditions of their employment. It seems obvious to me that we would interfere with those rights by now recognizing the UAW or any other union for the new bargaining unit without an election. That is particularly true since a full complement of workers has not yet been hired for the new warehouse.

Second, employees at the Rock Island Plant who are to be laid off will have the choice of

1. remaining on the seniority list with right to recall and other rights and obligations as provided in our Agreement, or

2. terminating their employment with Jaydon at the Rock Island Plant which will result in their permanent removal from the Rock Island seniority list. Such termination will constitute a release of all of their rights under our Agreement except those agreed upon for such terminated employees.

3. All employees who do not elect termination in writing will be deemed to have been laid off with continuing seniority and other rights and obligations under our Agreement.

Third, we will offer all terminated employees jobs at the new warehouse if application is made for those jobs within a time to be agreed upon. We plan on starting operations at the new warehouse at the end of September or early in October. The new warehouse will not be automated so some training will be necessary for these terminated employees. Therefore, the employees who apply for jobs at the new warehouse must be prepared to report for work prior to that time. We can discuss and fix that date. The jobs will be at the rates stated in our last meeting.

Fourth, other provisions for terminated employees will be as follows:

1. They will receive prorated

a. vacation pay
b. personal leave time.

2. They will continue to be covered under the insurance plan provided in our agreement for a period of 30 days after the end of the month in which their termination occurs.

3. They can apply for their benefits under the Profit Sharing Plan.

Fifth, the same provisions will apply to Rock Island employees who are laid off during the balance of the transitional period.

On August 25, the parties met again at the Sheraton Hotel in Rock Island. At this meeting, the Union brought up the problem of whether laid-off Rock Island employees would be allowed to transfer to the new warehouse and under what conditions. It also inquired as to what would become of certain fringe benefits accruing under the contract to laid-off employees, namely, excused leave and vacation benefits. Prior to that time, the Union had received a list of the names and classification of 64 Rock Island employees who would be laid off.[12] The Union asked the Respondent to post this list the following day and to give anyone desiring to bump a junior employee an opportunity to do so.

Company Attorney Portes informed the union representatives that employees who were slated for layoff would be given a letter in which they would be given the opportunity either to accept a layoff and retain their right of recall or terminate their employment. Those who elected to resign would receive unused vacation pay and leave time and be continued under the health insurance program until November 30, 1982. Any employee wishing to transfer to Atlantic would first have to resign in order to be considered for a job. Only those employees who elected to resign and not to apply for a job at Atlantic would receive a distribution of their vested interest in the Jaydon profit trust. Presumably any employee who elected to remain subject to recall on the seniority list would receive nothing. Maddox asked Portes for recognition of the Union at the Atlantic plant. Portes declined, telling Maddox that the Company would not recognize the Union at this facility unless it first won a Board election.

After recessing for lunch, Maddox proposed, among other things, that Rock Island employees who were being laid off and who signified an interest in relocating should be put on a preferential hiring list at Atlantic. He also proposed that transferred employees would not have contractual recall rights at Rock Island but would retain their dates of hire in establishing their seniority at Atlantic, and that laid-off employees would be paid accrued personal leave time, vacation time, and a Christmas bonus, as well as a continuation of health insurance for a period of 30 days following the end of the month in which they were laid off. The Union asked for certain information concerning supervisory employees to be transferred and for an outline of the work which would be affected by the transfer. It asked for a moving allowance to be paid to any employee who wished to be relocated. Again Maddox asked for recognition as the collective-bargaining representative of the production, maintenance, and truckdriver employees employed at the Atlantic warehouse.

The Respondent agreed that Rock Island employees who wanted to transfer would be put on a preferential hiring list and that those who transferred would not have recall rights at Rock Island. However, it would not agree flatly to transfer anyone who resigned and asked for a transfer. It was noncommittal about letting transferred employees carry with them their original dates of hire for seniority purposes. It refused to provide the Union with an up-to-date list of affected work, reiterated its refusal to recognize the Union as the bargaining agent at Atlantic, and refused the request for a moving allowance for transferred employees. It agreed to give all laid-off employees prorated vacation pay but was not sure about whether they would receive a Christmas bonus. (Later the latter request was denied.) Gellerman informed Maddox that five supervisors would be affected by the transfer, but that four would return to the Rock Island bargaining unit.

The Respondent also informed the Union as to the wage scale at Atlantic. Puller/stockers would receive the minimum wage of $3.35 an hour, forklift drivers would receive about $4 an hour, and truckdrivers would get $5.50 an hour. These amounts were about 40 percent of what employees were receiving at Rock Island under the contract for comparable work.[13]

On the following day, Kelly sent a letter to each employee slated for layoff and told him or her of the options which were open. The letter also informed employees of the Atlantic wage scale. The letter was accompanied by forms to be signed by any employee who elected to forfeit rights under the union agreement and to request a transfer to Atlantic. Not surprisingly, no employee in the Rock Island unit signified any interest in taking a 60-percent wage cut and relocating to a strange city without the assistance of a moving allowance.

On August 27, Portes forwarded to Maddox a lengthy letter containing a draft of a proposed agreement relating to the transfer of work from Rock Island to Alantic. The proposal incorporated most of the transfer procedures and requirements outlined by Portes and Gellerman on August 25 and, in effect, signaled the Union's consent to the move. The proposal was never signed by the Union.

On September 1, the Respondent granted pay increases to the Rock Island unit employees in accordance with the terms of the existing contract. On October 4, the employees designated for layoff were in fact laid off, although one was subsequently recalled. In February 1983 four additional employees were laid off as a result of the transfer.

The Rock Island facility is largely automated while the Atlantic facility is not. About six pieces of machinery at the Rock Island plant were dismantled and trucked to Atlantic, where they were installed. No new equipment was purchased to start up the Atlantic operation, although some new equipment was leased. The estimated cost of the relocation of machinery was $10,000. The Atlantic warehouse began to operate on October 4 with new inventory shipped directly to Atlantic from manufacturers. No inventory was transferred from Rock Island to Atlantic. Originally the Respondent estimated that it would hire about 50–55 employees at Atlantic. In the year which has elapsed since the opening of the warehouse, about 70 have been hired, some of whom are part-time employees. Six truckdrivers were hired to replace the six drivers who were laid off at Rock Island, and warehouse delivery routes were revised with Atlantic as their hub rather than Rock Island. The administrative control and support for the Atlantic warehouse remains in Rock Island. Orders to be filled at that facility are transmitted from Rock Island pursuant to orders which are phoned in by driver salesmen who are on the road.

In December 1982, the Union and the Respondent began negotiations for a new contract at Rock Island. As of December 1983, no contract had been concluded. Both sides insisted on substantial changes in language growing out of their experience with the Atlantic move. In the early spring of 1983, the Respondent notified the Union that it was seriously considering the establishment of a second satellite warehouse at Elkhart, Indiana, and it made no bones about the fact that the motivating factor in this proposed move was a savings in labor costs. In the spring of 1983, this warehouse was established to service accounts in the Indiana-eastern Illinois area. Just before the contract expired on February 28, the parties agreed to an extension until March 9. When the extension expired, the Union struck. The strike was short lived. When unit employees returned to work, it was at substantially reduced wage rates which were unilaterally imposed. Later, in the fall of 1983, when the bargaining unit had been further reduced from the original 230 employees to about 95, the Respondent further cut wages unilaterally to a point where its rates in Rock Island were roughly comparable to what it was paying in Atlantic.

[13] The union contract provided for 16 different classifications of employees and for in-grade raises after 3, 6, and 9 months of service. It also provided for increases in the hourly rates for all employees as of September 1, 1982. These increases were in fact granted as required by the agreement. A comparison between some of the September 1982 hourly wage rates for employees with 9 or more months of service and the new rates in Atlantic is as follows:

Rock Island
General warehouse	$10.81
Order picker, stocker, loader checker	9.54
Receiving clerk	10.81
Truckdriver	12.88
Atlantic
Order filler, etc.	$3.35
Forklift operator, receiving/shipping	4.00
Truckdriver	5.50

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Present Posture of the Case

The events in this case occurred and the complaint in this case was issued at a time when the Board adhered to the doctrine announced in Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982) (Milwaukee Spring I), and earlier cases. According to this view of the law, a relocation of unit work during a contract term, without the permission of the collective-bargaining representative, was a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. After the hearing in this case was closed but before briefs were filed, the Board reversed Milwaukee Spring I at 268 NLRB 601 (1984) (Milwaukee Spring II). As discussed in more detail infra, Milwaukee Spring II holds that such relocations are not violations of the Act in the absence of contract language expressly forbidding such moves. In light of Milwaukee Spring II, both the Respondent and the General Counsel moved to dismiss the complaint over the strenuous objection of the Charging Party. As a result of the change of law, this case is now in the peculiar procedural posture in which the General Counsel and the Respondent find themselves on the same side, while the Charging Party is left to carry on the complaint as it was originally issued.

The duty of the Board and its administrative law judge in the face of this procedural anomaly is governed by the Third Circuit decision in Leeds & Northrup Co. v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 527 (3d Cir. 1966), and similar cases. Leeds & Northrup recognizes the fact that the General Counsel has plenary power to dismiss an unfair labor practice charge and that, once a charge is dismissed, no power on earth can force him to issue a complaint. However, after a complaint issues, other rules come into play.

> Clearly, once a complaint issues the statutory scheme contemplates Board action. Anything less, such as informal actions of its agents in dismissing such complaint over the objection of the charging party, is arbitrary and capricious. . . .
> . . . Once a complaint has issued, the charging party is entitled to an evidentiary hearing upon its objections to the proposed settlement agreement, be it formal or informal. [Id. at 533–534.]

If the settlement of issues raised in a complaint is entitled to full dress treatment, so much more so is an effort to dismiss or withdraw the complaint in its entirety.

> Under the prosecutory phase of Section 3(d) of the Act, the delegation of discretion to issue or not issue a complaint of unfair labor practice is not improper. But once issued, an adjudicatory phase of the administrative process arises necessitating appropriate avenues of review, both administrative and judicial. The Board, by its own regulations, designed to implement the Labor Management Relations Act, cannot thwart review of its actions, or those of its authorized agents. [Id. at 536.]

The Board's own Rules and Regulations do not thwart review of its actions or those of its authorized agents. They make it clear that such actions may not be taken in summary fashion. The Board has also made it clear in its decisional process that summary dismissals of complaints over the objection of the General Counsel or charging party are contrary to its Rules. See Plumbers Local 195 (Stone & Webster), 237 NLRB 931 (1978). In light of its objections to a dismissal or withdrawal of the complaint, the Charging Party has now become the de facto prosecutor of the complaint, so a regular decision must be prepared and issued by me pursuant to Section 102.45 of the Board's Rules and Regulations,[14] just as if no motions had been filed. However, it must perforce be governed by the Board's revised doctrine in Milwaukee Spring II.

B. Waiver and Limitations

Both the Charging Party and the Respondent have submitted extensive briefs covering a number of issues which were raised at the hearing in this case. Two of these concern whether the Charging Party waived its statutory rights by failing to object to the relocation of the work from Rock Island to Atlantic and whether the complaint in this case is barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. Both of these contentions imply, for their major predicate, that the contract in effect in the summer and fall of 1982 forbade the transfer of unit work during the contract term and so must be resolved in that light.

The essence of the violation alleged in the complaint is that the relocation of unit work violated Section 8(d) of the Act. This section, in discussing the duty to bargain, provides inter alia that:

> . . . the duties so imposed shall not be construed as requiring either party to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions contained in a contract for a fixed period, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract.

Its terms place the parties in a considerably different posture than if there was open season for bargaining in August and September 1982 and the question of relocation was then bargainable. The Respondent argues that, by its failure to object to the relocation when the subject was first brought to its attention, the Union waived any right to object at a later date and therefore the General Counsel was precluded by waiver or laches from prosecuting a complaint on the Union's behalf. If the relationship of the parties at that time was not controlled by their contract, this argument might have some vitality. However, the thrust of Section 8(d) is that, during a contract term, a party to the contract has no obligation even to respond to overtures for modification. A contracting party is well within its rights simply to stand pat and rely on the provisions of the contract to protect its position.

[14] Sec. 102.45(a) of the Board's Rules provides:

After hearing for the purpose of taking evidence upon a complaint, the administrative law judge shall prepare a decision. Such decision shall contain findings of fact, conclusions, and the reasons or basis therefor, upon all material issues of fact, law, or discretion presented on the record, and shall contain recommendation as to what disposition of the case should be made, which may include, if it be found that the respondent has engaged in or is engaging in the alleged unfair labor practices, a recommendation for such affirmative action by the respondent as will effectuate the policies of the Act. The administrative law judge shall file the original of his decision with the Board and cause a copy thereof to be served on each of the parties. Upon the filing of the decision, the Board shall enter an order transferring the case to the Board and shall serve copies of the order, setting forth the date of such transfer, on all the parties.

As a general proposition, the waiver of a right will not be found in the absence of clear and unambiguous evidence to that effect. This venerable doctrine was recently reiterated by the Supreme Court in Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983). There are many other and earlier Board cases to the same effect. In Park-Ohio Industries, 257 NLRB 413 (1981), the Board held that bargaining over severance pay does not constitute a waiver by a union of its right to be consulted in advance about a corporate decision to relocate unit work. In National Car Rental System, 252 NLRB 159 (1980), the Board held that it would not imply the waiver of the right to bargain over the effects of work transfer from the failure of a union to request bargaining after the union had learned that the transfer was a fait accompli. See also Armour Oil Co., 253 NLRB 1104 (1981).[15] However, all of these cases start with the initial premise that the right assertedly waived was ripe for bargaining at the time that silence presumably gave consent.

In this case, the law at the time of the events in question made it quite clear that the question of relocation of unit work during the contract term was foreclosed from bargaining, and thus from modification, because it had been preempted by a term of the contract there and then in effect. It is certainly possible to waive the provision of a written contract but such a waiver should be attended by at least the same formality as the execution of the contract itself. Portes presented Maddox with such a written document on August 27 and Maddox refused to sign it. He should not be deemed to have waived a contract provision, if indeed there was one, by bargaining over the effects of the proposed move since he was presented with a fait accompli, namely, information that the move was going to take place and would occur before the contract expired, regardless of what Maddox did or thought about it. Accordingly, I would dismiss any argument that in fact Maddox waived the Union's contract right by any act or omissions which occurred prior to the work relocation on October 4, if indeed the Union had any such right.[16]

Another argument pressed by the Respondent is the contention that the complaint herein is barred by limitations because the charge was not filed by the Union until Febuary 9, 1983, and was not served on the Respondent until February 11. In its view, any violations of the Act on its part occurred before August 11, a date 6 months prior to the service of the charge, because it had notified the Union prior to that date that it was going to move part of the Rock Island work to Atlantic. The factual premise for this argument is highly questionable but it is also irrelevant to the 8(d) violation alleged in the complaint. The violation in this case occurred, if it occurred at all,[17] when the Respondent modified the terms of an existing collective-bargaining agreement during the contract term, and this did not occur, if it occurred at all, until about October 4 when unit work was in fact transferred from Rock Island to Atlantic and 63 employees at Rock Island lost their jobs. This date fell well within the 10(b) period.

C. Respondent's Motive for Relocating Unit Work to Atlantic

Respondent went to great lengths, both at the hearing and in its brief, to demonstrate that the purpose for relocating unit work from Rock Island to Atlantic was not to escape Rock Island contract rates, which were more than twice what it is paying in Atlantic, but merely to serve its major Iowa customer, Hy-Vee, who was pressing it for price concessions. Thus, the Respondent argues, the relocation did not even violate Milwaukee Spring I or the Board doctrine affirmed in Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., 235 NLRB 720 (1978), enfd. 602 F.2d 1302 (9th Cir. 1979). According to the Respondent, it was threatened with the loss of a customer who provided two-sevenths of its gross revenue and most of its regular cash flow, so it had to establish a warehouse in western Iowa from which it could reduce its transportation costs and service its needs. In the stated view of the Respondent, its very future depended on relocating unit work to the Atlantic warehouse. Labor savings were at best a questionable and ancillary consideration and played no significant role in the decision to transfer work. The argument is gross hyperbole and depends for its factual basis on the testimony of a witness whose credibility was poor.[18]

For 20 years, Jaydon has been the wholesale supplier of nonfood items for 148 Hy-Vee grocery and drug stores. All that Hy-Vee was asking Jaydon for in the [15] The cases normally speak in terms of waiver. The doctrine of laches mentioned by the Respondent in its brief does not apply to Board proceedings because the General Counsel does not prosecute a case on behalf of the charging party but on behalf of the general public. Southeastern Envelope Co., 246 NLRB 423 (1979); Merrell M. Williams, 265 NLRB 506 (1982).

[16] One of the Respondent's several waiver arguments is that Maddox failed to write the Company a letter objecting to the work relocation, as suggested by the UAW's handbook on plant closings. If Sec. 8(d) means anything, it means that Maddox had no obligation even to speak to the Respondent on this subject prior to the expiration of the contract, at least as to relocations scheduled to take place before the expiration date.

[17] The complaint does not allege, nor are we confronted in this case, with the alternative argument that, even though Milwaukee Spring II permits the Respondent to do what it did under the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondent still violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by its failure to notify and bargain in good faith with the Union concerning an issue not precluded by contract from ongoing negotiations, namely, work relocation.

[18] Gellerman testified at the hearing that, as of his July 13 meeting with Hy-Vee, the decision to relocate to Atlantic was final. Others in the company hierarchy testified that they had learned of the decision even earlier. On July 14, in his meeting with the Union, Gellerman told the union representatives that the decision was still tentative and that he did not know exactly where the Company might move, if it were to move. Five days later, Gellerman informed the Rock Island Argus newspaper that the decision was still uncertain, as was the site of the new warehouse. At the hearing, Gellerman justified lying to the press on the basis that the question of the relocation of work was none of its business. Doubtless he had similar rationalizations for other untruthful statements made to the Union and to the Board.

spring of 1982 were price concessions of an unspecified amount which could be met in a variety of ways, including a reduction in the type of service rendered to the various Hy-Vee locations and a suggested joint venture in the operation of a warehouse at Chariton, Iowa. At no time did Hy-Vee request or insist that Jaydon open a warehouse in Iowa, nor did Hy-Vee ever threaten to discontinue doing business with Jaydon. Opening the Atlantic warehouse was Jaydon's idea. The Respondent broached this suggestion to Hy-Vee early in its negotiations with the latter and told Hy-Vee that it had found a warehouse in Atlantic which it could operate for one-half the labor cost it was bearing in Rock Island.

In fact, the major cost-savings experienced by Jaydon in the first year of the operation of the Atlantic warehouse was the labor cost savings achieved by paying its newly hired Atlantic employees about 40 percent of the contract rate it was paying in Rock Island. Had Jaydon applied to the Atlantic warehouse the contract rates in effect at Rock Island, the relocation would have cost more in total expenditures than it would have cost the Respondent to continue to service Hy-Vee from Rock Island.

One other facet of this whole operation must be considered in order to place the Atlantic relocation in proper focus. The transfer of about one-third of the Rock Island warehouse work to another warehouse located in the western portion of Jaydon's marketing area did not take place in isolation from other changes in the Respondent's operation which took place within a year from the date the Atlantic warehouse was opened. Shortly after the Atlantic warehouse opened, Jaydon opened another warehouse at the eastern end of its marketing area at Elkhart, Indiana. There is no dispute in the record that a prime consideration for opening the Elkhart warehouse was to escape the wage rates paid at Rock Island. Contemporaneously with the establishment of the Elkart warehouse, the contract at Rock Island expired and the Company began reducing the wage rates at the decimated Rock Island unit by increments. At first, it offered returning strikers at Rock Island 10 percent less than what they were receiving when they walked out. In the summer, as fruitless negotiations continued with a much weakened bargaining representative, wages were further reduced unilaterally in the Rock Island unit. By the fall of 1983, the 95-member unit which was left at Rock Island was offered and was paid a rate which brought it into line with Atlantic and Elkhart rates, and which provided it with about 40 percent of the income which a 230-member unit was earning a year before. While this rapid deterioration in wage rates and union bargaining strength at Rock Island following relocation of work to Atlantic and Elkhart might not be sufficient to suggest a runaway shop 8(a)(3) violation, these events, following hard on the establishment of the two satellite warehouses, make it crystal clear that the opening of the Atlantic facility, at issue in this case, was merely step 1 in a three-step process aimed at escaping the contract wage rates which were in effect at Rock Island from 1980 until the spring of 1983. As such, the facts of this case bring it squarely within the factual bases underlying Milwaukee Spring I and II and Los Angeles Marine.

D. The Effect of Milwaukee Spring II

The Charging Party argues in its brief that Milwaukee Spring II is an incorrect statement of the law and that the rule contained therein should not be applied retroactively. Unfortunately for the Charging Party, the rule established by Milwaukee Spring II and announced by the Board on January 23, 1984, is current Board law and was applied by the Board retroactively in that case. Accordingly, the Charging Party's argument in this regard is simply misdirected. In light of the decision announced in Milwaukee Spring II, I have no alternative but to dismiss so much of the complaint that alleges that the Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

E. Conditioning Relocation upon Repudiation of Contract Rights

One final aspect of the complaint must be addressed apart from the Milwaukee Spring issue. The complaint alleges that, on August 26, 1983, the Respondent notified bargaining unit employees that they would be allowed to transfer from Rock Island to Atlantic but only on abandoning and repudiating the contractual rights which they enjoyed at Rock Island. In the complaint, the General Counsel alleged that this is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, although his later motion to dismiss includes this incidental element in the complaint as well.

The letter in question was actually sent by the Respondent's personnel director and stated as follows:

> We are sorry to notify you that you will be laid off at the end of the Sunday, October 3, 1982, shift. We hope you understand that this was caused by a change in the Company's method of operations that was necessary in order to be able to serve its customers.
> You and the other employees being laid off as of October 3, 1982, will have the choice of:
> 1. remaining on the seniority list for the Rock Island facility with the right to recall and all other rights and subject to all obligations of employees in the bargaining unit covered by our Collective Bargaining Agreement (Union Agreement) dated April 1, 1980 with the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, and its affiliated Local Union Number 2137 ("Union"), or
> 2. electing to forfeit all of your rights of every kind, nature, and description in, to and under the Union Agreement including your removal from the seniority list for Rock Island employees and your right to recall under the Union Agreement.
>
> ONLY employees who elect to forfeit their rights under the Union Agreement as hereinafter provided will
> 1. receive the following, all of which will be prorated through October 3, 1982:
>
> a. Unpaid vacation pay.
> b. Unused personal leave time.

2. be continued under the insurance program provided under the Union Agreement for the period ending November 30, 1982, provided that you continue to pay the portion of the insurance cost required to be paid by you under the Union Agreement, and

3. have the right to transfer to a job at the new Jaydon facility in Atlantic, Iowa, at the time and in the manner hereinafter provided.

IF YOU DO NOT ELECT TO FORFEIT YOUR RIGHTS IN WRITING, YOU WILL AUTOMATICALLY BE DEEMED TO HAVE BEEN LAID OFF AND YOU WILL CONTINUE ON THE ROCK ISLAND FACILITY SENIORITY LIST WITH RIGHT OF RECALL UNDER THE UNION AGREEMENT.

If you elect to forfeit your rights as an employee at the Jaydon facility AND you do not exercise your right to transfer to a job at the new Jaydon facility at Atlantic, Iowa, then you can apply for your vested interest in the Jaydon of Illinois Employees' Profit Sharing Trust.

Attached hereto are two (2) copies of the following:

1. Election to FORFEIT Rights under Union Agreement.

2. Request for Transfer to Job at Jaydon Facility at Atlantic, Iowa.

3. Instructions.

If you want to elect to forfeit your rights under the Union Agreement and if you want to request a transfer to a job in Atlantic, Iowa, PLEASE READ THE INSTRUCTIONS, fill out the required forms, sign and date them and turn them into the Personnel Office on or before the time indicated.

The letter in question was sent on the day after these matters were discussed at the negotiating session which took place at the Rock Island Sheraton. The complaint does not allege that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by dealing directly with bargaining unit employees or that it unlawfully implemented a change in wages, hours, and conditions of employment before bargaining to impasse. The allegation in question simply states that the contents of the letter contain a condition which violates the Section 7 rights of employees. No pertinent authority was presented to substantiate this contention and I am unable to find any. I know of no legal proposition that states that employees have a statutory right to follow bargaining unit work that is being relocated to another bargaining unit. All that the Respondent did in this letter was to implement the matters discussed and agreed to, albeit in part, at the negotiating session the preceding day. The fact that employees who were about to be laid off were presented with unhappy choices does not mean that they were presented with choices that were illegally imposed. Accordingly, I will recommend that paragraph 6 of the complaint be dismissed.

On the above findings of fact and on the entire record herein considered as a whole, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Jaydon, Inc. is now, and at all times material herein has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of American (UAW) and its Local 2137 are, respectively, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent did not commit the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint herein.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[19]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

---

[19] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

The Stroh Brewery Company a/k/a Joseph Schlitz Company and Thomas L. Reynolds. Case 11–CA–10906

23 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBER HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 20 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Steven M. Charno issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STEVEN M. CHARNO, Administrative Law Judge. In response to a charge filed May 31, 1983, a complaint was issued on August 2, 1983, alleging that The Stroh Brewery Company a/k/a Joseph Schlitz Brewing Company[1] (Respondent) had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, by discharging its employee Thomas L. Reynolds. Respondent's answer denies the commission of any unfair labor practice.

A hearing was held before me at Winston-Salem, North Carolina, on October 17, 18, and 19, 1983.[2] Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent under due date of November 23, 1983. By unopposed motion dated July 2, 1984, Respondent seeks to reopen the record in this case in order to offer into evidence certain relevant documents; that motion will be granted and the documents received in evidence.[3]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a corporation licensed to do business in North Carolina, which is engaged in the production of beer at a facility in Winston-Salem. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business within North Carolina, received goods valued in excess of $50,000 from points outside the State and shipped products valued in excess of $50,000 to points outside the State. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers Local Union No. 391, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union) is admitted to be, and I find is, a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

On November 24, 1982, Reynolds was suspended indefinitely pending a hearing concerning acts of insubordination which he had allegedly committed on that date. After a hearing before the joint labor-management multiplant grievance committee, and a deadlocked decision by that committee, Respondent discharged Reynolds for insubordination and another pending charge—excessive absenteeism. The Union grieved Respondent's action. Pursuant to article VII, section 2, of the collective-bargaining agreement then in effect between Respondent and the Union, the grievance was submitted to binding arbitration. On February 23, 1983, a formal hearing was held before Arbitrator Herbert V. Rollins at which Respondent and the Union were represented by counsel and a formal evidentiary record was compiled.

A. The Arbitrator's Decision

On June 2, 1983, the arbitrator issued a decision directed to a single issue: Was there just cause to discharge the grievant for excessive absenteeism and/or insubordination?[4] The findings set forth below were taken from the arbitrator's decision.

Prior to his discharge, Reynolds had been employed for 14 years by Respondent at its Winston-Salem plant as an electrician and had never been faulted for his work in that capacity. In addition to his duties as an electrician, he had at various times, including the period from April 1982 until his discharge, been the Union's chief steward at the plant and had shown himself to be "an extremely able union representative."

The collective-bargaining agreement in effect between Respondent and the Union authorizes stewards to spend "necessary" time performing union duties, which are identified as investigating grievances, conferring with supervisors, and filing formal written grievances. The agreement further authorizes the chief steward to "investigate, present and process grievances on the company property without loss of time or pay during regular working hours."

[1] The Respondent was incorrectly identified in the complaint as "Jos. Schlitz Brewing Company." Pursuant to Respondent's unopposed motion at the hearing, the complaint and caption were amended to reflect Respondent's correct name.

[2] The General Counsel's unopposed motion to correct the transcript is granted; transcript corrections appear in the appendix. [The appendix has been omitted from publication.]

[3] The supplemental award dated May 15, 1984, in Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co., Nos. 1737 WST and 1738 WST, is identified as R. Exh. 10; the opinion and order in Chauffeurs, Teamsters, and Helpers Local 391 v. The Stroh Brewery Co., No. C–83–698–G (M.D.N.C., filed Apr. 11, 1984), as R. Exh. 11. The remaining documents appended to the motion were received in evidence at the hearing as part of R. Exh. 5.

[4] The arbitrator found that, since Respondent had initially treated Reynolds leniently under its program of progressive discipline for absenteeism, it could not thereafter bring him to book for absences it had previously failed to take into account. Accordingly, the arbitrator concluded that discharge constituted excessive discipline for Reynolds' demonstrated absenteeism.

Prior to his discharge, Reynolds and Respondent had "differences" over the amount of time Reynolds was authorized to spend on union business. While it conceded that the collective-bargaining agreement allowed stewards to spend whatever time was necessary to handle grievances, Respondent was dissatisfied with the fact that Reynolds spent over 92 percent of his time on union business and wanted to monitor and control what it considered to be an abuse of union business time. In order to provide "some sort of time spent on union business," Respondent initiated a form, entitled "Shop Steward Report" in October 1982. The form, which was to be filled out by the steward's supervisor, required information concerning who had requested the steward, who was to be seen, the location of the steward's business, the nature of that business, and the approximate time the steward would be gone. On many occasions, Reynolds made known his objections to the form and referred to the procedure as "chicken shit." When called to a problem in the plant, Reynolds continually insisted that he could not and would not "guesstimate" the amount of time that would be involved.

Arguments concerning use of the form and the amount of time required for union business continued, and Reynolds finally met with James Becknell, the acting plant manager, concerning the matter on November 23, 1982. Reynolds asked that use of the form be discontinued, and Becknell responded that he would discuss it with the then absent plant manager. The following day there was another meeting about the problem between Becknell, Reynolds, and Reynolds' steward, Eddie Hale. At that time, Becknell informed Reynolds that the latter would still be required to furnish the information needed to complete the form.

Shortly after the meeting, Reynolds and Hale were observed working on union business by Reynolds' supervisor, Ted Holcomb. When Holcomb stated that Reynolds' authorized release time of 30 minutes had expired and that he should return to work immediately, Reynolds refused. Holcomb then apprised Harold Mann,[5] the assistant manager of engineering, of the situation. Mann approached Reynolds and asked if the latter was refusing to return to work. Reynolds replied that he would return when he finished his union business, which consisted of writing up notes of the meeting with Becknell. Reynolds eventually returned to the shop but stated that he would have to leave again to conduct further union business. When Reynolds was asked how long he would require to check the grievance box and see stewards, he replied that he did not know who had to be seen or the length of time he would be gone. Because Reynolds would not provide the information required to complete the shop steward form, Holcomb refused to release him. Reynolds called over Hale, and Mann thereafter joined the three in Holcomb's office.

After further discussion about Reynolds' refusal to furnish the information required on the shop steward form, Mann again told Reynolds to return to work. Reynolds replied that he was not refusing to return to work but needed to continue his union business. Reynolds, who was considerably taller and heavier than Mann, became angry, threw his safety glasses on Holcomb's desk, advanced toward Mann "in a belligerent manner" with clenched fists, and stated, "I'm tired of this shit" and "I'm going to do my job as a union representative." Mann, who was concerned with being struck, stepped back and pointed to the timeclock, a sign to punch out. Although it was clear that Mann had raised his hand without any intention of hitting Reynolds, the latter responded, "[D]on't you raise your hands at me or I'll knock you on your ass—you son of a bitch, I'll pop you."

Mann then explained to Reynolds that he was suspended indefinitely and told him to punch out. The order was confirmed with Hale and Reynolds responded that, although he was suspended as an employee, he was a union official and was not going to leave. Mann replied, "Tom, you either leave, or we will get you out of here." Reynolds stated, "[Y]ou better get a bunch, because I'm not leaving." The police were called and, in their presence, Mann repeated his order to leave and Reynolds, his refusal. Finally, the police persuaded Reynolds to leave. As he walked out, Reynolds said, "I'm not leaving because you told me to, I'm leaving because the officers asked me to."

Ultimately, the arbitrator found that (1) Reynolds' refusal to return to work after the meeting with Becknell when ordered to do so by Holcomb was "an intentional act of insubordination," (2) Reynolds' threat to Mann was "a serious act of insubordination," and (3) Reynolds' "misconduct during the meeting constituted further acts of insubordination."[6] Based on these findings, the arbitrator sustained Reynolds' discharge. Because Reynolds has never been faulted for his work as an electrician, because his "major fault was his total disregard for the orderly operation of the plant and his insubordinate conduct while he conducted Union business"[7] and because Reynolds has high blood pressure directly related to his work as a steward, the arbitrator added a proviso that Reynolds be permitted to return to work if he gave up his activities as a steward.[8]

[5] Due to an error by the reporter who prepared the transcript of the arbitration hearing, Mann's name was transcribed as "Mahan."

[6] While noting that he was not required to rule on the question of whether the collective-bargaining agreement had been violated by Respondent's restrictions on the time used by stewards for union business, the institution of the shop steward form, or the requirement that stewards supply information relating to union business, the arbitrator noted that the Union should have grieved the issues if it felt that Respondent was in error—"there was no need to constantly bicker about it."

[7] The arbitrator further described this conduct as numerous "hostile and disruptive" confrontations between Reynolds and Respondent's management in which Reynolds indulged a "propensity to engage in sarcasm, use foul language in a threatening tone of voice, threaten supervisors with physical assault, and refuse reasonable orders."

[8] The ordering paragraph was as follows:

> The company's orders of discharge are sustained with the proviso that the grievant shall have the option, if he so elects, to return to his job solely as an electrician by giving written notice delivered to the company, within 15 days of the date of this award, requesting return to his job solely as an electrician. If grievant elects to exercise this option he shall be reinstated and while so reemployed be permanently enjoined from engaging in any union business or activities of any type in any of the plants, properties, or business locations of the employer or its associated or successor companies. He will not be

B. The Arbitrator's Supplemental Award

On June 14 and 17, 1983, Reynolds attempted to notify Respondent that he wished to return to work, but he did not accept the condition imposed by the arbitrator and agree to give up his union post. Respondent rejected both attempts. On June 21, counsel for Respondent wrote the arbitrator and requested that he reconsider his initial award and sustain the discharge without a proviso offering Reynolds an opportunity to return to work. On June 30 counsel for the Union wrote the arbitrator requesting reformation of the initial award to reinstate Reynolds with full backpay and no restriction on union activity. On July 8 the arbitrator replied to both counsel in a letter which contained the following statement:

> At the hearing before me the record clearly established that Mr. Reynolds had been guilty of misconduct, sufficiently serious to warrant his discharge. Accordingly, I sustain the discharge.

The letter also stated that, in view of Reynolds' position that he would not comply with the award as originally framed (which was described as an attempt to "circumvent my findings and award"), the discharge would be sustained without a proviso allowing Reynolds to return to work. The letter concluded with the following disclaimer: "My decisions were not made with reference to any matter related to the National Labor Relations Act or any provisions thereof."

The Union subsequently brought suit pursuant to Section 301 of the Act in the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina. In that proceeding, the Union sought severance of the portion of the proviso barring Reynolds from engaging in further union activities. In an April 11, 1984 opinion and order, the arbitrator's initial award was found by the district court to be invalid and unenforceable, and it was remanded to the arbitrator "for further proceedings not inconsistent with this Order"; the "second" award in the letter July 8, 1983, was held to be beyond the arbitrator's jurisdiction. On May 15, 1984, the arbitrator issued a supplemental award which sustained Reynolds' discharge without including a proviso permitting his reemployment.

C. Discussion

At the outset of the hearing, Respondent moved that the Board defer to the arbitrator's award. After hearing argument, I denied the motion because "the arbitrator did not specifically consider the conduct which is alleged to be an unfair labor practice." See Raytheon Co., 140 NLRB 888 (1963), enf. denied 326 F.2d 471 (1st Cir. 1964). The question of deferral to the arbitrator's decision was again raised on brief by both Respondent and the General Counsel. Because of intervening decisions by the Board, I believe it appropriate for me to reconsider my earlier ruling and to address the question of deferral at this time.

In Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), the Board held that it would defer to an arbitration award where the proceedings appeared to have been fair and regular, all parties had agreed to be bound by the award, and the decision of the arbitrator was not "clearly repugnant" to the purposes and policies of the Act. No question has been raised as to the fairness or regularity of the proceedings before the arbitrator, and the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union provides that both parties are bound by the award. Accordingly, it must be determined whether the arbitrator's decision, as modified by the supplemental award,[9] is "clearly repugnant" to the Act.

The Board recently clarified the standard for deferral to arbitration awards in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), where it held:

> We would find that an arbitrator has adequately considered the unfair labor practice if (1) the contractual issue is factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue, and (2) the arbitrator was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice. In this respect, differences, if any, between the contractual and statutory standards of review should be weighed by the Board as part of its determination under the Spielberg standards of whether an award is "clearly repugnant" to the Act. And, with regard to the inquiry into the "clearly repugnant" standard, we would not require an arbitrator's award to be totally consistent with Board precedent. Unless the award is "palpably wrong," i.e., unless the arbitrator's decision is not susceptible to an interpretation consistent with Act, we will defer.

Employing these guidelines, I am forced to conclude that the arbitrator adequately considered the unfair labor practice alleged in the complaint, notwithstanding his explicit disclaimer of reliance upon the National Labor Relations Act. The contractual issue before the arbitrator was the ultimate issue before the Board in this proceeding, that is, was Reynolds properly discharged for insubordination? The arbitrator had before him all relevant evidence relating to Reynolds' union activities, including evidence of the fact that Reynolds' insubordination occurred while he was transacting union business. Notwithstanding that evidence, the arbitrator found that Reynolds was insubordinate in threatening Mann without provocation and in refusing to obey repeated orders to return to work and, subsequently, to leave the premises. Given the issue before the arbitrator, the scope of the evidence he considered and the decision he ultimately reached, I cannot conclude that the amended award is "palpably wrong."

barred from filing and pursuing any grievance on his own behalf for problems in which he may personally become involved after his return to work.

[9] Obviously, had the arbitrator's initial award not been modified pursuant to the mandate of the district court, the conditional restraint on Reynolds' union activity would have directly contravened the principles underlying the Act. See Cessna Aircraft Co., 220 NLRB 873, 875 (1975). This conclusion holds true even though insertion of the offending proviso in the initial award appears to have been motivated by the arbitrator's compassion for Reynolds as an individual.

On brief, the General Counsel argues that the award is repugnant to the Act because the arbitrator "ignored the longheld Board principle that, absent opprobrious conduct, any discharge based in whole or in part on the conduct of an employee during a grievance meeting would be a discharge for protected concerted activities and therefore a violation of the Act." The relevant cases cited by the General Counsel in support of this argument all involve situations in which an employee was provoked into insubordinate conduct by an employer's unfair labor practices.[10] I find such authority less than persuasive here, where it is not alleged that Respondent committed any unfair labor practice other than Reynolds' discharge. Indeed, Reynolds' repeated refusals to obey his supervisors' orders, his longstanding method of comporting himself while conducting union business, the obscene and physical nature of his threat to Mann, the absence of any provocation by Respondent, and the lack of formality surrounding Reynolds' concurrent protected activity support the arbitrator's explicit conclusion that Reynolds had crossed the line which separates acceptable and unacceptable behavior. Such a conclusion is not repugnant to the Act. See Atlantic Steel Co., 245 NLRB 814, 816 (1979).

[10] See NLRB v. M & B Headwear Co., 349 F.2d 170 (4th Cir. 1965); E. I. du Pont de Nemours, 263 NLRB 159 (1982); Sea-Land Service, 240 NLRB 1146 (1979).

For the foregoing reasons, I find that the arbitrator's decision is not repugnant to the Act. Accordingly, I conclude that it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to give conclusive effect to the grievance award, and I shall therefore dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent did not, as alleged, violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

1. Respondent's motion dated July 2, 1984, is granted, the record reopened, Respondent's Exhibits 10 and 11 are received, and the record is closed.

2. The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[11] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Certified Grocers of Illinois, Inc. and Timothy Cybulski. Case 13–CA–23281

24 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

Upon a charge filed by Timothy Cybulski, an Individual, on 19 May 1983, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 13, issued a complaint on 23 June 1983 against Respondent Certified Grocers of Illinois, Inc. The complaint alleges that the Respondent is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On 18 November 1983 all parties to the proceeding entered into a stipulation of facts and thereafter filed a motion to transfer proceeding to the National Labor Relations Board. The parties agreed therein to waive a hearing before or decision by an administrative law judge and to submit the case directly to the Board for findings of fact, conclusions of law, and an order based on a stipulated record consisting of the complaint and answer, other formal Board documents, and stipulation of facts with attached exhibits.

On 13 February 1984 the Board approved the parties' stipulation and ordered that the proceedings be transferred to the Board. The General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent filed briefs.

On the basis of the stipulation of facts, the briefs, and the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is an Illinois corporation with offices and places of business in Chicago and Hodgkins, Illinois, where it is engaged in the wholesale grocery business. During the year preceding issuance of the complaint, the Respondent purchased and received at its Illinois facilities goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Illinois. The complaint alleges, the Respondent's answer admits, and we find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent's answer admits, and we find that Grocery and Food Products, Processors, Canneries, Frozen Food Plants, Sugar Processors, Confectionery and Candy Manufacturers and Distributors, Coffee Vending, Miscellaneous Drivers and Salesmen, Warehousemen and Related Office Employees Union, Local 738, an affiliate of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The Respondent and the Union have had a collective-bargaining relationship for many years. The Union represents the Respondent's employees at both its Chicago headquarters and at its Hodgkins warehouse. At all relevant times there was a collective-bargaining agreement in effect between the Respondent and the Union which contained, inter alia, a grievance procedure leading to binding arbitration and a no-strike clause.

On 7 March 1983 the Respondent instituted new production standards covering the so-called "order pickers" at the Hodgkins warehouse. The new standards included a five-step progressive disciplinary program for employees who failed to meet the standards. Thereafter, several of the order pickers filed a "group" grievance with the Union protesting the implementation of the production standards and its disciplinary provisions. This grievance was processed through the contractual grievance procedure and, by 17 May 1984 and the commencement of the picketing discussed infra, was pending arbitration.[1]

Subsequently, between 9 and 17 May 1983, approximately 24 employees at the warehouse were either terminated or notified that their termination was pending for failure to meet the new production standards. Grievances over these terminations were filed by the employees with the Union which, as of 17 May 1983, the Union was also pursuing through the contractual grievance procedure.

On their termination, several of the employees chose to retain their own attorney. In a letter dated 16 May 1983, this attorney informed the Respondent that she had "been retained by a group of employees of Certified . . . relating to their labor dispute with Certified over recent changes in their working conditions and resulting in disciplinary action." The letter further advised the Respondent that "in conjunction with the above labor dispute, the Certified employees may prospectively engage in picketing" and that the Respondent should contact her office if it contemplated "any action" which might "interfere with the rights of the employees to picket or air their grievances . . . ."

[1] The Union requested arbitration of the grievance by letter dated 4 April 1983.

The following day, 17 May 1983, 16 of the terminated employees commenced picketing in front of the Respondent's Chicago headquarters. The pickets carried signs stating "Certified Grocers Unfair to Workers"; "Five Years Loyalty—now fired"; "Immediate reinstatement until arbitration"; "Unfair work standards"; and "Cindy Saver isn't doing any good."[2] Three of the pickets' signs also stated "informational picket" in small print in the lower corners of the signs.[3]

Shortly after it began, the picketing attracted local news coverage and publicity. In a news article dated 20 May 1983, picket Ray Ulrich was quoted saying that "this is strictly an informational picket; we are not encouraging anyone to stop working, we are just trying to let people know what is going on here." Ulrich was also quoted in the article saying that he and the other pickets had hired their own attorney because "we haven't been satisfied with the Union's actions so far."[4]

Immediately upon the commencement of the picketing, the Respondent sent a mailgram to the Union informing it that picketing "by individuals on whose behalf you have filed grievances" had begun. The mailgram advised the Union that the Respondent intended to hold the Union responsible for all damages occasioned by the picketing "until such time there is affirmative action on your part to advise the pickets . . . that the picketing is not condoned by your Union." The mailgram further advised the Union that unless the pickets ceased picketing immediately, "even if their grievances were sustained, their unlawful picketing and violation of the contract" would be "independent grounds for termination which would result in a forfeiture of any right to reemployment." The same day the Respondent also sent mailgrams to each of the 16 pickets advising them that their conduct was unlawful and a violation of the contract, that "the matter of your termination is presently being pursued through the contractual grievance machinery," and that "unless you immediately cease picketing, even if that grievance is sustained, your actions would be independent cause for your termination and would result in a forfeiture of any right you have to reemployment."

The following day, 18 May 1983, the Union notified the Respondent that the Union had not authorized the picketing and had told its members to absolve themselves of any connection with the picketing. Nevertheless, the picketing continued for several days thereafter until 20 May 1983.

No employee was subsequently disciplined by the Respondent for picketing, but were all reinstated on 23 May 1983 pursuant to an interim settlement agreement between the Respondent and the Union pending the resolution of the grievances. The Respondent and the Union reached a final settlement agreement on all grievances on 31 October 1983, which also provided for reinstatement of all the pickets.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel and the Charging Party contend that the Respondent's 17 May 1983 mailgrams in which it threatened to deny reemployment to its discharged employees unless they ceased picketing violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Respondent contends that the picketing was unprotected activity because its purpose was to obtain direct negotiations with the Respondent over the discharges in contravention of the contractual grievance arbitration procedure, relying on Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, 420 U.S. 50 (1975).[5] Accordingly, the Respondent argues, its threat to deny the pickets reemployment did not violate the Act.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

In Emporium Capwell Co., supra, the Supreme Court held that the exclusivity principle of Section 9(a) of the Act proscribes attempts by a minority of employees to engage in separate bargaining with their employer. The Court relied on the following facts in concluding that the picketing employees in that case were attempting to engage in separate bargaining: The union had invoked the contractual grievance procedure on behalf of the employees to resolve their charges of racial discrimination. Several of the employees expressed their view that the contract procedures were inadequate to deal with such charges and suggested that the union instead begin picketing the employer. The union refused to do so. Thereafter, several of these employees refused to participate in the grievance procedure, announced their desire to deal directly with management over minority employment conditions, and began picketing the employer. The union at that

[2] "Cindy Saver" is the Respondent's logo girl.

[3] The parties stipulated that this small printing could not be seen from the street and could only be read by someone close to the person carrying the sign.

[4] The parties stipulated that Ulrich was accurately quoted.

[5] The Respondent alternatively contends that the picketing was unprotected because it violated the contractual no-strike clause. In light of our finding, infra, that the picketing was unprotected under the rationale of Emporium Capwell, supra, we need not address the merits of whether it was unprotected on this basis as well.

time again requested that they rely on the grievance process. The pickets, however, continued to press their demand to deal directly with the company.

In agreement with the Respondent, we find that the facts in the instant case compel the conclusion that the pickets were attempting to deal directly with the Respondent over their grievances. We conclude this even though the parties stipulated that the pickets never made a request to the Respondent to meet with the pickets or their representatives. As outlined above, the Union had filed both a "group" grievance on behalf of the employees protesting the new production standard, and individual grievances over the subsequent discharges. Nevertheless, several of the employees subsequently hired their own attorney in conjunction with this dispute. It was this independently hired attorney, not the Union, who then notified the Respondent that the employees might picket over the dispute. The attorney also indicated to the Respondent that it should deal with her (not the Union) with respect to any action it proposed that might "restrain" the employees' ability to picket or air their grievances.

Thereafter, the employees did indeed begin picketing, but they did so at the Respondent's Chicago headquarters facility. The employees never picketed at their own place of employment. We infer that the choice of location was an attempt to influence the Respondent's higher authority to reinstate them. That this was the main purpose in the picketing is clear from the language of certain of the signs which indicated, "Immediate reinstatement until arbitration" and "Five Years Loyalty—now fired." The language on these signs was in large bold print that could be read from a distance. In contrast, the wording "informational picket" was carried on only a few of the signs in small print in the lower corners of the signs. This printing could not be seen from the street and could only be read if someone was close to the person carrying the sign.

Further, the Respondent immediately protested the picketing to the Union and was subsequently assured by the Union that it had not authorized the picketing and, in fact, had told its members to absolve themselves of any connection with the picketing. Nonetheless, the picketing continued after the time the Union indicated it had given its admonition to the pickets to cease picketing.

Undoubtedly the General Counsel is correct in the assertion that one purpose of the picketing was informational, as evidenced, for example, by picket Ulrich's quoted description of the picketing in the local newspaper. We find, however, that the above confluence of factors clearly indicates that an additional purpose of the picketing was to seek and obtain direct negotiations with the Respondent. This conclusion is underscored by picket Ulrich's additional quoted statement that the employees had hired their own attorney who would "look after the employees' interests" because they "haven't been satisfied with the Union's action so far." Accordingly, under Emporium Capwell the picketing was unprotected.[6]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The Respondent did not violate the Act by threatening to deny reemployment to its discharged employees unless they ceased picketing.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

In Colonial Stores, 248 NLRB 1187 (1980), the picketing was found to be in support of the union's actions. Similarly, in Roadway Express, 241 NLRB 397 (1979), there was no evidence that the union objected to the conduct of the pickets. Finally, in Dreis & Krump Mfg., 221 NLRB 309 (1975), the employee did not picket the employer, but merely distributed leaflets to fellow employees advising them of his grievance with the employer.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 12 September 1984 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to honor union-security provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement it has with the Charging Party. More particularly, the complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by denying the Union's request that it inform bargaining unit employees they are required to join the Union or be subject to termination pursuant to the union-security clause provisions.

At the hearing, the Respondent denied it had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) as alleged, and argued that the dispute herein is cognizable under the grievance-arbitration provisions of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement to which the Board should defer. The judge refused to defer this dispute to the parties' grievance procedure and found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. In refusing to defer, the judge noted that the Respondent had "ignored" a grievance accusing it of having violated those provisions of its contract which pertain to union membership and that the Union had not pursued the alleged contract violation to arbitration. The judge found that the record herein does not "demonstrate full acceptance by the parties of the grievance and arbitration route to the resolution of disputes." United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 at 560 fn. 21 (1984). We disagree. Accordingly, we do not adopt the judge's recommendations.

The parties' current collective-bargaining agreement is effective from December 1982 until December 1985. On 17 February 1983 the local union presented the Respondent with a statement alleging that it was violating the parties' contract by failing to notify employees of the requirement that they become members of the Union after 45 days.[1] Thereafter, a representative of the International Union repeated the Union's claim of a contractual violation to the Respondent's manager of labor relations. By letter dated 15 April 1983, the Respondent denied the Union's claim and asserted that it was not obligated under the contract to enforce or inform employees of union requirements.[2] The Union did not pursue arbitration of the dispute, electing instead to file the charge herein.

The facts of the instant case make it well suited for deferral. The dispute involves whether the Respondent has a contractual duty under article 13 of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union to inform employees they will be subject to discharge for failure to join the Union 45 days after hire. The Respondent's refusal so to inform its employees is alleged to be violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1). The issue appears to be one of contract interpretation as there apparently is no express provision requiring notification. Further, the Respondent has expressed its willingness to arbitrate the dispute. The Union by initiating its grievance action clearly viewed the dispute as being cognizable under the contract's grievance-arbitration procedure;[3] the fact that it later elected not to process its grievance to arbitration does not affect our decision to defer. United Technologies, supra. Contrary to the judge we find the record demonstrates that the parties have accepted and utilized their grievance-arbitration procedure for the resolution of disputes. Thus, the record reveals that the parties discussed the issue herein in December 1983 while participating in the arbitration of another grievance. Moreover, there is no record evidence to suggest that the use of the contractual grievance

[1] The dispute herein centers on art. 13 of the current collective-bargaining agreement which is, verbatim, as follows:

> All employees currently in the bargaining unit and all new employees shall become members of the Union after forty-five (45) days following last date of hire; and shall maintain their membership in the Union in good standing for the duration of this Agreement as a condition of employment.
>
> The provisions of this Article shall be effective with respect to the employees as defined in Article I, providing such provisions are in accordance with and consistent with appropriate Federal and State Laws.
> The Union agrees to accept all employees as members.

The Union has not requested the discharge of any employee; rather it has only requested that the Respondent notify the employees that they must, as a condition of employment, become members of the Union within 45 days of employment.

[2] The Respondent's position throughout has been that art. 13 is subject to the Alabama right-to-work statute.

[3] The record does not contain a complete copy of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement or the portion of that agreement setting forth the terms of the grievance-arbitration provisions. However, the record clearly demonstrates that such provisions exist and were invoked by the Union in this matter. Accordingly, in view of the circumstances here, it is unnecessary to rely on the actual language of that provision, and the Respondent's motion to reopen the record for the limited purpose of receiving the entire collective-bargaining agreement is denied.

procedure to resolve the dispute herein would be "unpromising or futile." United Aircraft Corp., 204 NLRB 879 (1973).

We also find that the issue whether the Respondent could tell its employees they would not be terminated if they refused to join the Union is also amenable to resolution through use of the grievance procedure. This matter, although not alleged as unlawful in the complaint, was found by the judge to have been fully litigated and to have been an 8(a)(1) violation. The employees' obligation to join the Union as a condition of employment is a matter of interpretation of article 13 of the bargaining agreement, and its resolution will determine whether the Respondent's statements to employees was contrary to the contractual provisions. This matter is the proper subject for the grievance-arbitration procedure.

In view of the foregoing, we believe it would best effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act to defer this case to the arbitral forum. Accordingly, we conclude that the issues raised by the complaint should be deferred to the grievance-arbitration provisions of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, and we shall so order.[4]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed, provided that

Jurisdiction of this proceeding is retained for the limited purpose of entertaining an appropriate and timely motion for further consideration on a proper showing that either (a) the dispute has not, with reasonable promptness after the issuance of this Decision and Order, either been resolved by amicable settlement in the grievance procedure or submitted promptly to arbitration, or (b) the grievance or arbitration procedures have not been fair and regular or have reached a result which is repugnant to the Act.

[4] The Respondent must, of course, waive any timeliness provisions of the grievance-arbitration clauses of the collective-bargaining agreement so that the Union's grievance may be processed in accordance with the following Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The charge was filed on January 24, 1984, by Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, Local 719 (the Union), and complaint issued on March 1, 1984. As later amended, the complaint alleges that the Union and United Food Management Services, Inc., Alabama (Respondent),[1] are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement containing a union-security clause, which required union membership as a condition of employment after 45 days following the last date of hire. Further, the complaint alleges that the Union notified seven named employees[2] that they had to join the Union or be subject to discharge, pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement, but all seven employees refused to join. Thereafter, the complaint further alleges the Union asked Respondent to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement by informing said employees that they had to join the Union or be subject to termination, and that Respondent refused to do so. According to the complaint, this constituted a refusal to continue in full force and effect the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

A hearing on this matter was held before me in Huntsville, Alabama, on April 6, 1984. On the entire record, including a brief filed by Respondent and a memorandum to supplement oral argument filed by the General Counsel, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings, as amended at the hearing, establish that Respondent is an Alabama corporation with an office and place of business located at Huntsville, Alabama, where it is engaged in providing food service.[3] Respondent received gross revenues in excess of $500,000 during 1983, and purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers who in turn purchased and received same from suppliers located outside the State of Alabama. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Marshall Race, a representative of the International Union, testified that it is affiliated with various locals to whom it gives consultation and advice. The name of the International was recently changed from the former name, Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, and the name of Local 719 was similarly changed. It is evident from the record that the Union has entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent whereby it represents certain of the latter's employees, and that it has engaged in other activities on behalf of said employees. I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] Respondent's name appears as amended at the hearing.

[2] Edith Marie Word, Linda Guess, Judy Williams, Daniel McAnally, Patricia Ennis, Sharon Hale, and Wilburn Duskin.

[3] The pleadings and a current collective-bargaining agreement establish that Respondent's facility is located in Huntsville, Alabama, at the George C. Marshall Space Flight Center, NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Administration). G.C. Exhs. 3, 1(c) par. 6, 1(e) par. 7. I take judicial notice of the fact that the Center is owned and controlled by the Federal Government.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Background

The Union had a collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent's predecessor at the Space Center, ARA Services. The agreement expired in December 1982. Respondent's district manager George A. Carlye[4] stated that Respondent "assumed" the predecessor's contract in 1979. This was corroborated by Union Representative Race. Article XIII of this agreement, entitled "Union Shop," reads as follows:

> All employees currently in the bargaining unit and all new employees shall become members of the Union after forty-five (45) days following last date of hire; and shall maintain their membership in the Union in good standing for the duration of this Agreement as a condition of employment.
> The provisions of this Article shall be effective with respect to the employees as defined in Article I,[5] providing such provisions are in accordance with and consistent with appropriate Federal and State Laws.
> The Union agrees to accept all employees as members [G.C. Exh. 3].

Race credibly testified that the predecessor, ARA, agreed to inform employees that it was necessary for them to join the Union after the probationary period. I infer that it did so.

B. The Bargaining for a New Agreement

Union Representative Race stated that article XIII of the old agreement was simply renewed in the new contract.

Company Counsel McCauley testified that there were three bargaining sessions. At the first session, on November 16, 1982, Respondent proposed to delete article XIII. The Company thought that the Union should go out and persuade employees to join the Union. Further, there was "no need for that Article . . . considering the Alabama State right-to-work law." Race's response was that article XIII required every employee to be a member of the Union.

A few days later, on November 21, McCauley wrote a letter to Race, with two attachments purporting to represent the positions of the parties at the first session. Respondent's proposed changes included a proposal to "delete or rewrite to eliminate the confusion and conflict between paragraphs one and two" of article XIII, the union shop provision. The handwritten letters "O.C". appear next to this proposal, and there are other markings. McCauley said that he did not write them (R. Exh. 6).

At the next session, on January 4, 1983, McCauley said that the Company was ready to include article XIII in a new agreement. "Mr. Race," he told the union representative, "we are agreeing on the basis that we are including applicable federal and state law." "We live by the law," Race responded. The parties reached agreement on remaining issues on January 19, 1983, and the contract was signed in March 1983. It contains article XIII in the same language as indicated above. The opening sentence of the contract describes it as an "agreement made as of this 13th day of December 1982" (G.C. Exh. 3).

C. Union Attempts to Enforce the Agreement

In December 1982, Union President Bennie Ratliff discovered that some employees were not members of the Union. He called International Representative Race, about February, for advice. The latter told Ratliff to give each employee a copy of a letter which Race would compose for Ratliff, and a membership card. Accordingly, Race prepared and Ratliff distributed to the nonmembers a letter which invites them to join the Union, recites the agreement between the parties (art. XIII), and states that an employee who refuses to join would be "subject to discharge." The initiation fees and first month's dues are stated. The letter is cordial in tone. Although there is a space for a due date, no date is indicated (G.C. Exh. 6).

Race also suggested that Ratliff file a grievance. On February 17, 1983, Ratliff handed Unit Manager Shelby Beddingfield [6] a document stating that the Company was "violating government agreement and our contract . . . that is, when some one is hired, they become a member of the Union after 45 days. New employees are to be notified of this agreement."[7] Ratliff gave Beddingfield a list of employees "who [had] not been notified of this agreement" (G.C. Exh. 7).[8]

Ratliff testified that he told Beddingfield that the Union would be asking for termination of these employees. Beddingfield asked whether the Union wanted the Company to go out and "twist their arm" and make them join. Ratliff replied that the Union merely wanted the Company to tell the employees what was in the contract.

The Union received no reply from the Company, and the employees failed to join the Union. Ratliff said the Union had no intention to go to arbitration.

[4] The parties stipulated that Carlye was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

[5] In art. I of the current agreement, the Employer recognizes the Union as "the sole bargaining agent with respect to wages, hours and working conditions for all food service employees on the payroll of its food service operation at George C. Marshall Space Flight Center, NASA, Huntsville, Alabama. Specifically excluded from the bargaining unit are all office clerical employees, guards and watchpersons, professional employees, chef managers, and supervisors as defined in the Act as amended as well as other employees of the Employer in any of the Employer's other divisions, branches, or units" (G.C. Exh. 3).

[6] The parties stipulated that Beddingfield was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

[7] Respondent attempted to impeach Ratliff's credibility by introducing two documents (Ratliff's affidavit and a letter to a nonmember) both of which Ratliff said he signed (R. Exhs. 3(a), 4). Respondent contends that the signatures are not the same, but did not introduce expert testimony on the issue. Ratliff said that he was standing while signing one document, and sitting while signing the other. Further, he used different pens. I accept this explanation.

[8] Several but not all of the employees named in the complaint are listed in this memorandum, and employees not named in the complaint are listed.

Meanwhile, International Representative Race called District Manager Carlye, who did not agree that the contract required employees to join the Union. The district manager also acknowledged several conversations with Union President Ratliff in which the latter said the Company should "force" the employees to join. Carlye did not agree.

In late March, Race called Company Counsel McCauley and argued that the Union could enforce a union-shop agreement in a "federal enclave" located within a right-to-work State, citing Lord v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 2088, 646 F.2d 1057 (5th Cir. 1981).

McCauley responded by letter dated April 15, 1983. He acknowledged receiving a copy of the document given to Beddingfield, and said that he had read the Lord v. IBEW case. However, McCauley denied that the contract required Respondent to "enforce or inform employees of union requirements. The Employer has no wish or right to intrude upon internal union affairs." Respondent was not required to "take a position" on the question, the letter continued, and would not "indiscriminately fire employees at anyone's suggestion." The Union had an obligation "to fairly represent its members," and had to meet certain "requirements" before attempting to terminate an employee under a union-security agreement. "Therefore," McCauley concluded, "if the Union believes that it has justifiable and legal recourse to initiate firing of a current employee, the Union must take its own action, honestly and aboveboard" (G.C. Exh. 4).

Race replied on April 21. He recited what he stated was the contract requirement that all employees must become members of the Union as a condition of employment. He further stated that Respondent's "unit manager" (Beddingfield) had been notified by the Union that certain employees had not been informed of this requirement.

The last three paragraphs of substance in Race's letter read as follows:

> We respectfully submit that compliance with all of the terms and provisions of our labor agreement is necessary and important. We must insist that they all receive equal concern from both the Employer and the Union.
>
> I will reserve other comments on the contents of your letter of April 15th, since it appears that you have attempted to answer questions or respond to requests not yet asked or made.
> Both the Local Union Officers, and the undersigned, would sincerely appreciate it if you would reconsider your refusal to comply with the Union Shop provision of our NASA unit Agreement [R. Exh. 2].

Race had another conversation with McCauley in which the latter said that the Lord v. IBEW case did not apply to the NASA unit at Huntsville.

The Union filed two unfair labor practice charges against the Company in 1983 but withdrew them. According to Race, he was not satisfied with the sufficiency of the Union's notice to the employees. Accordingly, in late October and early November 1983, Ratliff and union member Joann Williams sent duplicate letters by certified mail to the seven employees named in the complaint. This was in accordance with advice from a Board agent. Williams identified one of Respondent's exhibits as a "sample letter" (R. Exh. 3(a)). It is addressed to Marie Word, is identical to the original letter personally delivered to Word (G.C. Exh. 6), and contains the figure of $13.56 as the first month's dues and initiation fees. The certified mail receipts of the letters are in evidence and show delivery in late October and early November (G.C. Exhs. 8(a), 8(b)).

One of the employees (Wilburn Duskin) did not claim his letter. However, Williams testified that she was present when Ratliff personally delivered the first letter to Duskin. The latter testified and acknowledged receiving the letter in late 1983.

D. The Final Meeting of the Parties

The parties met in late 1983 at an arbitration proceeding not related to this case. Company Counsel McCauley placed the date as December 9. According to Race, after the arbitration proceeding had concluded, he brought up what he called "the continuing violation of the Union shop provision" of the contract. He quoted the provision and said that it was clear that an employee would have to join the Union after the grace period as a condition of employment. McCauley said that he was not going to give the Union any "legal advice," and Race replied that he was not asking for it. According to District Manager Carlye, Race said that he was going back to the NLRB.

McCauley testified at length about this meeting, but his testimony is not entirely clear. He asserted that Race would never admit that there was a second paragraph to article XIII, but agreed that the Union had signed the contract. McCauley denied that he had ever received a request from the Union to discharge a specific employee but said that he knew some of the employees were not union members. The parties stipulated that every union member was on checkoff. McCauley's final version of Race's demand was: "We want the Company to enforce Article XIII and require the employees to become members." McCauley's position was: "We are refusing to honor the Union's position because . . . it was not the negotiated position."

E. Respondent's Responses to the Union Efforts at Enforcement

Union member Joann Williams testified that she overheard a conversation in the cafeteria between one of the employees, who had received the Union's letter, and Supervisor Beddingfield. The employee asked about the letter and Beddingfield replied, "The union don't sign your paycheck, does it? Does Bennie Ratliff sign your paycheck?" When the employee answered "No," Beddingfield asked, "Well, isn't that a good enough answer for you?"[9] Marie Word, one of the seven employees, [9] Williams placed this conversation before February 16, when the "first letter was wrote up." This could not have been the correct date. The letter was not yet in existence, and I conclude that this was an inadvertent error in Williams' testimony.

told Williams that she was not joining the Union because Beddingfield said she was not required to join. I credit Williams.

Beddingfield testified and acknowledged telling employees that they did not have to join the Union as a condition of employment, and that the Company would not fire them if they refused to join.

F. Withdrawal from the Union

Union finance secretary Mary E. Hines testified she sent a notice to Respondent in the fall of 1983 informing it that employee Georgia Duskin had withdrawn from the Union. Duskin was still working at Respondent's facility.

G. Legal Analysis and Conclusions

1. The 14(b) issue

The first proviso to Section 8(a)(3) of the Act allows an employer, under certain circumstances, to make an agreement with a labor organization requiring as a condition of employment membership in the labor organization on or after the 30th day following the beginning of employment, or the "effective date" of the agreement, whichever is later. However, Section 14(b) affirms that this language shall not be construed to authorize the execution or application of collective-bargaining agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment, where this is prohibited by state or territorial law.

I take judicial notice of the fact that Alabama law provides that every person shall be free to join or refrain from joining a labor organization, that the right to work shall not be denied because of membership or nonmembership in such an organization, that an agreement requiring such membership is illegal, and that such membership shall not be required as a condition of employment.[10] However, Federal law has preempted Alabama law in the field of labor relations except in a few cases which are only of "peripheral" concern to Federal labor law.[11]

As already indicated, the alleged unfair labor practice took place on property owned and controlled by the Federal Government. Such property has been designated as a Federal enclave, and, in Lord v. IBEW, supra, the court held that jurisdiction by the Federal Government over such enclaves is exclusive unless the deed of cession provides to the contrary or unless the cession is not accepted in the manner required by law. There is nothing in the record to indicate any such defect in the deed of cession involving the George C. Marshall Space Flight Center.[12] The court held that the fact that the right-to-work law was enacted before the cession was not determinative. Regardless of the chronology of enactment of the law as compared to the date of cession, "states retain no such power with regard to federal enclaves even though they are physically located within their territory," Ibid., 646 F.2d at 1062.

Respondent argues that, because the collective-bargaining agreement states that the union-security clause must be in accordance with appropriate Federal and state laws, the clause is therefore invalid. This is erroneous, because it is impossible for both state and Federal law to be applicable. State law has been preempted by Federal law.

The fact that the union-security clause provided only a grace period of 45 days from date of last hire, but does not set forth an alternative ending date of the effective date of agreement, whichever is later, does not invalidate the agreement.[13] Respondent refused to honor the Union's request more than 45 days after the effective date of the agreement.

I, therefore, conclude that the union-security clause is valid and enforceable.

2. The Union's fiduciary duty

It is established law that, before seeking enforcement of a union-security clause, the union has a fiduciary duty to inform the employee of his or her obligations, to furnish a statement of the precise amount of dues owed, as well as an explanation of the methods used to compute the amount, and to provide a reasonable opportunity to make payment. Kaiser Foundation Hospitals, 258 NLRB 29, 30 (1981). In the case at bar, the Union first delivered letters by hand to the employees named in the complaint, and later mailed them certified letters. Williams testified that the one letter in evidence was a "sample" letter (G.C. Exh. 6; R. Exh. 3(a)). The letters were all the same, being form letters prepared by Race. They state the sum of $13.56 due as the initiation fee and first month's dues. I infer from Williams' testimony that the other letters contained the same amount. No due date was indicated, and the demand was therefore not unreasonable. I conclude that the Union thereby fulfilled its fiduciary responsibilities to the employees.

3. Interpretation of the contract

We thus arrive at the real issue in this case. What is the obligation of an employer who agrees that all employees, as a "condition of employment," shall become members of the union after a specified date? Respondent's position is that the employer has no obligation whatever until the Union has fulfilled its fiduciary duties, and has demanded the discharge of a named employee. I do not agree with the latter prerequisite.

What is a "condition of employment?" It is no more or less than a company rule which the employee must obey or suffer discipline. In the case of the usual union-security provision, as here, the specified discipline is that of discharge. In other words, the Company has agreed to adopt and implement a rule requiring union membership, with discharge as the penalty for failure to observe the rule.

It is unconscionable, however, to permit enforcement of a company rule without prior notification of the rule to the employees. An employer who, faced with an allegation of a discriminatory discharge, argues that he was merely enforcing a rule which he had never communicated to his employees, would be found to have advanced a pretext—employees cannot be expected to obey rules about which they have not been informed.

It is not the responsibility of a union to inform employees about an employer's rules—it is the function of the employer. Here, the Union did all that it could do—it informed the employees that they would be "subject to discharge" if they did not become members. It then asked the Company to tell the same thing to its employees, and the Company refused. Its reason—that the Union first had to request the discharge of named employees—ignores the Company's obligation to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement. It agreed to enforce a rule requiring union membership. Implied in that undertaking was an obligation to inform its employees of the rule.

Respondent's position—that the Union must first request discharge—would be inimical to the principles of collective bargaining. The Union here did not really want to cause the employees to be discharged—it wanted them to join the Union and keep their jobs. Having the employer support this position by announcing the agreed-upon rule to the employees is far more conducive to labor peace than letting matters proceed to the confrontation of a union demand for discharge.

The Board has found that an employer violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to honor a union-security clause without any clear evidence that the union specifically demanded discharge of employees. Thus, in ruling upon a Motion for Summary Judgment, "the Union gave Respondent written notice that 9 of approximately 22 unit employees had failed . . . to tender the dues and initiation fees necessary to acquire or maintain union membership. Since that date, Respondent has steadfastly refused to honor the Union's request to terminate the employment of those nine delinquent employees" [emphasis added]. King Electrical Mfg. Co., 229 NLRB 615, 616 (1977).

Although Respondent argues that such demands could not lawfully be made between the expiration of the old contract and the date that the new one was signed in March 1983, it is obvious that the Union made additional demands after the signing of the agreement—the last one being made in December 1983.

The Company knew what the Union wanted—to have the Company inform the employees of their obligation. It also knew the name of every employee who was not a member of the Union. Since all union members were on checkoff, every employee not on checkoff was not a union member, and the Company obviously knew the names of the employees whose dues it was remitting to the Union. The fact that the Union may have omitted the name of an employee who was not a member of the Union did not detract from its request to the Company.

I, therefore, conclude that by repeatedly refusing to honor the Union's request to inform employees about their obligations under the union-security provision of the collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that Supervisor Beddingfield admitted telling employees that they did not have to join the Union as a condition of employment, and that Respondent would not discharge them for refusing to do so. These statements were inconsistent with the Company's obligation under the collective-bargaining agreement. They "offend basic working of the collective bargaining process," and are independently violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. House of Fabrics, 234 NLRB 1024, 1025–1026 (1978). Although such statements by Beddingfield were not alleged in the complaint, the matter was thoroughly litigated, and a separate finding is therefore warranted under applicable Board law.

Respondent argues that this case should be deferred to the grievance-arbitration provisions in the contract. However, although it appears from the record that there are such provisions, only two pages of the current agreement are in evidence, and they do not include the grievance-arbitration provisions. See United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557, 559 (1984). In light of the fact that the Union did not proceed to arbitration, and the matter was ignored by the Company, it cannot be said that the record "demonstrates full acceptance by the parties of the grievance and arbitration route to the resolution of disputes." United Technologies Corp., id., at 559 fn. 21.

In accordance with my findings above, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. United Food Management Services, Inc., Alabama, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, Local 719, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All food service employees at Respondent's food service operation at George C. Marshall Space Flight Center, NASA, Huntsville, Alabama, excluding all office clerical employees, guards and watchpersons, professional employees, chef managers, supervisors as defined in the Act, and Respondent's employees employed at any other division, branch, or unit, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the above-named labor organization has been the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing in mid-April 1983, and thereafter, to inform its employees of their obligation to become union members pursuant to the union-security provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement entered into with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has failed to honor that agreement and has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By informing employees that they did not have to join the Union as a condition of employment, and that they would not be terminated even if they refused to join the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent refused the Union's request to inform its employees of their obligation to become union members pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement, and told employees that they did not have to join the Union as a condition of employment, and that it would not discharge them for refusing to do so, it will be recommended that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take appropriate action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

25 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 24 June 1983 Administrative Law Judge Harold A. Kennedy issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response as well as cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

HAROLD A. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. Based on a charge filed on August 9, 1982, by the Sanitary Truck Drivers and Helpers Local 350, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 350 or the Union) the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on September 24, 1982, charging Coastside Scavenger Company (Coastside or the Company) with violating Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The trial took place in San Francisco, California, on November 10, 11, and 12 and December 15, 1982.[1]

A number of matters were established by the pleadings, including the following:

1. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Coastside has a place of business in Pacifica, California, and is a California corporation engaged in the business of providing garbage pickup services.

3. Coastside is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It grossed over $50,000 last year and in the same time period purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $5,000 directly from outside the State of California.

4. The president and vice president of Coastside are, respectively, Mario Torrigino and Louis Picardo, and each is a supervisor and an agent of the Company as those terms are defined in the Act.

5. Since 1970 the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of a unit of Coastside employees described as follows:

> All drivers, helpers, and mechanics employed by [Coastside] at its Pacifica, California facility excluding office clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act.

6. Coastside and the Union have signed successive agreements, the last one being effective for the period August 1, 1979, to July 31, 1982.

7. About June 3, 1982, the Union, by letter, requested Coastside to bargain with respect to terms and conditions of employment. The Union and the Company met at various times in June, July, August, and September 1982 for the purpose of negotiating a new agreement for the unit described above.

8. Certain Coastside employees represented by the Union went on strike on August 2, 1982.[2]

In addition to the facts established by the pleadings referred to above, the following matters are not in dispute.

The Union has been recognized as the exclusive bargaining representative of Coastside's drivers, helpers, and mechanics for 12 years. Collective-bargaining contracts were negotiated with the Union during the 1970s by one of Coastside's two owners, either President Mario Torrigino—referred to during the trial as Owner Torrigino, Torrigino Senior, and as Mario—or Vice President Louis (Lou) Picardo, without a strike. Robert Morales, secretary-treasurer of the Union, represented the Union in negotiating all of such agreements.

Negotiations for a new contract commenced on June 17, 1982. Mario Michael Torrigino, the son of Owner Torrigino and referred to during the trial as Attorney Torrigino, Michael, or as Mike, was the Company's chief spokesman during the 1982 negotiations. Morales, who attended all of the 1982 bargaining sessions except the first one, which was attended by Union Business Representative James Payton, was the chief spokesman for the Union. Bargaining sessions were held about the following dates: June 17 and 29, July 12, 21, 26 and 28, August 3, 6, 20 and 24, and September 7.[3]

[1] In numbering the pages of the transcript, the reporter went from p. 233 to 224 (instead of 234) so that the numbers 224–233 appear twice. The first set of such numbers are renumbered 224A–233A, and the second set of such numbers are renumbered 224B–233B.

[2] Attorney Michael Torrigino, company spokesman during the 1982 negotiations and son of Mario Torrigino, testified that Respondent is "run by the two owners," Mario Torrigino and Louis Picardo, and has 7 trucks and about 15 employees. Merced Ramirez, an employee of Respondent who went on strike, identified six employees as "strikebreakers"—i.e., persons who continued to work for the Company after onset of the strike. The names and addresses of 10 employees who went on strike are listed in G.C. Exh. 26. Attorney Torrigino indicated that he believed that all of the strikers had been replaced by some time in September 1982.

Unless otherwise stated all dates refer to 1982.

Specifically, the complaint alleges Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1):

(a) By failing "to delegate sufficient authority to its bargaining representative [Michael Torrigino] to bind Respondent to the proposals agreed upon during negotiations, thus hindering bargaining, and fail[ing] to bargain with the intent to reach an agreement."

(b) By dealing "directly with its employees in the unit . . . by giving the employees its final contract proposal before such proposal was offered to the Union."

(c) By demanding about August 21 and August 24 that the Union agree to waive striking employees' rights to reinstatement, allegedly "an unlawful condition of bargaining."

(d) By refusing "to agree to terms of a collective-bargaining agreement which had been negotiated on August 20 and August 24, 1982."[4]

The complaint also alleges that Coastside "caused and prolonged" the strike that began on August 2 by "unfair labor practices."

Further, the complaint alleges Coastside violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to reinstate strikers after the Union made unconditional offers on their behalf to return to work.[5]

Finally, the General Counsel and the Charging Party Union assert that there has been a continuing refusal to reinstate strikers and that Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by hiring new employees in the fall of 1982 (November and December), after commencement of the trial, without recalling any of the strikers.

It must be determined whether Coastside violated the Act in the respects alleged above. Also, consideration must be given to whether the investigation conducted by Region 20 of the Board prior to issuance of the complaint was "so unfair and biased as to constitute a denial of due process of law," as Respondent asserts.

Seven witnesses were called. A summary of their testimony follows.

Leopoldo Perez identified himself as an employee driver of Respondent until he went out on strike at the end of July 1982. Perez said he was on the picket line thereafter "every day." On his last day of work, July 30, Owner Picardo asked Perez "for the key of the truck and for the keys of the route." Picardo then gave him (as well as other employees) an envelope containing a one-page document (G.C. Exh. 16) purporting to be a copy of the Company's "final offer." Perez took the document with him to a union meeting held that afternoon. Union official Morales spoke at the meeting and explained, in Spanish and in English, that the document "was not the final offer" the Union had received from the Company. Morales then stated to those at the meeting that "we go on strike because of Unfair Labor Practices."

On August 23, Perez said he was "punched in the nose" while leafletting in a post office by an employee of Coastside. Perez said he thereafter received treatment at a nearby hospital.[6] Perez testified that he was on the picket line shortly after the punching incident and observed Owner Torrigino, accompanied by two workers. According to Perez, Owner Torrigino commented, "He doesn't look that bad," and added, laughingly, "Oh, they got the wrong guy."[7]

Merced Ramirez testified that he had worked for Coastside Scavenger for about 17 years before going on strike and that he had been shop steward since 1970. He said he was a truckdriver for Respondent and had held a "captain's" position.

Ramirez stated that on Friday, July 30, as he left work, Owner Lou Picardo gave him "and some other employees" a copy of General Counsel Exhibit 16, and then stated:

> . . . "I got this for you guys. That's a final proposal. That's all I can do for you guys because I don't have enough money to support all the amount that you are asking for." And, of course, I—you know—and then he says, "Many business, they are closing here in Pacifica. We don't get enough money to pay you guys whatever you want."

[3] The General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondent agree that bargaining sessions were held on these dates. The Union and the General Counsel claim that a negotiating session was also held on July 16 which Respondent disputes. Whether such session took place or not is not "critical," as the General Counsel states, but I am not persuaded that it did take place. The supposedly "more precise testimony" of Morales on this point is relied on by the Charging Party as being more credible than that of Michael Torrigino, who said he could not remember a meeting on that date. Michael conceded during cross-examination that he was in error in previously testifying that he had discussed with Morales on August 20 possible withdrawal of certain litigation instituted by the Union (as the matter was not filed until later), and that a letter he sent on September 7 misstated the understanding reached on sick leave. He also acknowledged that there were events, or their timing, about which he could not be certain. Such concessions by Michael do not cause me to consider his testimony as unreliable. I specifically reject the contention that Morales' testimony "must be credited" over Michael's on the basis of demeanor, recall, or general memory. Actually, Morales' testimony about what happened on specific dates was not so precise. See, for example, Tr. 183 ("On July 16, we had a meeting, to the best of my ability—I am confused between two days . . .") and 284–292. I believe the Charging Party's reference in its brief on p. 5 to a bargaining session being held on July 30 is a typographical error as it is not otherwise referred to in its brief.

[4] Par. 12 of the complaint, which is in part duplicative of par. 11 (quoted in (d) above), alleges that the Union and the Company reached agreement on August 24, 1982, that the Union requested execution of a written contract on that date, and since that date through oral notification by its agent, has failed and refused to execute a written contract embodying the agreement described above."

[5] Par. 17 of the complaint alleges that the Union advised the Employer's agent of the offer to return by phone about August 21 and in a bargaining session about August 24 and that on such dates the Respondent failed to reinstate such employees.

[6] Marcella Barton, who works in the Emergency Admissions Office of Mary's Help Hospital, testified that Perez came to the hospital for treatment on August 23. The hospital report (G.C. Exh. 36) which she helped prepare indicates that Perez reported he had been "hit by a scab" while delivering papers to persons entering a post office. The report indicates that he complained of a nose injury and a cut lip. Barton said she called Coastside to inquire whether the injury resulted from an industrial accident and was told by "a gentleman" that Perez was on strike and no longer in the Company's employ.

[7] The General Counsel's attorney stated that "We are not alleging that the Employer is responsible for the attack."

Ramirez said he went home that afternoon and, before going to the meeting of Coastside employees and union members scheduled to begin at the Royal Inn in South San Francisco at 4 p.m., he called union official Morales and advised him that a company proposal had been distributed to Coastside employees.

Ramirez furnished Morales a copy of General Counsel Exhibit 16 at the start of the meeting. Morales returned it soon thereafter, explaining that he had received a copy of it from someone "about 3:15" that afternoon. Ramirez stated that Morales then spoke to employees during the meeting and that another union official, Jim Payton, stated "the same thing" to them in English.[8] Ramirez stated that he worked on the following day, Saturday, July 31, an "overtime day." When he finished his work that day he was told by Picardo:

> I am waiting for you guys in here Monday morning with that picket sign. I am bringing one for me, too.

Ramirez stated on cross-examination that Morales explained that the union office had received on the afternoon of July 30, around 3 or 3:15, a proposal from the Company "which was longer than the one-page proposal." Also, on cross-examination Ramirez recalled that on the first day of the strike (Monday, August 2) there was a sign at the company yard which stated: "We are seeking permanent replacements for striking employees." Ramirez acknowledged that some Coastside employees did not go on strike, among them: J. Moylett, Allan Bernard (nephew of Picardo), Jose Castellanos, Miguel Castellanos, Ramon Castellanos, and Victor or Valentino Fornesi.

It was brought out during cross-examination that Ramirez was discharged on February 2 but returned to work about 6 weeks later pursuant to an arbitration award that had converted the termination to a 10-day disciplinary suspension, along with some backpay (paid shortly prior to the start of the trial of this proceeding). Ramirez claimed at first that Owner Torrigino did not speak to him after his return in the spring of 1982 pursuant to the arbitrator's award, but he later asserted that Mario Torrigino had said to him, "You are responsible for bringing the Union in this Company."

Ramirez said he was told by the Company when terminated in February 1982 that it was because he "broke the truck on purpose and a lot of that bulls—."

Robert Morales testified that he had served as business representative of Local 350 from 1973 to 1976 and since that time as the Union's secretary-treasurer. He said he had negotiated for his Union a collective-bargaining agreement with Torrigino Senior around 1973 and an agreement with Lou Picardo in 1979. He stated that in 1982 he participated in arbitrations involving Merced and Victor Ramirez.[9]

Morales also testified that the Union and Coastside had agreed to settle a grievance of Aurelio Navarro, following the filing of a lawsuit by the Union, on terms that provided for Navarro's reinstatement and payment of a $4000 "damage award" (not yet accepted by the employee).

Morales testified that, prior to the first bargaining session held on June 17, the Union had prepared proposals (G.C. Exh. 2, dated June 3) for Business Representative James Payton to present to the Company. Morales said he decided to become "directly" involved in the negotiations after conversing with Payton about what happened at the first bargaining session.

Morales stated that he asked Mario Torrigino[10] at the second session whether Michael had the power to act for the Company, "and he says, 'Definitely.'" Morales said he continued to inquire about Michael's authority to act "like a broken record" at every meeting.

Morales said he had received a copy of company proposals set forth in Michael's June 21 letter (G.C. Exh. 4) before the June 29 meeting. At the meeting he said he "kept insisting" that the Company respond to "economic issues," while Michael "kept insisting" that "we get the contract language out of the way." Morales disagreed with the way Michael classified "economic" and "language" issues, contending that Michael proposed "economic changes" in the form of only changing language. Morales referred to Michael's initial proposals with respect to health and welfare matters, pensions and the change of workweek (so Sunday, normally not worked by Coastside employees, and Saturday would not require payment of any overtime) as illustrations of Michael's confusing classification.[11] Morales indicated these items

[8] Ramirez said his "first language" is Spanish but that he could read "a little bit" of English. Ramirez indicated nothing was said at the meeting that day about a strike.

[9] G.C. Exh. 28 is an arbitrator's "interim award" dated June 2 reinstating Merced Ramirez. G.C. Exh. 29 is the arbitrator's "opinion and award," dated June 18, finding Merced Ramirez deserving of "disciplinary suspension" of 10 days rather than discharge for being "in the wrong" plus backpay (estimated at $8000 by Morales). G.C. Exh. 30 is of the arbitrator's "opinion and award," dated June 18, disciplining Victor Ramirez, in the form of a 10-day suspension, but providing for his reinstatement and backpay. G.C. Exh. 31 is a "supplementary award" of arbitrator dated October 27 in favor of Victor Ramirez. Morales testified that Coastside had satisfied Merced Ramirez' backpay award, but he was not aware that Victor Ramirez' had been paid. G.C. Exh. 31 indicates, however, that the Company had paid Victor Ramirez $6284.12.

[10] Morales testified that Michael told his father to "shut up" at two or three bargaining sessions, but he appeared to be uncertain which meetings the father did attend. Morales indicated he thought the father was present at the second bargaining session on June 29 and stated, "I want to be able to fire people without union intervention." Such comment, Morales said, prompted Michael to say, "Shut up, Mario." Morales later acknowledged on cross-examination that Torrigino Senior attended bargaining sessions on June 17 (Morales not present), June 29, July 26, and July 28.

[11] Morales sought to denigrate Michael's labor relations expertise and enlarge on his own. Morales indicated that he educated Attorney Torrigino about such things as trust funds and maintenance of benefit concepts—for which Michael supposedly expressed appreciation. Morales did not persuade me, however, that Michael sought to put through substantive changes in the guise of changing language as a stratagem or ruse. Morales indicated, by his own testimony, that Michael explained that the Company's health and welfare plan, irrespective of whether it provided for maintenance of benefits, would involve a "lesser price" for the Company, that the Company proposed cutting pension contribution from 70 cents to 25 cents per hour and that a change in the workweek would reduce the amount of overtime Coastside would have to pay. Testifying under questioning of the Union's counsel, Morales indicated he had considerable labor relations experience having negotiated as many as 30 agreements. On cross-examination Morales denied "lecturing" to Michael about any Sunday work but did acknowledge that the old contract covered any work performed on Sunday. Morales also indicated that the Union had proposed a change that would preclude the Company employ-were discussed at the June 29 meeting as were other issues—the number of holidays and the effective date of the new contract and lack of any proposed wage increase from the Company. Morales said he objected to the Company's health and welfare proposal, which provided for no maintenance of benefits, to the reduced pension contribution (from 70 cents to 25 cents) and the change of workweek so that Saturday and Sunday would be "regular days," and the proposed effective date of the new contract, January 1, 1983, instead of August 1, 1982 (affording no holiday between August 1, 1982, and January 1983, according to Morales).[12]

At the July 12 meeting the "Witnesseth" clause was discussed, with Morales suggesting appropriate language (set forth on G.C. Exh. 8), along with the pension contribution (Michael still proposing to "reduc[e] it by 45 cents") and a supposedly "better" company health plan. Morales said the Union made a concession with respect to Saturday overtime (accepting a guarantee of 6 rather than 8 hours), and Michael added two more sick days "with pay-off" and an additional holiday, "Cinco de Mayo" (May 5, the Mexican Independence Day). Morales indicated that he thought agreement was reached at that point and he asked about Michael's authority to act, "not seeing his father there." Michael assured him of his authority, Morales said, with Michael saying, "I can guarantee you." Even though Morales indicated he thought agreement was reached, he said he accused Michael of "playing games" with his "nonsense language" and not wanting "to discuss a complete economic package." Morales said he volunteered to meet anytime as the contract was about to expire.

The fourth (Morales' third) bargaining session took place, according to Morales, at the union hall on July 16, starting late around 10:45 a.m. It was to have taken place at the Chamber of Commerce building in Pacifica, Morales said, but Michael had gone instead to the Royal Inn. Morales indicated at one point in his testimony that the meeting at the union hall took place "in the middle of the month of July and I had asked for [Michael's] father and he said that he was on vacation." After commenting that neither of the owners was present at the meeting Morales said he again asked Michael if he had "intentions to negotiate a contract and to finalize it," and Michael again assured him that he had the power to represent the Company.

Morales said he kept questioning Michael's authority, citing various reasons:

> I was very concerned, and I came down with the impression that, number one, because of his inability to understand the contract, that we were running out of time, and that everytime that we discussed, well, he would say, "want to check this out" . . . . You know, he gave me the impression that he did not want—he did not want to settle the agreement. . . .

Morales said Michael made the Company's first wage proposal when the parties met at the union hall which he described as follows:

> [Michael] says, "I know you are going to be upset, but I am going to give you our proposal on wages." And I said, "Go ahead, we've got to get it sometime or another." And he gave me a proposal of 10 cents per hour the first year, five cents per hour the second year, and five cents per hour the third year, with no cost of living index, which he said his father was against it, and that he would never agree to a cost of living clause.

Morales indicated during his testimony that he thought there were bargaining sessions on both July 16 and 21 and that the arbitrations that the Union sought on behalf of Navarro and the two Ramirezes were discussed at each. Michael had proposed use of the language that would eliminate the need for warning letters and allow terminations "for just cause," noting that his father was very upset over the cost of the "two arbitrations and a court case" that sought an arbitration. Morales said he explained to Michael that his (Michael's) proposal was "very dangerous" and suggested an alternative—keeping the employees on the payroll pending the outcome of their grievances—which Michael thought "would be acceptable" and "satisfy" his father.[13]

On July 21, according to Morales, the parties agreed on "equipment" benefits—after Morales "explained" matters of safety and security to Attorney Torrigino—with Michael agreeing that the Company would increase shoe allowances from $35 to $45 (with a maximum of two pairs each year) and no assessment to employees for garbage cans (supposedly in accord with the law but contrary to Owner Torrigino's desires).[14]

Initially, Morales thought two Federal mediators, as well as Michael's father, attended the bargaining session held on July 26.[15] Morales was uncertain how long it ing a worker on "straight time" on the weekend. Attorney Torrigino testified that only one employee normally works on Saturday, but "about everybody worked" on the first Saturday of each month.

[12] Morales identified a letter, G.C. Exh. 7, that he said he hand delivered at the June 29 bargaining session. It asks for a response to the Union's initial proposals and also questions Michael's classification of issues. Morales testified that at this meeting the Company wanted to be paid a fee for deducting dues for the Union, considered to be a noneconomic item by Michael, and that he and Michael disagreed on the proper classification of a number of items discussed that day.

[13] Morales stated that the language he proposed, which he said Michael accepted on July 16, was later typed out and shown to Michael on August 3. Under questioning by Charging Party's counsel, Morales said he also explained to Michael on July 16 that he should not attempt to change sec. 24, "Public Authorities and Agreement," as Michael was proposing, stating that it would open up "a can of worms." The Company had "given up" on this item, he said, by "July 12th and/or 16th."

[14] On cross-examination Morales stated that Pedro Navarro had filed a grievance over efforts of the Company to collect payment for damage to garbage cans. Morales said the Union proposed a change in sec. 16 "because of the experience of the grievances." Morales maintained that on that day the Union insisted on an increased pension contribution and that the health and welfare plan was discussed. He claimed that "all the issues were outstanding" up to that date and even on August 2, when the strike began, "because they had not bargained in good faith." On redirect, however, he mentioned agreement was reached on vacations and maintenance of benefits.

[15] Morales later indicated he thought the two Federal mediators came only to the July 28 meeting.

lasted, but it was his recollection that the duration of the new contract and Coastside's plan to obtain an increase of rates from Pacifica's city council in January 1983 were discussed. Michael wanted, Morales stated, a 3-year contract that would not commence until January 1983, the earliest time the Company supposedly could offer any wage increase.[16]

Morales testified that he and his union colleague, Jim Payton, walked out of the July 28 bargaining session "out of desperation" after discussing certain subjects—what the date of the contract should be; sick leave, a matter Morales said he thought had been previously agreed on (i.e., 12 days); and wages, a subject opened up by Morales, who explained that the Union was asking for only "parity for the area," resulting in a response of "no way" from Mario. Morales said the union officials walked out because the "conduct" of the company representatives indicated they did not want to finalize any agreement with the Union but wanted it to agree to allow the Company to discharge employees. Quoting Morales:

> [T]hey gave the impression that I should have the authority to say to them, "Yes, you can fire Victor Ramirez. You can fire Merced Ramirez. You can fire Aurelio Navarro. You can fire Pedro Navarro. And there will be no problem."

Morales stated during cross-examination that he did not have "a clear recollection" of the July 28 bargaining session but stated it "started like any other negotiating meeting." He indicated later that a Federal mediator attended the session as did Torrigino Senior, who was "there sitting silently." Morales maintained that it was a "nonsense affair of negotiations," but added:

> And I will say this: That I am not critical that, in the case of Michael, he did it with intention; it's just that he didn't know, like me trying to fix your car and I am not a mechanic.[17]

Morales agreed on cross-examination that at the July 28 session additional subjects were discussed—pensions (with the Union proposing a lesser increase); vacations (previously "agreed to that already," according to Morales, except that the Union continued to press for 4 weeks' vacations for employees with 7 years with the Company); discharge and suspension language (a "settled issue," Morales maintained, although he agreed that he had not yet submitted in writing the language previously suggested that was reportedly acceptable to the Company); "Item 16" (supposedly resolved previously but "settled" again that day); sick leave (previously settled but reopened by the Company as to the "payoff"); and grievance and arbitration provision. Morales maintained that the last item, referred to as item 23, had been previously settled, but he conceded that discussion of it that day "could have" triggered the walkout by him and union official Payton.

After the union officials walked out, Morales instructed Payton to get in touch with Owner Lou Picardo in an effort to get him involved in the negotiations. Morales said Payton then did two things, at Morales' direction: (1) called Picardo and offered to sit down and negotiate immediately "with somebody who had real power and real desire to negotiate" and then (2) confirmed such offer by telegram. The response Picardo gave was not promising. Said Morales:

> My indication from Mr. Payton was that Lou Picardo again told him just to strike their "f" with an "ing" asses. "They deserve it, they got it coming, and I am going on vacation. I don't care."[18]

July 30 was an eventful day, although no bargaining session was held. Around 3 p.m. a messenger hand delivered to Morales at his office a 4-page letter from Attorney Torrigino containing several company proposals (G.C. Exh. 17). Morales said he learned earlier, around 12 noon or 1 p.m. when Merced Ramirez telephoned him, that "a final proposal" of the Company (G.C. Exh. 16) had also been distributed to employees that day. Morales stated that he received a copy of the latter document, signed by "Mario Torrigino" and "Louie Picardo," at the Royal Inn at South San Francisco around 4 p.m., about the time a union meeting was due to begin. Morales stated that he had called the meeting "to give the men an up-to-date report" on the status of the negotiations with Coastside. Morales spoke to the "membership" in English and in Spanish, and Payton also offered some comments. Morales said he explained that the Company had sent out "two different sets of documents," one from the officers of the Company and another, described as "outrageous" and indicative of "contempt for the Union," from the Company's attorney, and that he (Morales) was calling a strike. Morales said he also told the men at the meeting:

> I had learned that the Company again had committed another Unfair Labor Practice by going directly to the employees without my knowledge and prior to giving the Union what was considered in their mind a final proposal.

Morales testified that after the strike began (on August 2) he attended additional bargaining sessions on August 3 and 20. The August 3 meeting took place, Morales said, [16] Morales said he expressed concern over the fact that there would be no agreement between August 1982 and January 1983, but he acknowledged that Michael had offered a "Letter of Understanding" covering such period.

[17] Morales stated later that he "felt that the company was not dealing in good faith" because it had sent "the kid [who] didn't have any experience in regards to a labor contract." Morales stated that Attorney Torrigino had "always been very polite with us."

[18] Morales said he had sought Picardo's held earlier in the month, telephoning him on two occasions about the time of the July 16 meeting when Mario was on vacation. Morales said he explained to Picardo in the first conversation that the contract was about to expire and that the parties were making no headway in the negotiations due to Michael's lack of knowledge. Morales said Picardo's response was:

> "Bob," he said, "it is my opinion," he said, "that you should get your 'f' signs and strike their asses because they don't want to listen to me." Also, he said, "I want you to know," he said, "that beginning August 1st," he said, "I am going on a one-month vacation and I don't give a shit."

at the Royal Inn at "South City" and was attended by Attorney Torrigino, Payton, himself, and a Federal mediator. Morales said he hand delivered a letter (G.C. Exh. 18) containing certain union proposals at that meeting. Morales stated that Michael agreed to a union proposal, set forth on another typewritten document (G.C. Exh. 33, displayed but returned to "my briefcase," he later explained because Michael "was backing away") that pertained to discharges and suspensions (identified as sec. 12 and providing for an employee to remain on the job if discharged). According to Morales, Michael stated the Union's proposal was "good" and "I accept this."

With respect to the August 20 meeting, Morales said the parties first met in the morning, and then in the afternoon he and Michael concluded an agreement in a private meeting. Initially the parties discussed "amnesty" for Respondent's "loyal employees" (replacements) and Respondent's recall of strikers. Morales said he "proceeded to explain" to Michael what amnesty meant and that as secretary-treasurer of the Union he could not give it; also that he (Morales) must demand that everyone on the picket line be allowed to return to work. Michael indicated that his father would not consider taking back five of the strikers, initially identified by Morales and confirmed by Michael to be the following: Merced Ramirez, Victor Ramirez, Pedro Navarro, Aurelio Navarro, and Leopold Perez. Navarro had filed "various" grievances against the Company, Morales said, including one which objected to Coastside's attempt to charge Navarro for the cost of a garbage can and another over the failure of the Company to pay overtime for washing equipment (trucks).[19] Morales testified that he took the lead that afternoon to settle the strike and requested, through the Federal mediator that was present, a private meeting with Michael—after asking and getting Michael's assurance that he had the power to act.

According to Morales, all of the outstanding issues were discussed in the private meeting,[20] including wages (Michael accepted one of two offers made by Morales "$1.55, and 55 and 55"), cost of living (dropped by Morales), washing of truck (dropped by Morales), pensions ("three nickels divided into three years"), and income protection (raised from $40 to $60) and dental plan (90 percent of the usual and customary fees), and they emerged from the meeting telling the mediator that was present that day: "It is over, and we cannot give you any specifics."

Before coming out of the meeting Morales said the two shook hands, Michael expressed his thanks, and Morales expressed his willingness to "help the company with the City Council politically and see that you get your raises, whatever you got coming." Michael then wrote his home phone number on the back of a business card and told Morales:

> Bob, I want you to call me tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. and I will tell you the time when your men should return to work.

Morales said he telephoned the following morning, a Saturday, as Michael had suggested and had a telephone conversation which he described as follows:

> At 10:30 a.m. in the morning I phoned him and I said . . . I am calling to definitely obtain the times when you want my men to go back to work. And he went silent and took, like, a few seconds. And I said, "What's wrong?" And he said, "My father did not buy it." And I said, "Jesus Christ, you mean to tell me that you are going to come back with the same bullshit all over again? You gave me to understand that you had power to act, that you had intentions of finalizing the contract, that you had the intention and that it will be over after we shook hands, that I was going to help the Company." "And now," I said, "you come out with this bullshit." And he said, "Bob," he said, "I apologize. I don't blame you for being upset." He said, "But, believe it or not, my father did not buy it." And I said, "You know, man, for being a lawyer you have no ethics." And I said, "You should not enter into any agreements ever to which you have no right on entering. But I told you we had an agreement on behalf of the Union." I told him, "I took the responsibility that I was going to live by my agreement, and what you are doing to me," I said, "you know, you have no class." And I hung up on the man.

Morales said he was very upset by his telephone conversation with Michael and on the following day, Sunday, August 21, called "my lawyer Bert Boltuch" to ask him to telephone Michael. To vouch for the fact that Boltuch did so, and declaring it as "not hearsay," Morales referred to a letter (R. Exh. 5) that Boltuch had sent to Michael.

Another bargaining session was thereafter held at the Royal Inn in South San Francisco on August 24. Morales said he requested the meeting, through Federal Mediator Glenn Bergerson, who attended the session, along with Morales, Jim Payton, and Attorney Torrigino. Again, Morales said he asked Michael whether he had power to act and Michael responded:

> I definitely have the power to act on behalf of the Company. I definitely have the power to sign a contract. I definitely have the power to finalize the existing situation that we have.

Attorney Torrigino proceeded to outline a company proposal or "settlement offer" which called for an increase in wages (70 cents effective August 1, 1982, 70 cents the second year, and 70 cents the third year), nothing on pensions; withdrawal of Cinco de Mayo holiday (denied on cross-examination, however); elimination of the "pay-off" for the 2 extra days of sick pay if not used; withdrawal of income protection plan (i.e., no increase); the 90-percent dental plan; 4 weeks' leave of absence for [19] Michael testified that the Company might take "some" strikers back but that only one vacancy existed at the time.

[20] Morales indicated matters previously agreed upon were also discussed, including these: sick leave, "Section 12" language, shoe allowances, holiday and vacation benefits, and the effective date of the contract.

funerals; and acceptance of the Union's section 12 (discharge and suspension) language, said to have been agreed to "on August 3rd and again on August 20." Michael also indicated there was no problem "on anything else that we had already agreed to," according to Morales who then asked the "main question: Will my men go back to work immediately?" In response Michael said that the Company did not want the men back, and Morales asked Michael if he were "making this as a condition of your package?" "Yes," he said, "My father does not want these people back." Morales testified that he then told Michael, "You are involving yourself in another unfair labor practice because you are making it as a condition of your offer." Morales indicated Michael changed his position at this point and extended an offer that would permit the strikers to return to work.[21] Quoting from Morales' direct examination:

> "Look, Bob," he said, "I tell you what I am going to do." He said, "If you stay within the scope of my economical offer that I am giving you, that will be no problem."

Morales indicated he summarized Michael's offer and once more asked if the Company would reinstate the strikers. And he said, "If you stay within these amounts," he said, "yes, we will take them back." Morales indicated in response that there was agreement but asked Michael if he would allow him "a few minutes with Jim Payton" to "play with the figures." Michael agreed, saying there was no more money to be had but that as long as the Union stayed "within the scope of the $2.10" (i.e., the "70, 70, and 70" wage offer), "you've got yourself a deal." Morales said he gave Michael his word, in front of Payton and the mediator, he would stay within the $2.10 and excused himself and Payton.[22] Morales said he worked out an arrangement in about 7 minutes staying within the $2.10, but was never given an opportunity to present it.[23] Morales said he called the mediator and Michael together and stated, "Okay, Michael, we got it." Before he was able to give him the sheet of paper showing Morales' figures, however, Michael announced that his father would not agree. Morales said he then told Michael, "You've got to be shitting me again . . . I can't believe it," and Michael said, "I apologize."

James Payton, business representative of the Charging Party Union, testified that he went to Respondent's premises a little after 4 p.m. on September 8 and, after seeing the employees on strike there (listed in G.C. Exh. 26), spoke to Lou Picardo, part owner of Respondent. Payton said he told Picardo that "we have a contract" and added: "The men are here, they're willing, they're ready and able to go to work."

Picardo said he would have to speak with "his attorney" and went back into the office. Five minutes later Picardo returned and stated that there was no contract. Payton said he asked Picardo if he were refusing to let the men return to work, and Picardo replied, "Yes, that's right." Payton said he then put up a picket line with signs that contained the words "unfair," "Coastside," and "strike."

Payton was later recalled by Respondent and was asked if the union membership voted on the Company's "final proposal" at the July 30 union meeting. Payton stated that no vote was taken, adding that in his opinion the Company had engaged in an unfair labor practice in giving out "2 different sets of proposals" that day. He confirmed that both he and Morales spoke at the meeting that day and that employees were told they were not properly informed as the proposal handed out to employees that day (G.C. Exh. 16) did not explain the "language proposals" that were contained in the final proposal that was sent to the Union (G.C. Exh. 17). Payton said that the employees did vote unanimously before July 30 to go out on strike.

Payton also testified that during the negotiations Morales had made an oral proposal concerning discharges which would allow a worker to remain on the job pending outcome of a grievance procedure. Attorney Torrigino did not like it at first but later accepted it. Payton said Morales showed the company attorney a typed proposal later, on August 3, and then put the paper back in his (Morales') briefcase.

Mario, Michael Torrigino, referred to during the trial as "Attorney Torrigino," "Michael" or simply as "Mike," said he was retained by Respondent's owners, his father and Lou Picardo, to represent them in negotiating a contract with Local 350 in 1982. He had had no prior experience in labor negotiations. Michael said he was authorized in early June by the owners to present "their terms" to the Union, agree to such terms, and reach compromises.

Michael stated that he conferred with the owners before the negotiations began on June 17, explained what he hoped to accomplished during the negotiations, and obtained "full authority to go after the goals that I stated." He said he reviewed with the owners a draft document with proposed language changes. Michael also indicated that he would confer with the owners after bargaining sessions and reduce to writing matters that had been agreed to (referring specifically to G.C. Exhs. 9, 10, 11, and 14).

According to Michael, at the first bargaining session, which was held at his office on June 17, he read the Union's initial proposal (G.C. Exh. 2) and asked union official Payton questions about it. (The Company's initial proposal, dated June 21 and received in evidence as G.C. Exh. 4, was being typed that day and was mailed later to [21] Responding to questions of the General Counsel on redirect concerning the August 24 meeting, Morales testified that Michael indicated that day that the Company would take back one striker. Morales said he rejected the offer and "told him that my condition will be that the company will have to take everyone back to work" because of the Company's unfair labor practices. Thereafter, Michael offered to take all of the men back if the Union would accept his money terms—i.e., "As long as you stay within the money wage offer, there'll be no problem"—but thereafter withdrew the offer after Morales conferred with Business Agent Payton "in the room alone." Morales stated later (on recross) that he wanted all of the strikers back "at that particular time because of the violence . . . at the picket line."

[22] Morales testified he "took five cents out of the second year and five cents out of the third year, borrowed ten cents from the two pennies" to increase the income protection plan, pension and payoff on the sick leave.

[23] On cross-examination Morales agreed that, as stated in his affidavit, before conferring with Payton privately on the figures he told Michael "to make phone calls, if he had to."

the Union, Michael said.) Michael said he asked if the Union was proposing a wage increase. Payton acknowledged that the Union's initial proposal overlooked such issue, and Payton indicated, as Michael recalled, that the Union would be requesting a $2 hourly raise.

Michael stated that his father accompanied him to the June 29 bargaining session. Morales joined Payton in representing the Union at this meeting and handed Michael General Counsel's Exhibit 7, the Union's ("We do not understand your position") response to the Company's initial proposal. Morales did not want to deal with "non-economic" or "language" issues, as Michael had proposed, and, after accusing the Company of not wanting an agreement, walked out of the room into a hallway, taking Payton with him. The union officials returned, however, after Michael asked whether they were refusing to bargain, and the parties then began to discuss the Company's initial proposal, item by item. The meeting ultimately adjourned with each side requesting written responses to the initial proposals of the other. Michael said he prepared a response (G.C. Exh. 11) on July 5 for the Union and received the Union's response (G.C. Exh. 13) at the next bargaining session held on July 12.[24]

Using notes to refresh his recollection, Michael indicated he thought an agreement was reached on certain matters at the July 12 meeting, including union security (secs. 2(a) and 2(b)); section 6(b), so "missed pickups" would be handled without extra compensation when occurring due to a crew's fault; and funeral leave (actually agreed to in Michael's July 5 letter). Other subjects were discussed, including the witnesseth clause (agreed to on July 21, he said) and the discharge and suspension and grievance and arbitration provisions.[25] Michael initially testified that he offered an additional holiday (making it 12 in all) on July 21, and that Morales responded, "Thank you. Let us go to the next point." Later he indicated that he made the offer on July 28 when Federal Mediator Glen Bergerson was in attendance. In any event, Michael claimed that Morales never said he would drop the demand for additional holidays.

Michael testified that the Company had wanted to revise the grievance and arbitration language so as to make it clear who should give notice and when. Michael indicated the subject had been pursued earlier, but on July 28 Morales "stormed out" of the bargaining session that day while the topic was being discussed. According to Michael, Morales maintained the Company was not bargaining in good faith, that it was changing positions and "he was going to call a strike."[26] Michael stated that he then undertook to prepare the Company's "last, best, and final offer" (G.C. Exh. 17) and submitted it on July 30 to Federal Mediator Bergerson. Michael said he asked the mediator to call Morales and try to arrange a meeting that day, but none took place.[27]

Michael testified that he was made aware of the Union's July 29 telegram that was sent to the Company's office indicating to him, he said, that the Union was willing to negotiate with Picardo.

The parties met again on Tuesday, August 3, the day after the Union went out on strike. Certain issues were resolved, including dental, holidays, shoe allowance (equipment), and truck washing (guaranteed hours) that day, but several issues remained unresolved—i.e., income protection, pension, vacations, discharge and suspension, garbage cans, wages, and sick leave.[28]

Michael stated that during the August 6 bargaining session he handed Morales a letter (G.C. Exh. 20) which withdrew all offers because "the rules of the game" had changed: employees had gone on strike and put the Company to inconvenience and expense. Michael said he did not present the letter at the beginning of the meeting but did so after giving the Union another chance to accept the Company's final offer of July 30.

Michael recalled meeting with the Union and a Federal mediator on August 20, but he did not believe that amnesty was discussed first (as Morales had testified). Michael said he had a private caucus that day with the mediator and during such meeting spoke by telephone with the Company's counsel, "John" Harper. According to Michael, Morales had insisted that "all my men have to go back to work immediately," and the response Michael gave was to the effect that:

> . . . the company was not willing to fire people that we had hired to permanently replace the strikers; that we would place them on a preferential hiring list and call them back as vacancies occurred.

[24] Testifying on cross-examination, Michael stated that the "ranting and raving" by Morales at the June 29 meeting caused him to believe that Morales had not read the Company's initial proposal. Michael said Morales "was ranting and raving and insulting me at virtually every instance" during the negotiations. Michael agreed that he had drawn a distinction between language and economic proposals, but he denied that he had insisted that his language changes must be first accepted. Michael also denied that he had maintained that the Company's initial proposal to reduce holidays and pension contributions involved only language changes. He said he had explained that a change in discharge and suspension language "would be worth X amount of money," but he acknowledged that the language changes he sought would have resulted only in minimal savings to the Company.

[25] Michael said the discharge and suspension language was a recurring issue during the negotiations. He said Morales never submitted language on the subject before the strike, although Morales later showed him a written proposal (G.C. Exh. 33) on August 3 and asked Michael to sign it. Michael said he told Morales at that time he would sign it "right now" if it would settle the strike, but Morales balked, saying the Union wanted more money and there were other issues. Michael said he never agreed to the Union's proposal that a discharged employee could stay on the payroll "until a discharge was decided."

[26] On cross-examination Michael agreed, after reviewing his negotiating notes and the letter he wrote on July 28, that there were a number of issues outstanding when the parties convened that day. Michael denied agreement had been reached on sec. 12, discharges and suspensions (or apparently on sec. 23, settlement of disputes, either for that matter) as Morales had maintained.

[27] Michael also explained on cross-examination that he "dropped off" a copy of G.C. Exh. 16, the document that was handed out to employees summarizing the Company's offer, around 11 a.m. that day. He said he wanted the employees to have the information before the union meeting that was scheduled to take place that afternoon. Michael stated that there was not enough time to prepare a Spanish translation of the Company's offer.

[28] G.C. Exh. 18, the Union's August 3 letter addressed to President Mario Torrigino, sets forth the Union's view of the status of negotiations at the start of the session on health and welfare (income and dental care), pension, guaranteed hours, holidays, vacations, discharges and suspensions, equipment, sick leave, and classifications and wage rates.

There was a "joint session" that day, Michael said, and the mediator asked the Union its position, as he requested, on "the issue of mutual forgiveness regarding any lawsuits and charges that were pending" and "the issue of amnesty" for the Company's "loyal" nonstrikers. The Union responded that it could not grant amnesty, that it did not control the district attorney insofar as any pending criminal charges may be involved and by reiterating its position on the issue of the return of strikers—i.e., that "all of their people" must be put back to work immediately. Mike had said he repeated his offer to use a "preferential hiring list and take them back as vacancies occurred." It was "at that juncture," Michael said, that Morales asked for a confidential "private off-the-record discussion."

A private meeting between Morales and Michael followed and, according to Michael, each voiced his respective position concerning reinstatement of the strikers and the problems each had in representing his particular principals. Morales accepted (i.e., "reaffirmed" agreement on) Michael's offer of an additional holiday and truck washing proposal, offered Michael "two alternatives on the wages," and expressed a desire for a dental plan and immediate reinstatement of the strikers. Michael did not recall anything being said about discharge and suspension language. He was surprised, he said, at the progress made and told Morales that he would recommend approval of the "economic" changes that had been discussed. The relations had become "very cordial," Michael said, and "it looked like we were going [to] wrap things up."[29] Michael recalled that Morales talked "about helping us with the City." Michael said he declined to call the owners that day as Morales suggested. Michael said he wanted to sit down with the owners in the hope of getting "them to come up" with additional money. Michael gave Morales his business card, which bore his home number on the back, and Morales agreed to call on the following morning. Michael met with the owners[30] that night, he said, but had to tell Morales the following morning, Saturday, August 21, when the latter telephoned around 10:30, that he was "sorry" but "they would not buy it." Michael said he told Morales that the Union was asking for "too much money," and the company "won't fire all of their replacements." Michael said he told Morales that he would get back to him later, but before he did so the Union's attorney, Burton Boltuch, telephoned on the following day, Sunday, around 10:30 or 11 a.m. Boltuch inquired, according to Michael, "why the company did not accept the agreement that had been reached on the 20th." Michael denied that any agreement had been reached and told Boltuch: "Look, the issues are money, and the company won't fire everybody like Morales wants them to." Boltuch suggested, Michael said, that there were different "ways to treat the replacements," but Michael responded that the Company would not fire all of the replacements.[31]

The parties met again, with a Federal mediator present, at the Royal Inn in South San Francisco on August 24. After meeting privately with the mediator, Michael made an offer on behalf of the Company to the Union, as follows:

> Bob, I have an offer, and I believe it is better than what we had been doing. I want you to consider it. The company is willing to offer seventy cents in the first year; seventy cents in the second year; seventy cents in the third year in wages. And I said, "In addition to that the company is willing to leave on the table the dental plan; because we understand that's something that is very important to the union. However, in return for the increase in wages, I am removing from the company's offer the holiday, the pension increase, and I verified that the two days of sick leave that we had offered would be without pay-off, and vacations would stay the same." And, I made a preface, a comment that we would offer the money, the money, the dental plan, and, then, all of the other fringes, which were cost items to the company, would stay the same.

Morales indicated he was pleased with the offer and asked what the Company's position was with respect to recall of the strikers. Michael responded by explaining that "this economic offer was in conjunction with our prior position that the . . . replacements would not be terminated and the strikers would not be returned imme-

[29] Michael explained on cross-examination that he was initially authorized to offer a wage increase of 10 cents–5cents–5 cents per hour over a 3-year period on July 21, which amount he could increase by negotiating a cost-saving provision (e.g., discharge language that would allow termination for cause without utilization of a procedure requiring warning letters). On July 28 he was authorized to offer 60 cents, 60 cents, and 60 cents but "we did not get to that point." On August 20 Michael stayed with the Company's "last, best, and final" offer of "seventy, sixty-five, sixty-five," but Morales was wanting more in wages, suggesting 70 cents–75 cents–75 cents or an alternative amount with fringe benefits. Michael said Morales made proposals that day "on just about everything" so that he had a total package to present to his father. Michael stated that Morales made termination of replacements and immediate recall of the strikers a condition of agreement, explaining that "the contract was worthless without it."

[30] But on cross-examination Michael said he was not sure that Lou Picardo attended the meeting with Torrigino Senior on the night of August 20.

[31] It was later stipulated that Charging Party's attorney Burton Boltuch would testify, if called as a witness, essentially as follows: Boltuch telephone Michael Torrigino on Sunday, August 22, after Morales had telephoned Boltuch and reported that he felt that the parties had reached an agreement on August 20. Morales had reported that he felt that when the strikers were coming back was the only issue left open, and Morales was to learn that fact on Saturday, August 21, when he was to call Michael. Morales had also reported to Boltuch that he had called Michael on August 21 and was told by Michael that there was no contract and that strikers could not return. Boltuch inquired of Michael concerning the Company's position and whether he had authority to negotiate. Michael in response indicated the agreement of August 20 was "tentative," that he did have authority to negotiate and that the owners, his father and Picardo, were the only ones who knew why there was no agreement. Michael did indicate, however, that money and the immediate return of the strikers were involved in the Company's decision. Boltuch asked that principals, with authority to finalize settlement, be brought to a negotiating session, and Michael, in response, suggested that all union members should also appear. Boltuch told Michael that the Union wanted to conclude an agreement, independent of the strike replacement issue, and indicated as much in a letter to Michael (R. Exh. 5) which he immediately prepared and mailed himself.

Michael testified that he was irritated by Boltuch's telephone call on Sunday, August 22, and he felt that he was being set up for a charge. Michael stated that Boltuch disavowed being a negotiator for the Union but refused to say so in writing.

diately." In response to Morales' inquiry about how many strikers could return right away under the company proposal, Michael said he believed that there was one opening at that time. After some quizzing of Michael by the mediator, Morales asked Michael: "If I accept your proposal, can I play with the money . . . move it around?" Michael agreed that he could as long as the cost to the Company was not increased. Morales asked for time "to work the figures" and suggested that Michael call his father to find out how many strikers could return. Michael said he then spoke by telephone with the company owners, first with his father, and then Lou Picardo, who stated: "We are not going to fire anybody." Michael said he returned to the "meeting room" and told Morales that no vacancies existed. Thereupon Morales accused Michael of reneging on an agreement, of being unethical and of wasting Morales' time. Morales proceeded to tell the mediator what the Union had offered—"a dollar, fifty-five, fifty-five; seventy-five, seventy-five, seventy-five; and, the fringe benefits"—during the private meeting between Morales and Michael on August 20 and left. Michael stated that another bargaining session was held on September 7, but he gave no details concerning it.

I reject Respondent's contentions advanced in support of "The Due Process Issue." Respondent had due notice of the charges against it and had the opportunity to appear at the hearing, present evidence, and be fully heard. Consequently Respondent has had its day in court and has not been denied due process or any procedural statutory right. See Green Spring Dairy v. CIR, 208 F.2d 471 (4th Cir. 1953).

The Administrative Procedure Act does afford certain procedural safeguards, including the assurance of a lawful investigation, and it is well established, as Respondent asserts, that an agency must abide by its own rules and regulations. However, section 5(b) of the Administrative Procedure Act, relied on by Respondent, only requires that an informal means of settlement be made available. See Teamsters Local 282 v. NLRB, 339 F.2d 795 (2d. Cir. 1964). Further, the guidelines in the General Counsel's Casehandling Manual on which Respondent relies, sections 10056.3 and 10056.4, are not rules or regulations which the Board is empowered to enforce.[32] Section 3(d) of the Act provides that the General Counsel "shall have final authority, on behalf of the Board, in respect of the investigation of charges and issuance of complaint." Section 101.4 of the Board's Statements of Procedure, subpart B, states:

> As part of the investigation hereinafter mentioned, the person against whom the charge is filed, hereinafter called the Respondent, is asked to submit a statement of his position in respect to the allegations. The case is assigned for investigation to a member of the field staff, who interviews representatives of the parties and other persons who have knowledge as to the charges, as is deemed necessary . . . The regional director may in his discretion dispense with any portion of the investigation described in this section as appears necessary to him in consideration of such factors as the amount of time necessary to complete a full investigation, the nature of the proceeding, and the public interest. [Emphasis added.]

See Pacific Southwest Airlines v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 1032, (9th Cir. 1978). The Accardi doctrine announced in United States ex rel Accardi v. Shaughnessy, 347 U.S. 260 (1953), thus, has no application to the case at bar.

It is to be noted that the General Counsel has only issued a complaint, and it must be dismissed if the evidence does not sustain the allegations. None of the Board cases cited by Respondent are apposite to the case at bar. Electronic Components Corp. v. NLRB, 546 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1976), involved a summary Board order, issued without a hearing, directing an employer to bargain with a union which had been certified by the Board without an investigation of the employer's objections to an election as required by Section 102.69(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. NLRB v. Western Cartridge Co., 138 F.2d 551 (2d Cir. 1943), involved "conduct" of the Board's trial examiner, and Texas Instruments v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 1067 (1st Cir. 1979), involved an "ALJ's lack of analysis" in writing a decision, giving the "appearance of stacking the deck."

I reject the contention of the General Counsel and the Charging Party Union that Respondent failed to give its bargaining representative, Michael Torrigino, sufficient authority as alleged in paragraph 13 in the complaint. In their briefs, the General Counsel and the Union argue that Respondent sent to the bargaining table an inexperienced and incompetent negotiator who had no authority to consummate an agreement. They further maintain that the record establishes that Respondent never intended to reach an agreement with the Union. These contentions, and all arguments advanced in support of the 8(a)(5) and (1) charges, are likewise rejected.

Section 8(d) of the Act defines the duty to bargain collectively as "the mutual obligation . . . to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement." Such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or to make a concession. NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395 (1952). The essential element in the bargaining principle is the serious intent of the parties to reach a common ground. Romo Paper Products Corp., 220 NLRB 519 (1975).

A determination of whether a respondent has met the good-faith bargaining standard requires consideration of the totality of the respondent's conduct. M. R. & R. Trucking Co., 178 NLRB 167 (1969), enfd. in part 434 F.2d 689 (5th Cir. 1970); and NLRB v. Insurance Agents, 361 U.S. 477 (1960).

[32] Cf. Gulf State Mfrs. v. NLRB, 579 F.2d 1298 (5th Cir. 1978). The administrative law judge and the Board in that case had allowed the General Counsel to proceed on charges (as being "reinstated") even though they had been withdrawn with prejudice and were time barred by sec. 10(b). The court of appeals denied enforcement of the Board's decision on this aspect of the case, noting that sec. 10120.5 of the Casehandling Manual prohibited such action. The court pointed out that violation of the Board's "own internal procedures" in that case did adversely affect Respondent's rights, depriving it of its 10(b) defense.

Although an employer is not required to be represented by an individual possessing final authority to enter into an agreement, this is subject to a limitation that it does not act to inhibit the progress of negotiations. Carpenters Local 780, 244 NLRB 277 (1979). The degree of authority possessed by the negotiator is a factor which may be considered in determining good-faith bargaining. Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Co. v. NLRB, 216 F.2d 273 (9th Cir. 1954).

While "tentative" agreements are not necessarily subject to being withdrawn at any time for any reason, agreements reached on individual items during negotiations are not necessarily final and binding. NLRB v. Alterman Transport Lines, 587 F.2d 212 (5th Cir. 1979). Quoting from the court's decision in Alterman at 221:

> As we have observed before, "probably in few other instances is the task of judging so difficult" than determining whether a party has fulfilled its duty "to enter into discussions with an open and fair mind, and a sincere purpose to find a basis of agreement . . . . The truth is that objective standards are generally either unavailable or unavailing. And conduct done at one time judicially ascertained to manifest good faith, may, under other circumstances, be a mere pretense." NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 5 Cir., 1960, 275 F.2d 229, 231.

While Michael Torrigino had no labor negotiating experience prior to meeting with the Union's officials in June 1982, it can hardly be said that he was an incompetent negotiator. The record discloses that Michael was a licensed attorney and had prepared himself for meeting with union representatives by obtaining and examining copies of contracts used in the scavenger industry. He conferred with a family friend, an official of another Union (IBEW), who furnished him with relevant materials to study. He conferred with the Company's two owners and advised them from time to time concerning the negotiations. Michael testified credibly that he was authorized by the owners to represent the Company during the negotiations and to make compromises and agreements in accord with terms that had been discussed. Michael was not granted absolute or unlimited authority, but that fact did not convict Respondent of bad-faith bargaining.

Mario Torrigino, Respondent's president and principal owner, was unquestionably unhappy with employees Merced Ramirez, Victor Ramirez, and Aurelio Navarro because of the backpay the Company was required to pay them, and for that reason sought to change the discharge and suspension language so it could exercise "the prerogatives of management." But it was not bad-faith bargaining for the Company to seek such change.[33]

Respondent was, of course, obviously concerned with economics—as was the Union—and sought to lower costs in a number of ways. But having such an objective and attempting to accomplish it did not amount to bad-faith bargaining.[34] The Company sought a number of concessions intially on pension contributions, vacations, and holidays and admittedly did not propose a wage increase until July 21 (and only a modest one then) when an additional holiday was proposed.[35] The Company had discussed various proposals and made concessions and/or agreements on a number of issues, including hours of work, rest and lunch, leased equipment, and additional holidays. When employees went on strike, however, there had been no agreement on wages, discharges and suspension, equipment, or on grievances and arbitration.

The Union's conduct is also relevant and must be considered. See Continental Nut Co., 195 NLRB 841 (1972); also Times Publishing Co., 72 NLRB 676 (1947). It is to be noted that Morales undertook to "educate" Respondent's spokesman, Michael Torrigino, about labor relations—what a negotiator could do and not do, what constituted unfair labor practices, and unlawful demands. Morales' walking out of negotiations on June 29 and again on July 28 did not help the Union's or the General Counsel's cause. At the June 29 session Morales responded to Michael's efforts to discuss what Michael regarded as noneconomic or language issues as "bullshit" and briefly walked out with his union colleague James Payton. Morales and Payton walked out again on July 28 with Morales maintaining that Michael had attempted to change some things that had been "previously settled." The Union sought to avoid dealing with Respondent's designated bargaining representative on two occasions by going to the Company's vice president and part owner Lou Picardo and asking that he, rather than Michael, bargain with the Union.

The Union, to be sure, also made concessions and agreed to a number of company proposals, but it is to be noted that the Union had adhered to its positions with respect to additional holidays and discharge and suspension language. Morales claimed that Michael had agreed [33] The General Counsel and the Charging Party maintain that Mario Torrigino pressed for the language change so the Company could terminate employees at will. Such assertion is based on the testimony of union official Morales as to what Torrigino said and what the latter meant by it. Morales was hardly an unbiased witness, and, in any event, I reject such assertion. The Company had a right, as Respondent suggests in its brief, to hold and voice an opinion that it should have the power to discharge an employee for cause, contrary to what the arbitrator found in the case of Victor Ramirez, without first having to dispatch warning letters within a specified time period.

Respondent also points out in its brief that the principal owner, Mario Torrigino, attended bargaining sessions on July 17 and 29, and July 26 and 28 prior to the strike, the last being when "extensive discussions on economic items" were held. (The General Counsel claims erroneously that Mario "apparently" attended only two sessions.) Curiously, and inconsistently, one paragraph of the complaint alleges Respondent's bargaining representative had insufficient authority between June and September 1982 to bind Respondent but elsewhere avers that Respondent refused to agree to terms or execute contracts that had been negotiated for it in August. Also, the Charging Party maintains at one point in its brief that "the company never delegated sufficient authority to Michael Torrigino" prior to the strike but suggests subsequently therein that Michael had more than enough authority on June 29 and July 26 when he ordered his father, the principal owner of Respondent, "to 'shut up.'"

[34] The Union and the General Counsel refer to Respondent's proposals as "radical" and "outrageously one-sided," implying that they were unlawful per se.

[35] An additional increase was proposed before the strike by letter on July 28. Michael said he submitted the wage proposal at the July 28 bargaining session and was authorized to increase it. Morales and Payton walked out of the meeting, however, so it was not discussed.

in July to the Union's proposal that would require retention of a discharged employee on the Company's payroll, but I find otherwise.[36]

The Company's "last, best and final offer" of July 30 in the form of a hand-delivered letter modified its position on discharge and suspension (with the Company agreeing to a provision requiring three offenses within 6 months and issuance of two warnings except for certain specified offenses) and indicated agreement on a number of items. The letter (G.C. Exh. 17) indicated Respondent was willing to meet and "discuss these matters" but noted that "since you walked out of our last meeting we will leave it up to you to propose another time and place and to notify Mr. Bergerson." The sending of such letter and the distribution of a different "final offer on economic matters" to employees 2 or 3 hours earlier prompted Morales to call a strike against Respondent "on the basis of Unfair Labor Practices." The General Counsel and the Union maintain that sending of the different "final offer" to employees was an attempt to bypass the bargaining representative and deal directly with the employees, constituting a separate 8(a)(5) violation, but I reject such contention.

In Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co., 160 NLRB 334 (1966), the Board stated:

> As a matter of settled law, Section 8(a)(5) does not, on a per se basis, preclude an employer from communicating, in noncoercive terms, with employees during collective-bargaining negotiations. The fact that an employer chooses to inform employees of the status of negotiations, or of proposals previously made to the Union, or of its version of a breakdown in negotiations will not alone establish a failure to bargain in good faith [citing NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 118 F.2d 874 (1st Cir. 1941)].

General Counsel's Exhibit 16, the document distributed to Respondent's employees, outlined the Company's major proposals that were sent by letter to the union office. General Counsel's Exhibit 16 in no way disparaged the Union of its bargaining representative status, was not coercive, and amounted to "no more than a legitimate tactic of urging the employees to communicate with their representative, to persuade them to tell their negotiators they wanted them to accept the company's newest offer." See Safeway Trails, 216 NLRB 951 (1975); also Wantagh Auto Sales, 177 NLRB 150 (1969).[37] Respondent, to be sure, opened itself up to suspicion of bad-faith bargaining by distributing General Counsel's Exhibit 16, but it did not rise above that. See Stanley Oil Co., 213 NLRB 219 (1974).

There is nothing in the record to suggest Michael had any less authority, or insufficient authority, to represent the Company after the strike. Nor is there proof that Respondent bargained in bad faith after August 2. The Union agreed on August 3 to the Company's proposals on holidays, dental plan, guaranteed hours, and equipment, but the amount of pension contribution and wages remained outstanding that day and on August 6 when the parties met again. Nonagreement is not to be equated to bad faith, however. The Company withdrew "all offers" on August 6, but it did so lawfully because of the change of circumstances resulting from the Union's strike. See Times-Herald, 249 NLRB 13 (1980).[38]

A finding that agreement was reached on August 20 and again on August 24 requires acceptance of Morales' testimony over Michael's, and I am unable to do so. Michael testified that he was "surprised" and "shocked" at how reasonable Morales had been in the "private session" the two had together on August 20, but Michael explained that the Union's demands were still "in excess of what the company's current position" was at that time. Michael told Morales that he would recommend that the Company accept the Union's offer, and he did so. Morales surely understood Michael's response for Morales asked Michael to call his father immediately to get approval. The August 22 letter of union counsel supports Michael's version as it recites that a "tentative agreement" was reached and Michael "would recommend it to the owners of the company."

As for reaching an agreement on August 24, Michael's version of the meetings held that day is also more credible than Morales'. There is no dispute about the fact that Michael withdrew the offers of an additional holiday, the payoff of 2 days of sick leave, and the increased contribution to the pension plan in return for an increased wage offer, and that Morales indicated an interest in the revised offer. Morales then inquired about the return of the strikers, a subject Michael said he had not recently discussed with the company owners. Michael made it clear to Morales before the latter met privately with Business Representative Payton to "play with the figures," that it wuld be necessary to make further consultation about the return of the strikers. I do not credit Morales' assertion that Michael undertook to give assurance that there would be "no problem" in the recall of all the strikers if the Union were to simply stay within the money terms of the offer made on behalf of the Company that day. Michael told Morales that the Company was not going to fire the replacements. Morales was bound to have known that Michael would have had to get clearance on the reinstatement of the strikers.[39]

[36] The correspondence does not indicate such agreement was reached. See G.C. Exh. 17, Attorney Torrigino's July 30, 1982 letter to the Union. Union Business Respresentative Payton gave equivocal but unpersuasive support to Morales' claim that agreement had been reached on this issue. Payton stated that Michael had indicated on July 16 that he did not like the Union's proposal but "later changed his mind." He indicated he was not sure when Michael changed his mind and acknowledged that the Union's proposal in writing (typed) was shown to Michael later on August 3—and only briefly, with Morales handing Michael a typed document across the table and then taking it back. Michael testified that Morales "reiterated" an oral proposal that discharged employees could "stay on the payroll until a discharge was decided" at some point ("I'm not certain that it was on July 12"). Michael asserted that he never agreed to the Union's proposal, although he said he did not tell Morales on August 3, when shown it in typed form, that he would "sign this agreement right now if that will settle the strike." Michael said Morales rejected the offer: "[Morales] said, 'No way. We want more money.' And that there were a lot of other issues."

[37] Morales indicated great concern over the differences between G.C. Exh. 16 and G.C. Exh. 17. In explaining the differences, however, his major complaint was that G.C. Exh. 16 was incomplete and did not inform employees of everything that was set forth in the letter sent to the Union (i.e., details as to cost to employees under the dental plan, washing of trucks, increase of probationary period for new employees, employee cost for packing cans if more than two should be needed, lower rate of pay if reassigned to lower seniority class, and shoe allowance). Morales did note that G.C. Exh. 17 did not refer to additional sick and funeral leave mentioned in G.C. Exh. 16.

[38] Quoting the decision in Hickinbotham Bros., 254 NLRB 96 (1981): "A strike is a two-edged sword. Depending upon how it affects the employer's operations, the strikers may gain concessions or they may lose concessions previously obtained." Here, as in Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Company, supra, the Union was operating on a "take-it-or-leave-it basis," and calling of a strike contributed to the failure to reach an agreement.

I find that the record shows that the parties did not reach a complete agreement on August 20 or on August 24 as alleged in the complaint or at any other time. Accordingly, the "Heinz remedy" sought by the General Counsel is not appropriate.[40]

The complaint alleges Respondent refused unlawfully, contrary to Section 8(a)(3), reinstatement of striking employees following their unconditional offer to return to work about August 21 and that since that date Respondent has unlawfully demanded, contrary to Section 8(a)(5), that such employees waive their right to reinstatement.

Insisting that the Union waive reinstatement of strikers as a condition of reaching agreement would have been unlawful, of course. See Lytron, Inc., 207 NLRB 554 (1973); Masonic Home, 215 NLRB 75 (1974), enfd. 548 F.2d 1276 (6th Cir. 1976); and American Cyanamid Co., 235 NLRB 1316 (1978), enfd. 592 F.2d 356 (7th Cir. 1979). But, contrary to what Morales testified and the argument of the General Counsel and the Charging Party, Michael did not impose such a condition, either on August 20 or 24. Morales sought to make it appear that Michael was doing so, but the record persuades me that the only demand made was that of Morales—that the strikers be returned immediately as a condition of any agreement. Such demand by Morales was not an unqualified offer that the strikers would return to work. Michael's saying no to such request of Morales, moreover, did not constitute an imposition of an unlawful condition.

Here again Michael's testimony is more reliable than that of Morales. Michael testified that on August 20 he told Morales, following Morales' demand that the men must go back to work immediately and after Michael had spoken to the Company's labor counsel by telephone, that the Company would not fire replacements but would place the strikers on a preferential hiring list. On August 24 Michael repeated what the Company's position was on the return of the strikers when Morales asked about the number of openings at the time—"replacements would not be terminated and the strikers would not be returned immediately."

The Union, through Payton, did make an unconditional offer to return the strikers on September 8. I reject the contention that Morales made an unconditional offer on any earlier occasion. Neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Party press the point in their briefs that an unconditional offer was made by the Union prior to that date, each only maintaining that such an offer was made by the Union through Payton about September 8 "at the very latest."[41]

I do not find that Respondent's conduct either caused or prolonged the strike, called by Morales on August 2, as the complaint alleges. The Charging Party contends that Respondent's prestrike conduct violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and "therefore" caused the strike to be "an unfair labor practice strike from its inception." The General Counsel contends that the strike was an unfair labor strike for a number of reasons—i.e., Respondent's alleged "direct dealing," Michael's alleged lack of authority, the Company's alleged intent not to agree, and Respondent's late "miniscule" economic proposal. I have previously considered and rejected such contentions. The allegation was not sustained.

Respondent's striking employees, even though economic strikers, did, and do, have a right to be recalled and reinstated when vacancies occur. Laidlaw Corp., supra. The record does not disclose, however, that Respondent had violated the Act by failing to recall or reinstate such strikers after the Union made an unqualifiifed offer of their return on September 8.[42] The Charging Party maintains that Michael Torrigino admitted that there was "at least" one opening on September 8, but I do not so interpret his testimony. Michael stated that the Company did not actually know how many of its employees went out on strike (Perez and Castellanos were on vacation at the time the strike began) but, pressed on cross-examination to testify from memory ("off the top of my head") as to when the permanent replacements were hired, indicated that seven or eight were replaced on August 13 and that all of the strikers had been replaced by sometime in early September. Said Michael:

> It was sometime in September—in, in the first—after the first week of September, yeah.

Michael explained that one of the replacements was later discharged and replaced in November by one of the strikers. Such testimony does not provide an adequate basis for finding Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to recall economic strikers at a time when they had signified the requisite willingness to return to work. Nor do the "job vacancies of up to a week's duration" occurring in November and December 1982, which were filled [39] Morales agreed on cross-examination, after being shown on his affidavit, that he had insisted that Michael make any necessary telephone calls about the return of strikers.

[40] In H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514 (1941), the Supreme Court held that an employer's obligation to bargain in good faith included a duty to sign a written agreement embodying terms that had been agreed upon. But in H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 (1970), the Court held that the Board could not compel an employer to sign a contract containing a checkoff provision that had not been agreed to—even though the record indicated bad-faith bargaining on the employer's part by repeatedly refusing to bargain on the issue.

[41] Economic strikers are, of course, entitled to reinstatement when they unconditionally offer to return to their jobs if they have not been replaced, and later, although replaced, if available when there is a job opening. See Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970).

[42] The failure to reinstate economic strikers falls sufficiently within the ambit of par. 17 and 18, in my view, although the complaint alleges Respondent "caused and prolonged" the strike, which averment I find not sustained. The complaint does not allege, and the record does not establish, as the General Counsel asserts, that the strikers were unlawfully discharged.

by temporary workers Dorris Matter, James Frances, and Jay Lourenco, facts stipulated to and relied on by the General Counsel, establish an unlawful failure or refusal to reinstate economic strikers. Contrary to the General Counsel's argument, I find the meager information in the record concerning the work performed by these three individuals named is not sufficient to permit a determination that any of them were placed in job vacancies that had to have been offered to a striker. Certified Corp., 241 NLRB 369 (1979), holds, contrary to what the General Counsel maintains, that the temporary nature of a job is a critical factor in determining whether it is "substantially equivalent" to what position a striker had held.[43]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Coastside Scavenger Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Sanitary Truck Drivers and Helpers Local 350, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All drivers, helpers, and mechanics employed by Respondent at its Pacifica, California facility, excluding clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act, constitute an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. The strike which commenced about August 2, 1982, by the Union against Respondent has at all times been, and remains, an economic strike.

5. Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practice alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[44]

ORDER

It is ordered that the complaint issued against Coastside Scavenger Company is dismissed.

[43] And see Randall v. NLRB, 687 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1982), which cites both Certified Corp., supra, and Bancroft Cap Co., 245 NLRB 547 (1979) (discussed by the General Counsel). After citing Certified Corp., the court stated: "The existence of a temporary job is not the equivalent of a vacancy to which a striker should have been reinstated."

[44] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 10 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Michael D. Stevenson issued the attached decision. The judge issued an Erratum on 21 February 1984. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief. On 25 June 1984 the Board issued an Order remanding the proceeding to the judge for additional findings and conclusions. On 3 July 1984 the judge issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision, the supplemental decision, and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to sign and by repudiating a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. The Respondent contends it had no obligation to sign or honor the alleged agreement because prior to the commencement of bargaining the parties agreed that any agreement reached would not be effective and no agreement would be executed until a pending decertification petition was resolved. We find merit in the Respondent's contention.

For many years the Respondent and the Union have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements. The most recent agreement expired on 31 December 1981. Negotiations for a successor agreement continued into 1982[1] when on 11 August a petition to decertify the Union was filed in Case 20-RD-1759.[2] Negotiations were temporarily suspended on filing of the petition. About 19 August the Union's attorney Anne Andrews contacted the Respondent's attorney Richard Loftus Jr. to seek to persuade the Respondent to resume bargaining in light of the Board's recently issued decision in RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982). After further discussion with Andrews later that month, Loftus agreed that negotiations could resume. In these discussions Andrews and Loftus specifically addressed the framework for the resumption of negotiations. Thus, the credited testimony of Loftus is that he informed Andrews that negotiations could resume but, in view of the pending decertification petition, "the union might not represent a majority of the employees and we could not execute a contract in that circumstance, and that until that impediment was resolved in some way, we could not execute an agreement." Loftus testified further that he informed Andrews that, if an agreement were reached, "it would be executive [sic] and effective after this impediment, this problem, this petition, was resolved." It is undisputed that in these discussions Andrews agreed with the representations set forth by Loftus.

On 30 August the parties resumed negotiations. Within a few weeks substantial agreement was reached on the remaining bargaining issues, and on October bargaining unit employees ratified the agreement as reached. By letter of 28 October the Union stated to the Respondent that "[i]f we prevail in the decertification election" the Union desired to rebuild the relationship between labor and management. The Union's next correspondence to the Respondent was on 27 December when it noted that numerous employees had yet to acquire membership in the Union under the union-security provision of the agreement. On 3 January 1983 the Respondent declined to comply with the union-security provision and noted that "a serious question exists as to whether or not there is an enforceable contract in place." On 7 January 1983 the Union insisted that a binding agreement was in effect. On 14 January 1983 the Respondent stated that unless and until the Union was certified as bargaining representative there was no effective contract between the Union and the Respondent.

Based on the foregoing, the judge concluded that the discussions between Andrews and Loftus prior to the resumption of bargaining were nothing more than an exchange of legal opinion between counsel concerning current Board law. He found they failed to reach an agreement that any subsequently negotiated collective-bargaining agreement would not be effective and would not be executed until the pending decertification petition was resolved. Accordingly, the judge concluded that the parties reached full and complete agreement on a new contract and that the Respondent violated the Act by thereafter refusing to sign it and honor its terms. Although finding that Andrews and Loftus reached no binding agreement affecting the legal obligations of the parties, the judge also found that the parties intended a binding agreement to result "as soon as the decertification petition was resolved, or as soon as the failure to resolve the decertification petition was no longer a legal barrier to execution of the contract, whichever condition occurred first." It therefore appears that the judge concluded on the one hand that the parties agreed to no conditions affecting their legal obligations and at the same time concluded that they agreed to two alternative conditions affecting their obligations. As set forth below, we find that the judge erred in both respects and that the parties in fact agreed to one "condition"—a circumstance that admittedly had not arisen at the time of the alleged unfair labor practices.

[1] All dates are in 1982 unless noted otherwise.

[2] On 1 December 1982 a decertification election was held in Case 20-RD-1759. Because of challenged ballots and unopened mail ballots the election was not immediately determinative. Following the filing of objections to the conduct of the election and consideration of the determinative challenged ballots, the Board issued a decision on 29 August 1984 in KCRA-TV, 271 NLRB 1288 (1984). In its decision the Board remanded the proceeding to the Regional Director with directions to open and count certain ballots and to either certify the results or conduct a second election depending on the status of the opened ballots.

In RCA Del Caribe, above, the Board found that the mere filing of a representation petition by an outside challenging union would no longer require or permit an employer to withdraw from bargaining or executing a contract with an incumbent union. Thereafter, in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), the Board applied this rule to the filing of a decertification petition.[3] Neither RCA Del Caribe nor Dresser, however, addressed itself to whether an employer and an incumbent union may establish by mutual agreement their own framework for collective bargaining, including deferral of the effective and execution date of any agreement reached. We find that this is precisely what the parties agreed to in this case.

The credited testimony of the Respondent's attorney Loftus establishes that, prior to the resumption of bargaining and before issuance of the Board's decision in Dresser, counsel for the Respondent and counsel for the Union began discussions on an essential predicate for bargaining—the agreement's effective and execution date. Loftus' testimony establishes that he and Attorney Andrews agreed in these discussions that any agreement reached by the parties in bargaining, in the words of Loftus, would be "effective after this impediment, this problem, this petition, was resolved" and until that time "we could not execute an agreement." Contrary to the judge, we reject the notion that this understanding was only an academic discussion on the current state of Board law and not a meeting of the minds between representatives of parties engaged in binding collective bargaining. Clearly, counsel for both the Respondent and the Union were discussing arrangements for the resumption of collective bargaining and not the current state of Board law in the abstract. It is therefore appropriate to construe their comments as defining the obligations of their respective clients and not, as found by the judge, as the mere exchange of legal opinion. Accordingly, we find that based on the credited testimony of Loftus the parties agreed to defer the effective and execution date of any agreement reached until the pending decertification petition was resolved. Contrary to the judge, there is no evidence the parties also agreed that subsequent developments in Board law would alter their agreement regarding the contract's effective and execution date. Indeed, as noted by the judge, there is no evidence whatsoever that the parties even discussed Dresser after its issuance, much less altered their previously reached agreement regarding the contract's effective and execution date.

We also disagree with the judge that once Dresser issued it altered by operation of law the framework for bargaining mutually agreed on by the parties. Nothing in Dresser precludes parties engaged in collective bargaining from reaching mutual agreement on whatever effective and execution date they so desire. If the parties desire, as here, to defer the agreement's effective and execution date until resolution of a pending decertification petition, we discern no reason in law or policy why such a mutual agreement should not be given effect. Thus, this is not a case where an employer and a union have bargained away statutory rights in a manner at odds with Federal labor policy. See NLRB v. Magnavox Co., 415 U.S. 322 (1974). On the contrary, the credited evidence establishes that the parties simply designated an effective and execution date in futuro for their respective contractual obligations conditioned on resolution of the pending decertification petition in a manner favorable to the Union.[4]

In short, we find that the general rule in Dresser that the mere filing of a decertification petition does not require or permit an employer to withdraw from bargaining or executing a contract with an incumbent union does not govern this case. Rather, a union and an employer may by mutual agreement defer the effective and execution date of any contract reached until the decertification petition is resolved. Because we have determined that the parties reached such an agreement in this case, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to sign and honor a contract before the pending decertification petition in Case 20–RD–1759 was resolved. We shall therefore dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

[3] Chairman Dotson and Member Dennis did not participate in RCA Del Caribe or Dresser and express no view here on whether those cases were correctly decided.

[4] The judge found it unlikely that the parties would pursue negotiations only to put the agreement on the "back burner" pending resolution of the decertification petition. We note, however, that the Union did not communicate with the Respondent between October and late December regarding the agreement and that during this period it neither prepared nor asked the Respondent to prepare a written contract for signature. Moreover, apart from resolution of the decertification petition, the agreement reached contained no specific effective date. Most significantly, the credited testimony of Loftus establishes that, irrespective of the judge's doubt that the parties likely would agree to put the agreement on the "back burner," this is in fact what they agreed to prior to the resumption of bargaining.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL D. STEVENSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in San Francisco, California, on September 27 and October 5, 1983, pursuant to a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board on February 18, 1983, which is based on a charge filed by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 202, AFL–CIO (the Union)[1] on February 10, 1983.[2] The complaint alleges that Kelly Broadcasting Company d/b/a KCRA–TV (Respondent) has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

Issues

The first issue is whether about September 9 Respondent and the Union reached agreement on a collective-bargaining agreement concerning employees in an appropriate unit and, if so, whether Respondent subsequently refused to execute and repudiated that collective-bargaining agreement in violation of the Act.[3] A second issue, derived from the first, concerns the question whether at all times material to the case a pending decertification petition constitutes a bar to an enforceable collective-bargaining agreement.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

Respondent admits that it operates a television station with its principal office located in Sacramento, California. It further admits that during the past year, in the course and conduct of its business, its gross volume exceeded $100,000 and that annually it sells goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers outside the State of California, and purchases and receives directly from points outside the State of California goods and/or services valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, it admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 202, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[4]

A. The Facts[5]

For approximately 20 years, Respondent and the Union have been signatory to a series of collective-bargaining agreements. The last such agreement was effective from June 19, 1979, through December 31, 1981. (G.C. Exh. 2.) Prior to this agreement, another was effective between 1976 and 1979. At least for these two prior agreements, it was the custom and practice of the parties for Respondent to prepare the final agreement, which would then be executed by the parties. Prior to this final act, the parties would negotiate an agreement, the Union would ratify it, and then representatives of each side would meet to resolve administrative details and refine language.

Prior to expiration of the last agreement in December 1981, the parties began negotiations which continued into 1982. About June 14, Respondent declared an impasse in negotiations and implemented certain economic proposals contained in the final offer. Between December 31, 1981, and June 14, Respondent had maintained the terms and conditions of the expired agreement.

After impasse, the parties continued to negotiate. The Union was represented by Peter S. Cunha, business manager of the Union since 1981 and longtime union agent. Since March, Cunha was advised by Anne Andrews, attorney at law, who also played a secondary role in negotiations. Respondent was represented by Attorney Richard Loftus Jr. as chief spokesman and primary negotiator. Loftus was assisted in negotiations by Don Saraceno, general manager of Respondent for the past 8 years. These four persons were the primary witnesses at the hearing. There were some conflicts between the witnesses for the General Counsel and the witnesses for Respondent. However, these discrepancies are not significant.

About August 11, a decertification petition was filed in Case 20–RD–1759.[6] It was the opinion of Loftus that,

[3] While the complaint does not specifically allege a failure to execute, this element is clearly implied and was discussed and litigated by the parties prior to commencement of the hearing.

[4] Respondent's unopposed motion to correct the transcript is granted.

[5] The facts in this case are essentially undisputed. My findings of fact are based in part on a stipulation between the parties.

[6] On December 1, a representation election was held pursuant to that petition. However, the results of that election were nondeterminative be-based on then current Board law, Respondent could not continue to negotiate in light of the decertification petition, and negotiations were suspended for a brief period. Sometime in early to mid-August, Andrews talked to Loftus by telephone and stated that in light of a new Board decision, RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982), the Respondent could resume negotiations. After reading and considering the case, Loftus agreed. The parties met for further negotiations at the law offices of Loftus on August 30.

Andrews and Cunha brought a person named Chipps with them to the negotiating session. He was a representative of AFTRA, a union interested in representing the "talent" or on-air personalities of the unit, which is more specifically described below. Andrews knew that Respondent strongly opposed splitting the unit and she admitted that Chipps' presence was primarily to pressure Respondent into reaching agreement. Ultimately, at the request of Saraceno, Chipps and two other union observers, Ray Denton, a witness at the hearing, and Anita Fain, union shop steward at Respondent, were excluded once the negotiating meeting began.

No agreement was reached on August 30. The Union did not agree to two basic proposals of Respondent which had been implemented after impasse. The proposals concerned a two-tier wage structure by which present employees would be "grandfathered" at present wage rates plus later percentage increases and new employees would be paid at permanent lower rates. Another sticking point concerned pay rates and probationary periods for assistant technicians. Saraceno had prepared a handwritten memo which he gave to Andrews purporting to justify the Respondent's need for its proposals. (G.C. Exh. 3.) Andrews described this memo as a "jumping-off point" for the discussion.

After this unsuccessful but promising meeting, Saraceno returned to his office where he had one or more discussions with Respondent's owner Kelly. Various considerations were discussed. For example, Saraceno had received information that the Union was planning to strike about September 19. Respondent desired to avoid a strike. Further complicating matters was Saraceno's plan to leave in 5 days for a 3-week vacation in Europe where he would be essentially unreachable. In light of these factors which created a sense of urgency, Saraceno and Kelly, with the approval of Loftus, decided to try a novel approach to reach agreement.

Cunha was on vacation preparing to leave town with his family. Saraceno obtained Cunha's unlisted telephone number and called him. He asked to meet with Cunha privately, without lawyers or other advisers, to see if these two could reach agreement. Cunha agreed to delay his departure for vacation and further agreed to meet with Saraceno on the Tuesday after Labor Day. The meeting place was the Nut Tree Restaurant, just off the freeway, and roughly midway between Sacramento and San Francisco.

The two men met for about 2 hours at the time and place stated above. Indeed, agreement was reached on a merit increase system, the assistant technician dispute, and other matters of less significance. Cunha told Saraceno that no strike would occur pending developments. Before departing for his vacation, Cunha called Andrews to convey the results of the meeting and directed her to meet with Saraceno and Loftus to reduce the Nut Tree agreement to written form. Cunha then left on his vacation to return on September 13.

On September 9, Andrews met with Loftus and Saraceno at the law office of Loftus. Andrews was accompanied by Andrew Baker, an associate in her law office who had recently graduated from law school. Like Andrews, Baker testified at the hearing. The meeting lasted 2–3 hours. Saraceno brought approximately 120 copies of the Company's proposal to be mailed to employees as part of the ratification process. (G.C Exh. 6.) Saraceno also brought a written explanation of what he and Cunha had agreed to at the Nut Tree. (G.C. Exh. 7.) In addition, Andrews and Baker prepared a rough draft representing the Nut Tree agreement. (G.C. Exh. 4.) Then Andrews and Loftus prepared a rough draft of a letter for Cunha's signature. (G.C. Exh. 5.) This was to be mailed to employees in the ratification process as part of a package of materials to be further described below. Both sides agreed that a mail ratification process would be used. In that respect, it was agreed that a ballot would be included with the materials mailed to unit members a short time hence.

At this point there is some conflict in the testimony. Andrews stated that the pending decertification petition was discussed: "in what manner the decertification petition could be made to go away." Andrews went on to testify that she proposed to Loftus and Saraceno that a supervisor could admit his involvement in the circulation of the petition, thus leading to the dismissal of the petition. Loftus, on the other hand, in response to the question of whether the pending decertification petition came up, replied, "I don't think so." It should be noted that Loftus had previously testified that after the RCA Del Caribe case had been called to his attention by Andrews, he told her that he believed that negotiations could resume, but that "there was a presumption in my mind, anyway, that at that point in time, the Union might not represent a majority of the employees and we could not execute a contract in that circumstance, and that until that impediment was resolved in some way, we could not execute an agreement." According to Loftus, Andrews agreed with his legal opinion. Andrews did not deny this testimony. Baker and Saraceno did not testify on this point. It does appear that initially there was uncertainty on both sides with respect to how the decertification petition would affect negotiations. On September 30, however, another important case, Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), was decided by the Board. This case will be discussed below. There is no evidence the parties discussed this case and its effect on negotiations.

About September 13, Andrews talked to Cunha, who had by then returned from his vacation. After some discussion, Cunha approved both the merit increase plan cause of challenged ballots and unopened mail ballots. Both parties filed objections to the conduct of the election and the matter is currently pending before the Board on exceptions filed to the hearing officer's report.

and the assistant technician language. Andrews then prepared a final draft of the agreement relative to assistant technicians (G.C. Exh. 8) and relative to the merit step salary schedule. (G.C. Exh. 9.) Loftus approved both final drafts. Cunha also made certain minor changes in Saraceno's proposal (G.C. Exh. 6).

Sometime between September 22 and 30, the Union mailed a package of materials to each of its members. As noted above, this included Saraceno's proposal (G.C. Exh. 6), the two attachments (G.C. Exhs. 8 and 9), a ballot, with envelope, to be mailed back to Andrews, and a letter from Cunha to unit members explaining the entire procedure. This letter reads as follows (G.C. Exh. 10):

September 22, 1982

Dear IBEW Local 202 Member at KCRA:

The Union has reached a tentative agreement with your Employer on a new proposal for a three (3) year collective-bargaining agreement. A copy of the detailed proposal is enclosed for your careful consideration and decision.

In order that we achieve a fair expression of the sentiment of the entire unit to this proposal, the "referendum" process is being utilized. To this end, I enclose a mail ballot, a ballot envelope and a self-addressed envelope for you to return your ballot to the Union's attorney, Ann Andrews, who has been instructed to open and count the ballots on Wednesday, October 6, 1982 at noon.

While this proposal does not resolve all of the problems which prior Company proposals have contained, it has substantially reduced or modified many of them.

The Union recommends this offer to the membership, and urges you to ratify it.

The offer contemplates that all current employees will be "grandfathered" at present wage rates (with negotiated increases in 1983 and 1984). The term "grandfathered" means that current employees will receive their present wage rates (with increases on January 1, 1983 and 1984) and any future negotiated increases, without ever being placed on the lower wage scale agreed upon for new hires after June 15, 1982. Persons hired after June 15, 1982 in the following classifications will be hired at the new wage rates as set forth in detail in the enclosed offer: writers, art and film department employees, newsfilm, lab technicians, and floorpersons. All other new hires will be eligible to receive merit increases at the end of the 43-month escalator which would make them equal to current employees. If a new hire who is eligible to receive a merit step increase does not receive the increase, this determination would be subject to the grievance and arbitration provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement.

The restructuring of certain wage scales and the creation of other classifications does not originate with your Employer. The Union has faced these same proposals in the San Francisco market with KRON, KPIX, and KTVU and those agreements now reflect the changes resulting from technology and economics notwithstanding the fears generated by cable, home video tape and disc, the upcoming satellite stations which will reduce the number of viewers and subsequently, their portion of the revenue generated in the marketplace.

This Agreement, if ratified, has but little more than two years to run. During this time, I propose that the Union together with a representative diverse committee from the KCRA membership, sit down with management and attempt to work out mutually agreeable solutions to all the problems which is [sic] of concern both to management and its employees so that the future advancements in technology and the changes required due to competition for the viewer can be met with confidence by both labor and management.

In the interim we have achieved the goal of a contract which maintains the security and integrity of the jobs of the membership at KCRA in these times of economic adversity.

In any event, whether it is your decision to approve or reject this proposal, please make your decision count by voting.

Sincerely and Fraternally,

/s/ Peter S. Cunha
Business Manager

On October 6, Andrews and Cunha counted the ballots. During the counting, Loftus called twice to see whether ratification had occurred. Finally, Andrews called him back to report that ratification had occurred by a large margin.

On October 13, Cunha sent a 2-1/2-page letter to unit members relative to what lay ahead in the Union's relationship with Respondent. (G.C. Exh. 11.) On October 28, Cunha sent a copy of his October 13 letter to Saraceno with a cover letter which reads as follows (G.C. Exh. 12):

Dear Don:

Enclosed herewith is a copy of a letter sent to each member of the KCRA bargaining unit. I am sure you concur with the objectives set forth in the letter.

If we prevail in the decertification election, I want to commence without delay the efforts needed by both labor and management to rebuild the relationship required if we are to achieve the goals we mutually seek of trust and cooperation.

Kindest personal regards and best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

/s/ Peter S. Cunha
Business Manager

On December 27, Cunha wrote another letter to Saraceno which reads as follows (G.C. Exh. 13):

Dear Mr. Saraceno:

The following employees have been employed by KCRA in excess of thirty (30) days and have failed to acquire membership in the Union pursuant to the provisions of Section 1.10 of our agreement.

Richard Beavers	Thom Marchillo
James Finnerty	Steve Patterson
Randy Mann*	(Harry Martin)
Valdice Nicholas	Janice Young
Gilbert Rios (delinquent member)	Chet Brown
Harry Uhlenberg	Albert Lundeen
Kathy Wilbur	Ronald Middlekauff
Carol Bland	Margaret Pelley
Mark Hikoyada	Jeff Strailey
	Vernado Watts

*[Not in original; indicates name was lined out.]

All of the above employees were listed on the Excelsior list by KCRA.

The Company has failed to notify the Union of their employment pursuant to the provisions of Section 1.10 of the agreement.

We have sent each of the above listed employees membership application forms along with the request they remit with the completed application, the initiation fee of $50.00.

If there is no response within a seven (7) day period, we will have no alternative but to request their discharge.

Until our agreement is declared void by the NLRB, we expect KCRA will honor all of its provisions.

Additionally, Gilbert Rios failed to maintain his membership in good standing and has ignored notices from this office of his delinquencies. Accordingly, we request his removal from any and all work covered by our agreement until such time as he has paid his dues to date. You will note that I delayed sending this letter so that it would not result in anyone losing their job before Christmas.

I solicit your cooperation in assisting us in rectifying the membership problem, which to a large extent results from the station's failure to observe the requirement of the agreement relative to new hires.

Very truly yours,
/s/ Peter S. Cunha
Business Manager

On January 3, 1983, Saraceno wrote back to Cunha as follows (G.C. Exh. 14):

Dear Pete:

Your letter of December 27th came as quite a surprise to me for several reasons. First of all, some of the employees on the list have told me that they have been paying their dues and should be members in good standing of Local 202. Secondly, there are other employees whose names do not appear on the list who are members of the bargaining unit who have not become members of Local 202 and have not paid union dues. Finally, most of the employees whose names appeared in your letter have been employed for several months. I do not understand why all of a sudden, out of the blue, you have now decided to make the demand you made in your letter.

I have contacted our lawyers and was advised of two things:

1. A serious question exists as to whether or not there is a contract in place which requires KCRA-TV to terminate employees for failing to pay union dues.

2. Given the fact that the status of Local 202 as the representative for a majority of the members of the bargaining unit remains an open question because of the pending election, it may very well be unlawful for us to take action against employees who, presumably, have not supported the Union.

Although the lawyers told me that the NLRB might find this request or our compliance with it an unfair labor practice, I am confident you did not intend by your letter to retaliate against people who failed to support Local 202 in the recent election. Additionally, they indicated any action like this may jeopardize any future election should the recent one be set aside. Accordingly, I asked our lawyers to defer the filing of charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

I suggest you contact your lawyers and discuss the situation before you proceed further. In the meantime, I am going to hold off taking any formal action in response to your letter.

Sincerely,
/s/ Don Saraceno
General Manager
KCRA-TV

P.S. I have sent a copy of this letter to the employees involved so they will understand where we stand in this situation.

There followed a flurry of other letters between the parties which need not be recited in full. On January 5, Cunha wrote a letter to Saraceno complaining about a possible violation of the contract and attempting to invoke the grievance and arbitration clause. (G.C. Exh. 15.) Next, Cunha replied to Saraceno's letter of January 3, 1983, by expressing surprise and anguish at management's position. Cunha insisted that the collective-bargaining agreement was in full force and effect and concluded by modifying the list of allegedly delinquent employees submitted in his December 27 letter. (G.C. Exh. 16.) The final letter in evidence was sent from Loftus to Cunha on January 14, 1983. It is helpful to have this letter recited (G.C. Exh. 17):

Re: Our Client KCRA-TV

Dear Mr. Cunha:

Our client has asked this office to respond to your letters dated January 5 and 7, 1983. Your letters evidence a misunderstanding on your part as to the legal obligations imposed on our client insofar as grievances and union security are concerned. As will be demonstrated below, our client is under no obligation to discharge employees for their failure to obtain and/or maintain membership in your labor organization. Additionally, our client is under no obligation to participate in any form of grievance/-arbitration procedure.

It is an elementary proposition of law that an employer's obligation to honor the union security clause in a collective bargaining agreement ends upon expiration of the contract. Marine and Ship Building Workers v. NLRB (Bethelehem Steel Co.), 53 LRRM 2878 (3rd Cir. 1963). Additionally, as was recognized by your attorney in her letter to our client's employees dated August 10, 1982, absent a signed contract, the Union cannot enforce any of the provisions of the agreement through the grievance and arbitration mechanism.

That letter implicitly acknowledged that as of June 14, 1982, the previous collective bargaining agreement between Local 202 and KCRA-TV expired. Therefore, any agreement upon which you base your contention that our client must honor a Union Security Clause and/or grievance procedure, must have arisen subsequent to August 10, 1982. It is our position that the subsequent negotiations and tentative agreement reached between Local 202 and our client's bargaining team did not create an enforceable contract. The parties specifically understood that the existence of a contract was conditioned upon Local 202 prevailing in the representation election which took place on December 1, 1982.

That tentative agreement was permitted by a change in the law enunciated by the National Labor Relations Board in RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 N.L.R.B. No. 116 (1982). Your attention is directed to the following language found in that case: "If the incumbent prevails in the election held, any contract executed with the incumbent will be valid and binding."

Unless and until Local 202 is certified as the representative of a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit, there is no binding contract between Local 202 and KCRA-TV. Accordingly, our client will not comply with your demand that KCRA-TV fire several of its employees.

During the course of the recent representation proceedings, our client has made every effort to maintain the status quo and do nothing to disturb the "laboratory conditions" which should surround a representation election. We are extremely disappointed by your apparent unwillingness to do the same. The timing of your demand that our client fire some thirty-five employees in the bargaining unit is suspect to say the least. It appears to our client that you have taken this step in order to punish those employees in the bargaining unit who had the audacity to vote against Local 202 in the recent election. We submit that your conduct in this regard amounts to a violation of Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the National Labor Relations Act. Should it persist, we will be compelled to file an unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board.

Sincerely,

/s/ RICHARD J. LOFTUS, JR.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

I begin by reviewing certain basic principles of Board law. In Pacific Coast Metal Trades Council (Foss Launch), 260 NLRB 1117 at 1119 (1982), Administrative Law Judge Pollack, in a Board-approved decision, stated the following:

> Section 8(d) of the Act explicitly requires the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party. H.J. Heinz Company v. N.L.R.B., 311 U.S. 514, 523 (1941); Retail Clerks International Association and Retail Store Employees Local 322, Jack Gray and Glen Conyers, their agents (Roswil, Inc., d/b/a Ramsey Supermarkets), 226 NLRB 80, 87 (1976). However, neither party is required to sign a bargaining agreement containing terms not previously agreed upon. The General Counsel must show not only that an agreement was reached, but that the document which Respondents have refused to execute accurately reflected that contract. Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union and its Local 7-507 (Capital Packaging Company), 212 NLRB 98, 108 (1974).

Putting aside the decertification petition issue for the moment, there is little question that the parties reached agreement on September 9 and that said agreement was ratified by the Union on October 6. Witness this testimony from Saraceno:

> Q. (By Judge Stevenson) In other words, as you sit there now but for this decertification petition and what you say your lawyer told you about its effect, you would then agree that there was a contract that was ratified, but for that single factor, is that true?
> A. I would have lived with those terms if we could get by the decertification.
> Q. To put it in slightly different wording, the only thing keeping you from an agreement with the Union is the effect of the decertification petition?
>
> A. You've got that precisely correct.
> Q. . . . is it further fair statement that you don't believe there is any difference of opinion with the Union as to what was agreed to and ratified by the membership? Is that true?

> A. No, I don't think there is any major hangup, except we've still got to get down and put this thing in writing.

Even Loftus, though more cautious in his testimony, refers to an "agreement in principle" which would develop into a collective-bargaining agreement only on resolution of the decertification petition.

Curiously, Respondent contends in its brief (pp. 5–7), in partial disagreement with its own witnesses quoted above, that a full and complete agreement was never reached. More specifically, Respondent claims that no effective date nor discipline and discharge procedure was agreed upon, and that the parties never met to rewrite the entire document. Elsewhere in its brief, Respondent also claims that the Union never asked Respondent to execute a written contract (pp. 4–5), and that because the contract was never executed it is not enforceable (pp. 15–16). These claims share a common feature in that they are utterly lacking in merit and border on the frivolous.

First, it was the custom and practice of the parties to have Respondent prepare the final document for execution. This process between ratification and execution can take up to 6 months. Here, the effective date was October 6, the date of ratification. It is true that the effective date was never explicitly stated because Respondent never prepared the document. Evidently the Union believed that the final document was in the process of being prepared pursuant to the usual custom and practice. If Respondent unlawfully refused to prepare the document, then it would have been futile for the Union to request execution. Surely Respondent would not sign an agreement that it failed to reduce to writing.[7] Accordingly, the Union's failure to request execution can hardly be a defense since Respondent refused to prepare the document in the first place. Surely Respondent cannot exploit its own misconduct. Finally, I do not agree that the final agreement lacked a discharge and discipline provision. All parties agree that the prior contract was part of the new agreement to the extent it was not changed by agreement of the parties. Article VI, section 6.1, clearly sets forth the discharge and discipline agreement of the parties.[8]

I turn next to the heart of this case to determine whether a pending decertification petition constitutes a bar to an enforceable collective-bargaining agreement. In this respect, I begin with the case of RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982). Relying on that case, all parties agreed that the suspension of bargaining caused by the filing of the decertification petition should cease, and that the parties should resume their negotiations. As noted above, the parties did resume negotiations and ultimately reached agreement. On September 30, the Board decided a second relevant case, Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). There, the Board held (at 1089, emphasis added):

> A rule permitting an employer to withdraw from bargaining solely because a decertification petition has been filed does not give due weight to the incumbent union's continuing presumption of majority status and is not the best way to achieve employer neutrality in the election. For these reasons, we hold that the mere filing of a decertification petition will no longer require or permit an employer to withdraw from bargaining or executing a contract with an incumbent union.[9]

Notwithstanding what appears to me to be a clear statement of labor law some 6 days before the Union ratified the contract, Respondent nevertheless contends that no meeting of the minds occurred and, therefore, there was no contract. These arguments must be rejected.

Before the Board imposes an obligation on the parties to sign a collective-bargaining agreement, there must be a meeting of the minds.[10] In this case, I find that a meeting of the minds did occur. To support this conclusion, I turn to the record. Saraceno wanted agreement before he left on vacation and before the Union took a strike vote. He called Cunha at home and persuaded the latter to defer his vacation until the two met at the Nut Tree Restaurant. After preliminary agreement on the issues which had led to impasse, Cunha agreed to defer the strike vote, and no strike ever occurred. On September 9, the parties met and agreed to final details. I find that the parties fully knew and understood they were entering into a binding agreement.[11]

Respondent also provided some of the material to be sent to employees in the ratification process, agreed to the ratification by mail, and on October 6 expressed keen interest in the results of the vote. These are all factors in favor of a binding agreement. Could it reasonably be said that the parties went through all of this just to put the [7] In Trojan Steel Corp., 222 NLRB 478, 483 (1976), enfd. 551 F.2d 308 (4th Cir. 1977), respondent unlawfully refused to execute a labor agreement. The fact that the agreement submitted by the union had an incorrect effective date and had omitted entirely a clause proposed by respondent reserving the right to pay wage rates above the minimum scale did not constitute a defense.

[8] Art. VI "Discharge—Rehiring," sec. 6.1 "Discharge," reads as follows (G.C. Exh. 2):

Section 6.1 DISCHARGE. Employees may be discharged for incompetence or reduction in staff, upon two (2) weeks' notice or pay in lieu thereof. The Union shall have the right to initiate grievance procedure under Article III of this Agreement to determine the question of competence.

(a) Employees may be discharged without notice for gross insubordination, for being under the influence of liquor or nonprescribed drugs while on duty, and for refusal to properly perform regularly assigned duties. Employees may also be discharged for repeated failure to meet financial obligations, for causing embarrassment to the Employer while on duty, or for just cause. (This section shall not conflict with Section 1.10.)

[9] It should be noted in the instant case that there is no issue regarding Respondent's good-faith doubt as to the Union's continuing majority status based on objective evidence. Rather, the Employer here bases his refusal to execute the contract solely on the pending decertification petition.

[10] Lincoln Hills Nursing Home, 257 NLRB 1145, 1153 (1981). In that case, the Board affirmed an administrative law judge's finding that no meeting of the minds had occurred. The union had ratified terms different from those offered by the employer.

[11] See Mount Airy Psychiatric Center, 230 NLRB 668, 671 (1977); Midvalley Steel Fabricators, 243 NLRB 516 (1979), enfd. as modified 621 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1980).

agreement on the "back burner" where it would have remained until this very day pending a decision by the Board. I think not.[12] Finally, and perhaps most persuasively, Respondent's stated position is so manifestly contrary to clearly stated Board law as expressed in Dresser Industries, supra, that Respondent's defense simply cannot be credited.

Respondent further argues in its brief (p. 18) that assuming for the purposes of argument an agreement was reached, Respondent has merely declined to implement it. While recognizing that the Board requires a postdecertification agreement to be executed, Respondent suggests that such an agreement need not be implemented under Board law. This argument is too absurd to be treated in any but the most summary fashion. I reject it as lacking in merit.

To the extent that Respondent had an inarticulated concern about the effect of the pending decertification petition on the agreement reached with the Union, said unexpressed and unclear reservation is not sufficient to preclude a binding agreement.[13]

In light of the above, I find that about September 9 Respondent and the Union reached agreement, that Respondent subsequently refused to execute the agreement, and that on January 3, 1983, Respondent repudiated the agreement.[14] I further find that in committing the above acts Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act as alleged.

In conclusion, I consider Respondent's contention that, notwithstanding my findings of labor law violations above, it was under no duty to terminate the employees who ceased paying dues in violation of the union-security agreement. First, I reject Respondent's claim that the only security agreement in effect was oral. Section 1.10 of the prior agreement (G.C. Exh. 2) contains a written union-security provision.[15] Since this section was not modified or deleted by the new agreement, I find that it was the intent of the parties that it become part of the new agreement.

Notwithstanding the above, I make no finding on whether Respondent violated the Act in refusing to discharge the employees listed in the union letters of December 27 and January 7, 1983. That issue was not raised by the complaint nor was it litigated.[16] At pages 13-14 of its brief, Respondent needlessly raised this issue, while the General Counsel properly does not.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Kelly Broadcasting Company d/b/a KCRA-TV is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

2. The Union, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 202, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees employed in its engineering, art, news, and programming departments at its Sacramento, Stockton, Modesto and San Francisco, California locations, excluding office clerical employees, salesmen, traffic department employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the Union has been the duly designated exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit.

5. About September 9 Respondent and the Union reached agreement on a collective-bargaining agreement, and the agreement was ratified by the Union on October 6.

6. By refusing to sign the collective-bargaining agreement, the terms of which were otherwise agreed upon, because of a pending decertification petition and by repudiating the agreement for the same reason, Respondent has refused to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I will recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action as set forth below designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

[15] This section reads as follows:

Union Shop.

(a) The Employer agrees that membership in the Union on or after the thirty-first (31st) day following the beginning of employment or the effective date of this Agreement, whichever is later, shall be a condition of employment; provided the Employer shall not be obligated hereunder to discharge or discriminate against any employee for non-membership in the Union:

(1) If he has a reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the Employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members; or

(2) If he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the Employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

(b) When new or additional Employees are needed, the Employer shall notify the Union of the number and classifications of Employees needed and the Union shall have a reasonable opportunity to refer applicants for the vacancies to be filled.

(c) The Employer agrees, within seven (7) days of the date of hiring, to notify the Union of the name or names of all Employees hired.

(d) In applying the above provisions, it is agreed that the parties will adhere to existing statutes which make preference or discrimination in hiring based upon membership or non-membership in the Union an unfair labor practice.

[16] I further note that before a union can require an employer to discharge employees for failure to comply with a valid union-security clause, the union has certain duties and obligations due and owing toward the affected employees. These include appropriate notice of the amount in arrears, an adequate opportunity to make payment, and an explanation of the methods used in computing the amount due. See Metaltronics Hospital Employees Local 955 (Pharmaseal Laboratories), 254 NLRB 601 (1981). No credible evidence was presented in this case to show the Union satisfied its duty.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

MICHAEL D. STEVENSON, Administrative Law Judge. On June 25, 1984, the Board issued an unpublished "Order Remanding Proceeding to Administrative Law Judge." More specifically, the Board directed me to resolve whether a "critical portion" of the testimony of a certain witness is credible. I turn to comply with the Board's Order.

Attorney Richard Loftus testified for Respondent at the hearing that subsequent to his reading of the Board's newly issued decision in RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982), he had a conversation with Union Attorney Anne Andrews and stated, in pertinent part, that based on his understanding of RCA Del Caribe he believed that negotiations on a new labor agreement could resume. However, he further believed and stated that the parties could not execute an agreement until a pending decertification petition was resolved. He further testified that Andrews agreed with this legal opinion. As I noted in the opinion, Andrews did not deny the conversation. I credit this testimony of Loftus in toto.

To the extent that the Board's review of my decision will turn on this credibility finding, then so be it. However, I reiterate my original decision and make certain additional findings, analyses, and conclusions.[1] I find that there was never any agreement between the parties that a collective-bargaining agreement could not be executed and would not be effective until a pending decertification petition was resolved. Rather, a lawyer for Respondent, Loftus, gave a legal opinion to a lawyer for the Union, Andrews, based on current Board law, and Andrews agreed with the legal opinion based on current Board law. The difference is greater than mere semantics.

In my thinking there is a distance of 2-1/2 country miles between an unconditional agreement that no effective contract will result until the decertification is resolved and a lawyer's legal opinion, with which his opponent agrees, that no effective contract will or can result until the decertification is resolved.

In the former, the agreement remains a binding agreement. In the latter, a number of possibilities might occur. The first, which need not be resolved here, is that both lawyers may have been wrong as a matter of law. The second is that there is a change in the legal precedent on which the original legal opinion was based. That is exactly what happened here, as I attempted to make clear in my original decision. That is, on September 30, 1982, the Board decided Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). Based on the actions of union and employer representatives subsequent to the Loftus conversation credited above, I find that the parties intended a binding agreement to result as soon as the decertification petition was resolved or as soon as the failure to resolve the decertification petition was no longer a legal barrier to execution of the contract, whichever condition occurred first. I must assume both attorneys were aware of the Dresser case prior to the union ratification on October 6, although there is no direct evidence to support that conclusion. However, whether one or both were aware or not is irrelevant to this decision. By operation of law, the Dresser case removed the legal impediment that both attorneys had agreed in August would preclude execution of a collective-bargaining agreement.[2]

In sum, I have credited Loftus, but find in the final analysis of this case that his credited testimony does not affect the final result. Since my final decision does not change, I will incorporate by reference all additional findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the recommended Order into this supplemental decision.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 21 October 1983 Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel each filed exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.[1]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

This case involves actions that occurred following the closing of a pet food processing plant operated by Quaker Oats, Inc. and its reopening by the Respondent. On 25 June 1982[3] Quaker Oats ceased operating and terminated its employees, including 70 production and maintenance employees represented by the Union.[4] The Respondent reopened the facility 19 July, employing 51 production and maintenance employees. The Respondent's entire unit work force was drawn from the group of employees who formerly worked at Quaker Oats. In addition the Respondent hired several individuals who were supervisors and managers for Quaker Oats. These included John Christensen, manager for Quaker Oats and vice president and general manager for the Respondent; Andy Hammond, manager of employee and community relations at Quaker Oats and purchasing and planning manager for the Respondent; Richard Bishop, manager of engineering and maintenance for both Employers; and Zelma McKnight, maintenance supervisor for Quaker Oats and plant supervisor for the Respondent.

Although the Respondent initially, on request, had agreed to meet with the Union, on 16 September the Respondent canceled the scheduled meeting with the Union and since that date has refused to bargain with the Union. The Respondent relied on a petition signed by 35 of its 51 unit employees asserting that they did not wish to be represented by the Union.

The General Counsel alleged that the Respondent unlawfully refused to hire seven job applicants because of their union activities at Quaker Oats. The General Counsel also alleged that certain unlawful statements were made by the Respondent's supervisors and that the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union.

The judge found that there was no evidence that the Respondent's decision to employ 51 rather than 70 employees was unlawfully motivated. The judge found, however, that the Respondent unlawfully refused to hire four individuals because of their union activities. The judge also found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees that it would screen job applicants to avoid dealing with the Union and grievances. The judge further found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to recognize and bargain with the Union from the date the Respondent began operations.

The General Counsel excepts to the judge's finding that the Respondent's decision to employ a reduced work force was not unlawful. The General Counsel also argues that the judge erred in finding that the Respondent lawfully refused to hire applicants Jack Crowley and Eddie Mims. The Respondent excepts to all violations found by the judge. For the reasons set out below we find merit to the Respondent's exceptions and shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

A. The Reduced Work Force

As noted above, the Respondent commenced operations 19 July with a unit work force of 51 employees. The judge found that no evidence was presented to show that this reduction from 70 employees used by Quaker Oats was unlawfully motivated. The judge therefore considered only whether the Respondent discriminatorily selected employees other than the alleged discriminatees.

The General Counsel excepts to this finding. The General Counsel contends that the Respondent reduced its work force in order to eliminate the Union, and in particular to eliminate union supporters who were active in filing grievances while employed by Quaker Oats. The General Counsel asserts that the Respondent's vice president and general manager, Christensen, gave conflicting testimo-

[1] The Charging Party filed a motion seeking leave to adopt as its own the General Counsel's exceptions. We grant the motion and, accordingly, we have treated the General Counsel's exceptions as constituting also the Charging Party's cross-exceptions.

[2] The Respondent and the General Counsel have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] All dates are in 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[4] Quaker Oats and the Union had a collective-bargaining agreement in which Quaker Oats recognized the Union as the representative for all maintenance and production employees at its canning plant at Pascagoula, Mississippi, excluding all office and clerical employees, laboratory employees, watchmen, guards, and all supervisory employees as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

ny on the Respondent's need to reduce its work force, testifying at one point that a reduction was needed to make a profit and at another point that a second additional shift of employees was what a profitable company required.

The Respondent asserts in answer that the General Counsel failed to allege the reduction in work force as a violation of the Act. The Respondent further contends that the record does not support such a finding.

We find merit in the Respondent's position and reject the General Counsel's exceptions. The complaint allegations made no mention of the Respondent's decision to hire fewer employees than its predecessor employed, and this aspect was not fully litigated at the hearing. Even assuming the allegation was fully litigated, we do not find sufficient evidence of unlawful conduct by the Respondent.

Christensen credibly testified that as a Quaker Oats manager he instructed his supervisors to design a plan for improved efficiency and economy to present to potential buyers which would require fewer employees to operate the facility. This testimony was corroborated by the supervisors, who detailed a procedure they used in evaluating the number of workers needed and the best workers for each job. As discussed by the judge, the Respondent's implementation of this system involved consideration of each applicant's demonstrated work ability and seniority at Quaker Oats. Christensen's additional remark on the need for a second shift related to a genuine but less immediate interest in increasing efficiency further by addition of a second shift and is not inconsistent with his plan to reduce costs as long as the plant operated on a single shift basis. We are not persuaded that Christensen's comment on the need for a second shift casts doubt on the Respondent's motive. Rather, we find that it was the Respondent's intention to begin operations with a smaller work force than that employed by Quaker Oats, an objective that was reflected in a reduction of similar proportions among the nonunion salaried employees and within the Respondent's lawful discretion.[5] Accordingly, we agree with the judge that the proper inquiry is whether the Respondent rejected certain applicants for discriminatory reasons.

[5] An alleged successor employer, of course, has a right to choose the size and composition of its own work force limited only by the duty not to discriminate against employees of its predecessor for reasons proscribed by the Act. General Processing Corp., 267 NLRB 1281 (1983).

B. Findings on the 8(a)(1) Allegations and Union Animus

The judge found that in 1977 alleged discriminatee Jack Crowley was elected union president on a platform pledging to file and process employee grievances. Beginning with Crowley's term and continuing until Quaker Oats' close, the number of grievances filed and pursued by employees increased. The judge found that this was a source of considerable disturbance to Quaker Oats' management. The judge also found that certain Quaker Oats' supervisors told employees that the grievances and the presence of the Union caused the plant to close and that if the plant reopened it would be without a union.[6] The judge concluded that the Respondent, through the supervisors it retained from Quaker Oats, harbored animus toward the Union and toward those employees who were identified with the Union in its post-1977 period. The judge did not find that these remarks violated the Act because they were made before the Respondent was created. However, the judge found that about a week after the Respondent reopened the plant alleged discriminatee Mary Long telephoned Christensen to ask why she had not been hired. Long testified that Christensen said he had told his supervisors to screen applicants for employment carefully, and to select employees so as to avoid the "predicament" that existed at Quaker Oats. Long admitted that Christensen never mentioned the Union nor defined what he meant by Quaker Oats' predicament. The judge determined, however, that Christensen's references to screening and to avoiding the "predicament" were designed to tell Long that the Respondent was not going to deal with the Union and grievances. The judge relied in part on his findings that while Quaker Oats was in operation Christensen and other Quaker Oats' supervisors told employees that there would not be a union under the new owners. The judge concluded that Christensen's remarks to Long violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

We disagree. In the context in which it was made, Christensen's reference to screening and his remark on Quaker Oats' predicament is ambiguous and is a likely reference to that company's inability to remain in business. We do not find that these ambiguous statements violated the Act. The record does not show that Long was aware of the more pointed remarks made by Quaker Oats' supervisors prior to closing that might arguably give some other veiled meaning to Christensen's statement. In any event the statement on its face remains an innocuous comment which would not reasonably tend to restrain, interfere with, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights.

[6] Specifically, the judge found that in the spring of 1982, amid rumors that Quaker Oats was closing the plant, Christensen told Quaker Oats employee Eldon Waltman that Quaker Oats' main office was "real upset about the way the union was writing grievances for women and blacks." The judge also found that on 22 June, while escorting a potential buyer through the Quaker Oats plant, Christensen told employee Crowley that, although things looked good for finding a buyer to keep the plant in operation, there would be no union when the plant reopened. In addition the judge found that on 29 April Quaker Oats Supervisor Richard Bishop told employee Alvin Bethany that the Union was the cause of the plant closing and that the plant would be without a union if it reopened. Finally the judge found that between 29 April and 25 June Quaker Oats Supervisor Zelma McKnight told employees that neither "trouble makers" nor the Union would be there when the plant reopened.

We also disagree with the judge that the evidence establishes that the Respondent harbored a general animus toward the Union. While we agree that the remarks made by various supervisors while employed by Quaker Oats tend to show antiunion sentiment, we note that the Respondent nonetheless selected its entire work force from employees of its predecessor. By doing so the Respondent assured itself of the Union's presence, at least as far as the Respondent's obligation to recognize the Union until its majority standing was placed in doubt as discussed below. Such a step by the Respondent strongly militates against the finding that the Respondent held and acted on the views expressed by its supervisors prior to their employment. The Respondent could have precluded any obligation to recognize the Union as representative of its work force by considering the 233 employment applications it received prior to opening, over 70 percent of which were from persons not employed by Quaker Oats, and hiring a majority who had not been employed by Quaker Oats. In view of the hiring procedure used by the Respondent we find that the evidence does not establish that the Respondent harbored animus toward the Union.

C. The Refusal to Hire[7]

As noted above, for the reasons stated below, we reverse the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by refusing to hire the four individuals discussed below.

1. Mary Long was hired by Quaker Oats in 1955. From 1969 until Quaker Oats closed she worked as a janitor. For the last few months of Quaker's operation, she was the sole janitor employed. The judge found that Long was a union member since 1955, that she served as shop steward in the late 1960s, and that she was the financial secretary around 1977. Long also was on the Union's negotiating committees for collective-bargaining agreements and for a special experimental project agreement ("the sardine committee"). The judge found that Long was first in seniority in the maintenance department. Of 22 employees junior to Long, 10 were hired. Long was replaced by Swetlena Goff, who had worked for Quaker Oats since 1976 in the casting department.

The judge found no documentary evidence of poor work. He credited Long's testimony that she never received a written warning or criticism. The judge found that she was complimented on her performance by her supervisor and by Christensen. Supervisors Bishop and McKnight, however, testified that the plant was not properly maintained by Long during the last few months.

The judge did not credit the testimony that Long's work was inferior. He concluded that Long should have been selected for employment based on the Respondent's guidelines of seniority and work performance. The judge considered that Long was "deeply and visibly" involved in the Union after 1977. Relying on his earlier findings that the Respondent was hostile toward the Union after 1977, the judge found the Respondent's basis for not hiring Long to be pretextual and concluded that the failure to hire Long violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

The Respondent argues that Long's union activities were negligible. Long testified that she handled only four or five grievances while she was a union officer. As a committee member, Long was not a primary spokesman. The Respondent contends that Long was a good employee for a number of years, but that in the last few months of employment her ability to complete her job duties diminished because of health problems which caused her to miss 4 or 5 weeks of work and which coincided with Quaker Oats' elimination of the other janitorial position. The Respondent relied on the testimony of Supervisors McKnight, Christensen, and Bishop that Long frequently complained about not feeling well and that her work deteriorated. Supervisor Bishop testified that he decided to hire another individual because of Long's difficulties.

We find merit to the Respondent's exceptions. The General Counsel has failed to carry her burden to show that the Respondent refused to hire Long because of her union activities. The main deficiency in the General Counsel's case is the failure to show that Long's union involvement after 1977 was part of the Union's resurgent activity. Although Long was a union member and served as financial secretary and negotiating committee member in the post-1977 era, we note that she had minimal involvment with grievances and that employees with comparable union affiliations were both hired and rejected by the Respondent. When this factor is combined with the Respondent's lack of demonstrated animus, the General Counsel's prima facie case fails.

[7] We agree with the judge's conclusions that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to employ applicants Henry Davis, Jack Crowley, and Eddie Mims. We find no merit to the exceptions of the General Counsel regarding Crowley and Mims.

Even assuming that the prima facie case was made, we find that the Respondent has demonstrated that it would not have hired Long even in the absence of her union activities. The judge credited Long's testimony that her work was not criticized, and the Respondent readily admitted that Long was a good employee for many years. However, Long admitted in her testimony that in the several months before Quaker Oats closed, she was hospitalized and was absent from work for 4 to 5 weeks with ill health. She further testified that, on her return to work, the duties required of her had doubled. Given these factors, we find that the Respondent believed that another individual was more capable of fulfilling its job requirements and for that reason did not hire Long.

2. David Sewell was a manufacturing specialist in Quaker Oats' manufacturing department. After 1977, Sewell was a steward, a chief steward, a vice president and, at the close, president of the Union. During that time he served on 15 to 20 grievance committees. Sewell was first in seniority among the manufacturing department employees who applied to the Respondent for jobs. The judge credited Sewell's testimony that his work was never criticized. The judge concluded that Sewell would have been hired in the absence of union activity.

We disagree with the judge and find merit to the Respondent's exceptions. The Respondent's supervisors credibly testified that the manufacturing department at Quaker Oats was the least efficient division. The Respondent's belief in this opinion is demonstrated by the fact that the Respondent hired just 2 of the 11 individuals from that department who applied.[8] One of the employees hired served as a steward in 1980; several rejected employees had no visible union affiliation. We are convinced by these factors that the Respondent applied the lawful criteria of seniority and work performance. Although Sewell had greater seniority than those employees hired, the General Counsel has not shown that his performance was equal to or better than that of the individuals who were accepted. When we consider this in combination with the absence of union animus of the Respondent, we must conclude that the General Counsel has not carried her burden to show unlawful discrimination.

[8] In dismissing the allegations that the Respondent refused to hire Sewell, Sipp, and Sanderson, each of whom worked in the manufacturing department, we note an incongruity in the judge's decision in that he accepted as lawful the Respondent's decision to hire only two employees from this department, but nevertheless found that three persons were unlawfully denied employment.

3. Eugene Sipp was a meat handler in the manufacturing department at Quaker Oats. Sipp was a steward from 1977 to 1978 and filed four or five grievances while serving in that capacity. He also acted as recording secretary from 1978 to 1982, and was on the grievance and negotiating committees. Sipp was eighth in seniority in the manufacturing department. The judge credited his testimony that his work was never criticized and concluded that in the absence of union activities Sipp would have been hired. We disagree, and find, for the same reasons as we found in the case of David Sewell, that the General Counsel has failed to make out a case of unlawful discrimination.

4. Curtis Sanderson was a forklift operator in the manufacturing department at Quaker Oats. Sanderson was a member of the Union since his hire in 1970 and served as steward in 1979 and 1980, when he processed between 15 and 25 grievances. The evidence does not indicate any union activity by Sanderson after 1980. Sanderson was fourth in seniority in his department. The judge credited his testimony that he was never criticized for the quality of his work. The judge concluded that he would have been hired in the absence of union activity. We disagree and find, again for the reasons cited in the case of David Sewell, that the General Counsel has failed to show discrimination in the Respondent's refusal to hire Sanderson.

D. The Refusal to Bargain

The General Counsel alleged that the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union by withdrawing recognition 16 September. The judge found that the Respondent is a successor to Quaker Oats whose obligation to bargain with the Union attached 19 July, the date the Respondent resumed operations with the 51 employees it had hired.

The judge found that the Respondent's officers, Christensen and Hammond, while they were agents of Quaker Oats, negotiated with the Union concerning the effects of Quaker Oats' closing. During those negotiations, from late April until late June, Union Representative Hubert Mills repeatedly inquired about the identity of prospective buyers of the plant. Mills asked Hammond and Christensen to inform any buyer of the Union's representative status. The judge found that the Union made demands for recognition 6 May and 24, 29, and 30 June during Mills' meetings with Hammond and Christensen.

On 7 July the Union sent a bargaining demand letter to the Respondent's registered agent, Karl Wiesenburg. Wiesenburg replied that he did not have bargaining authority. On 5 August Mills again wrote to Wiesenburg and requested a bargaining meeting or, if Wiesenburg lacked authority to bargain, the name of the appropriate official. On 16 August Wiesenburg wrote to Mills advising that his letter had been forwarded to the Respondent's vice president, Christensen. On 8 September Mills sent a bargaining demand letter to Christensen. On 13 September the Respondent's manager, Hammond, telephoned Mills and agreed to meet with the Union 22 September.

On 16 September Hammond received a petition signed by 35 of the 51 unit employees stating that the employees did not wish to be represented by the Union. Relying on the petition as casting a doubt on the Union's majority status, Hammond wrote to Mills 16 September and canceled the meeting. Since that date the Respondent has refused to recognize and bargain with the Union.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing since 19 July to recognize the Union. The judge found that the Respondent engaged in unlawful dilatory tactics between 19 July and 13 September. The judge found that this unlawful conduct, combined with what the judge found to be the Respondent's unlawful threats and refusals to hire, precluded the Respondent from having a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. In addition, the judge implied that the employee petition on which the Respondent relied was tainted by supervisory assistance. We find merit to the Respondent's exceptions to these findings.

We cannot agree that the Respondent engaged in dilatory tactics before recognizing the Union. We agree with the judge that the Respondent's obligation to bargain on request attached 19 July.[9] Following that date the Union made its bargaining demand 5 August. This demand was promptly answered by the Respondent's agent, Wiesenburg, 16 August. Although the Respondent did not contact the Union between 16 August and the Union's next demand 8 September, we do not consider such a gap of time so unreasonable as to indicate bad faith.[10] We find that the Respondent's 13 September reply and its agreement to meet 22 September satisfied its obligations.

We further find that the Respondent was privileged to withdraw recognition from the Union 16 September. On that date the Respondent was presented with a petition signed by a majority of its employees expressing their desire not to be represented by the Union.[11] Such a petition is an adequate basis on which the Respondent could base a reasonable doubt of the Union's majority status. Based on our dismissal of the complaint in all other respects, the Respondent's doubt was raised in an atmosphere free of unfair labor practices.[12] Accordingly, the Respondent has not engaged in any conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

Based on our conclusions that the Respondent has not engaged in any unlawful conduct, we shall order that the complaint be dismissed.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[9] The Respondent concedes it is a successor and that it was obligated to bargain with the Union 19 July. In light of this, Chairman Dotson finds it unnecessary to express his view on the Board's law concerning successorship.

[10] It appears that the Respondent's inaction after 16 August may have been caused by a misunderstanding that Mills was to contact Christensen directly.

[11] The petition heading read, "We the following employees, do not wish for the International Chemical Workers' Union to represent us. The following employees names are listed below."

[12] We reject any implication by the judge that the employees' petition was tainted by supervisory participation. The record demonstrates that the petition was instigated by a unit employee in response to rumors that the Respondent and the Union were preparing to bargain. Employee Swetlena Goff testified that she and another unit employee composed the petition but were uncertain of the Union's complete name. Upon their inquiry, a supervisor told the employees the Union's name. Goff testified that she asked another supervisor for permission to seek employees' signatures. The supervisor responded that he "didn't care." We find nothing in these circumstances to justify a finding of supervisory assistance that would taint the employees' expression of disinterest in the Union.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Pascagoula, Mississippi, on May 23, 24, 25, and 26, 1983. Case 15–CA–8758 was filed on October 28, and amended on November 4, 1982. The complaint issued on December 10, 1982, and was amended on February 3, 1983. Case 15–CA–8836 was filed on December 28, 1982. That complaint issued on January 31, 1983. As shown hereafter, the complaints allege that Respondent engaged in various violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background[1]

This case involves activity shortly before and during the closing of a plant, and the plant's purchase and re-

[1] The commerce, facts, and conclusions are not at issue. Respondent admits that from July 19, 1962, Respondent, a Mississippi corporation with facilities located in Pascagoula, Mississippi, is engaged in the proc-opening by a successor employer. Until the end of June 1982, Quaker Oats engaged in the manufacture of canned pet food in Pascagoula, Mississippi.

In April 1982, the employees were advised that Quaker Oats would close its Pascagoula facility. At the time of that announcement and for several years before 1982, the Pascagoula employees were represented by International Chemical Workers Union, Local 540. The General Counsel alleges that during the period before the facility was closed by Quaker, and reopened by Sun Coast Foods, employees were coerced through statements from their supervisors in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Through those alleged illegal statements and others, the General Counsel contends that supervisors expressed displeasure with the Union which stemmed from the Union through new officers, adopting a more aggressive position on grievances and negotiations since 1977. The General Counsel alleges that the employees were threatened that the successor employer would operate without the Union and without troublemakers.

After the facility was closed and its employees laid off on June 25, 1982, the Quaker facility was reopened by its buyer, Sun Coast Foods, Inc. on July 19, 1982. Sun Coast employed 51 hourly employees. All 51 of those employees formerly worked at the same facility for Quaker. Immediately before its close, Quaker employed 70 hourly employees.

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent refused to hire seven former Quaker employees because of their involvement with the Union since the Union started its more aggressive activity in 1977. Those seven employees are Jack Crowley, Henry Davis, Mary Long, Eddie Mims, Curtis Sanderson, David Sewell, and Eugene Sipp.

During the period before the closing by Quaker, the Union negotiated with Quaker. During those discussions, the Union questioned Quaker as to whether it had a buyer. The officials representing Quaker included John Christensen, manager for Quaker at Pascagoula, and Andy Hammond, Quaker's manager of employee and community relations at Pascagoula. Immediately upon reopening by Sun Coast, Christensen was installed as Sun Coast's vice president and general manager and Hammond was Sun Coast's purchasing and planning manager. As of the last meeting between the Union and Quaker on June 30, Christensen and Hammond told the Union that they did not have a firm buyer, but they agreed to inform the Union when a buyer was identified. However, neither Christensen nor Hammond told the Union about Sun Coast's purchase.

On July 7, 1982, the Union requested to meet and bargain with Sun Coast through Sun Coast's registered agent for service of process, Attorney Karl Wiesenburg. The certificate and articles of incorporation of Sun Coast Foods, Inc., filed with the Mississippi Secretary of State on June 29, 1982, list Karl Wiesenburg as its registered agent. Shortly thereafter, Wiesenburg informed the Union that he lacked authority to bargain for Sun Coast. On August 5, the Union wrote Wiesenburg requesting the name of the person that was authorized to bargain for Sun Coast. Wiesenburg wrote the Union on August 16, acknowledging that he was the registered agent for service of process for Sun Coast. Wiesenburg indicated that he had forwarded the Union's letter to John Christensen.

On September 8, 1982, the Union again requested that Sun Coast meet to negotiate for its Pascagoula employees. This request was sent to John Christensen at the Pascagoula facility. Respondent was given a September 14 deadline to respond before the Union filed charges with the Labor Board.

On September 13, Andy Hammond called the Union and agreed to meet. That call was confirmed in a September 14, 1982 letter from Hammond to the Union's representative, Hubert Mills. The parties agreed to meet on September 22, 1982.

On September 16, 1982, Hammond wrote Mills that Respondent had been presented with a petition from 35 of its 51 employees expressing that they did not wish the Union to represent them. Hammond indicated Respondent would not meet with the Union.

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by withdrawing its recognition of the Union.

B. The 8(a)(1) Allegations

Before 1977, there was some concern that the Union was not actually processing grievances at Quaker Oats' Pascagoula facility. Jack Crowley ran and was elected president of Local 540 on a campaign that he would file and process grievances. Supervisors Roger Danley and Zelma McKnight and General Manager Christensen admitted that employee grievances did increase after 1977 when Crowley was elected president. Union Representative Hubert Mills credibly testified that before 1977 few grievances reached arbitration—the stage where he became involved. However, with the election of Crowley, grievances increased to the point that from 1977 to the plant's June 1982 closing, Mills received more grievances for arbitration from Local 540 regarding Quaker's Pascagoula employees than from all of the 17 other locals he serviced.

John Tucker[2] and, subsequently, David Sewell followed Crowley as Local president before Quaker's June 1982 closing. The testimony indicated that the rate of grievances continued to increase after Crowley left office.

1. John Christensen

Former Quaker employee Eldon Waltman testified there were rumors in the spring of 1982 that the Pascagoula plant would close. Around that time, Waltman was called into John Christensen's office to receive a ring for cessing and sale of canned pet food, and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The complaint alleges, and Respondent admits, that the Charging Party (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[2] Tucker was not employed by Respondent after the July 19 opening. However, he is not alleged as a discriminatee, and the record does not indicate anything regarding the failure to employ Tucker.

20 years' service. While waiting for two foremen, Waltman asked Christensen about the possibility of the plant closing. According to Waltman, Christensen told him:

> He said right at the present time that there wasn't no plans to close it, but they was—the Chicago office was real upset about the way the union was writing grievances for women and blacks. At the time they had about 36 in the process. And that they was upset about not accepting the contract for the sardines, and the sardines needed to come there and hold the plant together, and about that time the other bosses come in.

On April 29, 1982, Christensen announced to all employees that Quaker Oats would close the Pascagoula plant.

On June 22, 1982, Jack Crowley saw Christensen escorting a group throughout the plant. Crowley went to Christensen as Christensen passed through the waste treatment area. According to Crowley:

> I asked Mr. Christian how would be—what was the chance of the plant, and how did it look for the people that worked there? And he told me things was looking good, and he said, "I'll guarantee you one thing when it opens back up, that there won't be any union here."

About a week after Sun Coast started production on July 19, 1982, Mary Long called and asked Christensen why she had not been called back to work:

> So he told me he knew what I meant, and he felt the same way. He said he didn't [know] why I wasn't hired. He said, but he had told Eddie Furby and Dick Bishop and McKnight that he was going to leave it up to the three of them, and for them to screen those people good and to pick those that called back, because if they didn't they'd be in the same predicament they was before, and we couldn't have that.

Discussion

John Christensen denied making the above mentioned comments to either Waltman, Crowley, or Mary Long. For several reasons, I do not credit Christensen's denials.

In the first place and most importantly, I was not impressed with Christensen's demeanor. Throughout his testimony, Christensen appeared nervous and ill at ease. Moreover, Christensen appeared overly anxious to explain portions of his testimony.

Secondly, the record demonstrated that John Christensen was a knowledgeable manager that was in demand. Sun Coast informed him that his agreement to stay on and run the plant was vital to its interest in buying the facility. Nevertheless, according to Christensen's testimony, he was divorced from many of the important decisions at the facility. Christensen testified to the effect that he knew little about the development of the sale until shortly before the plant reopened. Christensen professed to have no advance knowledge that he was becoming a vice president and general manager for Sun Coast. He professed to know of no discussions involving the buyers regarding the Union.[3] He knew little about the work performance of most of the alleged discriminatees, and he professed little knowledge about the selection of Sun Coast employees. I find it unusual that any person charged with running a relatively small plant would have so little knowledge about relevant issues. It is particularly surprising here in view of the demand for Christensen to continue running the plant. It is doubtful that anyone would be in demand if he knew no more than Christensen professed he knew.

Thirdly, the statements considered above were allegedly uttered by several different supervisors to numerous employees. Substantial evidence does show that the Union increased its activities after 1977 to the point where almost any employer would have been disturbed. I find it incredible that Quaker's Pascagoula managers were not disturbed, and I discredit Christensen's testimony to that effect. Against that background, Christensen's comments to Waltman appear logical. Moreover, I was impressed with the demeanor of Waltman, Crowley, and Long as they testified regarding the alleged comments by Christensen. All three were able to testify in a comfortable manner regarding the alleged comments and the facts material to those particular circumstances.

2. Richard Bishop

a. Jack Crowley

Jack Crowley testified that he called the plant on July 7, 1982, about his application for employment with Respondent. Crowley testified that he talked with Dick Bishop.

> Oh yes. On—I believe it was July the 7th, I called the plant, and I talked to Dick Bishop, and I asked him was he going to call me back, and he in return he said the company has hired all the people that they intended to, and I said, "Well, what will be the chances of me getting on later?" And he said—kind of laughed over the phone, and made the statement to me that, that because I was a trouble maker, and because of my union activity, I wouldn't get on, and hung the phone up.

Bishop denied having any phone call with Crowley regarding Crowley's application at Sun Coast.

Discussion

I was generally impressed with Jack Crowley's testimony. In most areas, he appeared to testify candidly. However, I am convinced that Crowley was not always truthful. Apparently Crowley made several phone calls to Respondent's employee Ralph Bethany and inquired as to occurrences at the plant and as to Bethany's willingness to testify in the instant hearing. When questioned about Bethany, Crowley contended that he was unaware that Bethany worked for Respondent. That statement was untrue. It was obvious that Crowley knew where Bethany worked.

[3] Nevertheless, art. 7.2 of the asset purchase agreement between Respondent and Quaker Oats (in evidence) demonstrates that the buyers (Respondent) did discuss and become aware of the Union at the Pascagoula facility.

It appeared that Crowley felt he was prohibited from talking with Bethany and, for that reason, he refused to admit facts which may have been incriminating. Similarly, his testimony regarding the Bishop phone call involved Crowley's personal interest (i.e., whether he was illegally denied employment). Therefore, in view of Crowley's demonstrated reluctance to be truthful when his personal interests are at stake, I shall discredit his testimony about the Bishop phone conversation.

b. Alvin Ralph Bethany

Alvin Ralph Bethany testified to a conversation he had with Richard Bishop following the plant closing announcement on April 29, 1982. At the hearing, Bethany testified that he had a conversation with Bishop in the parking lot and:

> We was talking—more or less we was talking about sardines. And he said that the union was the cause of the sardines not—not to go through. And that was it on that.

Bethany denied at the hearing that Bishop said that the plant was closing because of the Union or that the plant would have no union if it reopened. However, two written statements by Bethany were introduced into evidence. Bethany admitted signing the two statements. In both, Bethany testified that on April 29, 1982, Ralph Bishop told him that the plant was closing because of the Union and that, when it reopened, it would be without a union. One of the statements was given to the Union in July 1982; the other to Board Agent Clement Kennington in February 1983.

Bethany denied telling the Union and Board Agent Kennington that Bishop attributed the plant closing to the Union. I am convinced and find that Bethany did testify as related in those two affidavits. Bethany, who is currently employed by Respondent, admitted that he was under pressure not to testify, and that the pressure was getting to him. He was not under similar pressure when he gave the written statements.

I am convinced and find that Ralph Bishop told employee Bethany on April 29, 1982, that the Union was the cause of the plant closing and that the plant would be without a union if it reopened.[4] See Alvin J. Bart & Co., 236 NLRB 242 (1978); Star Kist, Samoa, 237 NLRB 238 (1978); see also Fed.R.Evid. 803(24), 804(b)(1), and 804(b)(5).

3. Zelma McKnight

Eldon Waltman testified that following the April announcement that the plant would close, his fellow employees frequently asked their supervisor, Zelma McKnight, if "he knows anything, who was going to take over the company or what, and who was going to work."

According to Waltman, on many of these occasions, McKnight replied to the employees to the effect that "troublemakers" and the "Union" would not be there when the plant reopened. Waltman testified that all those incidents occurred between the April announcement that the plant would close and the actual closing. Waltman said that McKnight did not identify the troublemakers.

Former employee James Page corroborated Waltman. Page testified that he overheard a conversation in the maintenance shop a few weeks before Quaker closed the plant. Zelma McKnight, Eldon Waltman, Lonnie Graham, Bert Rae, and Carl Scale were present. Page overheard Zelma McKnight say that the plant "would probably reopen, but there wasn't going to be any union there and there wasn't going to be any trouble makers."

Zelma McKnight denied threatening that the reopened facility would be nonunion without troublemakers. Respondent also called Bert Rae, Lonnie Graham, and Robert McLain who are currently employed by Respondent. All those employees worked under Zelma McKnight at Quaker and all testified that they never overheard McKnight say that troublemakers and the Union would be eliminated if the plant reopened.

McKnight admitted that employees asked him about the possibility of the plant reopening. However, according to McKnight, he always responded simply that he did not know.

Discussion

Zelma McKnight was a supervisor under the direct supervision of Manager of Engineering and Maintenance Richard Bishop. The alleged comments made by McKnight are similar to the comments Bishop made to Alvin Bethany (above). I am convinced, on the basis of the entire record, that several supervisors, including Christensen, Bishop, and McKnight, felt that the Union and "troublemakers" within the Union contributed to the closing of the Pascagoula plant. Therefore, I find that the probabilities are that McKnight made the threats as testified by Waltman and Page.

Moreover, I do not credit McKnight on the basis of my observation of his demeanor. I do not believe that McKnight replied to numerous questions about possible reopening by simply saying that he knew nothing.

During the time of those conversations McKnight along with Bishop and others were involved in efforts to organize a more efficient operation at Pascagoula. Obviously, grievances oftentimes have a detrimental effect on efficiency. Respondent's contention that it was not bothered by increased grievances does not wash in view of the strong emphasis the reorganization group placed on streamlining their operations. McKnight admitted that there was an increase in the number of grievances filed, and that those grievances affected his operation by taking people from their work "to go to the union meetings and so forth."

Waltman testified that McKnight occasionally mentioned "that the union wouldn't be there [when the plant reopened] to write grievances on him, and giving him

[4] This matter was not alleged as an 8(a)(1) violation. However, I find that the conversation occurred, and I will consider that in subsequent findings herein where such considerations are material to the particular issue at hand.

hard times, is the way [McKnight] put it." I am convinced and find that Waltman and Page testified truthfully. I do not credit McKnight. Nor do I credit the testimony of those employees who currently work for Respondent.

C. The Refusal to Hire

As shown above, the credited evidence in support of the 8(a)(1) allegations demonstrates that it was Respondent's intent through its supervisory force to eliminate the Union. The initial decision regarding hire at Sun Coast rested with John Christensen. According to Christensen, he delegated that responsibility to three of his high-level supervisors, Richard Bishop, Lee Dodge, and Ed Furby.

As shown above, credited evidence demonstrated that Respondent's supervisory hierarchy felt that the Union and grievances under the collective-bargaining agreement contributed to Quaker Oats' decision to close. Other evidence demonstrated that it was not unusual for supervisors to blame the Union for Quaker Oats' problems at Pascagoula. Former employees Corinthian Smith and James Shannon credibly testified that Supervisor Ronald Landrum told employees, before the plant closed, that grievances were a nuisance to him and to management, and that when the plant reopened, it would be without a union.

The record proves that Respondent, through John Christensen and his supervisors, was motivated to eliminate the Union when the plant reopened on July 19, 1982. The General Counsel contends that the plan to eliminate the Union followed two routes: (1) The Company planned to deny reinstatement to hardcore union supporters, and (2) Respondent planned to deny recognition to the Union.

The alleged refusals to hire

In analyzing these allegations, it is important to distinguish the instant situation from a discharge case. Here, the General Counsel presented no evidence contesting Respondent's decision to employ 51 hourly employees as opposed to the 70 employed by Quaker at the time of closing. Therefore, the critical query must involve whether Respondent discriminatorily selected for employment employees other rather than the alleged discriminatees, because of their protected activities.

In consideration of the above issue, I shall consider: (1) whether the particular employee was associated with the post-1977 union activities in light of my finding above of Respondent's demonstrated animus; (2) whether the particular employee was discriminatorily denied employment;[5] and (3) whether the evidence established that that particular alleged discriminatee would have been denied employment in the absence of protected activity.

[5] In consideration of this issue, I note that General Counsel did not prove that Respondent's asserted basis for selecting employees was, in and of itself, illegal. Therefore, as to each individual, I shall apply the standard used by Respondent. The factors used were (1) number of years of canning factory experience, and (2) demonstrated good work performance (see letters from Respondent to Hankins of the NLRB Regional Office (G.C. Exhs. 22 and 23)).

a. Jack Crowley

There is no doubt that Crowley was visibly involved in protected activity. Crowley was elected president of Local 540 in 1977 after he campaigned on a platform to process grievances. Crowley estimated that he was involved in the processing of approximately 170 grievances. After serving as president for 2-1/2 years, Crowley served as steward and chief steward until the plant closed. Crowley testified that he and Andy Hammond had words regarding the filing of grievances during meetings in 1977 and 1978. According to Crowley, Hammond threatened to discharge him in 1978 when Crowley brought up grievances being filed with black employees. Hammond testified that he did not recall having those disputes with Crowley.

Regardless of my determination as to whether the Crowley-Hammond arguments occurred in 1977 and 1978, it is clear, and I find, that Respondent was aware of Jack Crowley's deep involvement in the post-1977 union. The record, and especially that portion noted in discussions above, clearly established that Respondent was motivated to rid itself of Jack Crowley.

Therefore, I shall now consider whether the record shows that Crowley was discriminatorily rejected for employment.

As indicated above, Respondent allegedly based its employment decision on two factors: (1) seniority and (2) work performance.

(1) Seniority

The record includes a maintenance department seniority list dated June 25, 1982. Twenty-two employees appeared on that list. Jack Crowley, who was originally hired by Quaker on August 14, 1972, appears as the 18th employee on the seniority list. Only four employees are listed as junior to Crowley. None of those four junior employees were hired by Respondent. Additionally, seven employees listed as senior to Jack Crowley were not hired. One of those seven is listed as "disabled," and another is alleged discriminatee Mary C. Long.

On the basis of the above evidence, which was not disputed by the General Counsel, I find that Jack Crowley did not qualify for employment by Respondent on the basis of his seniority.

(2) Job performance

Respondent offered testimony which included testimony from a former supervisor of Jack Crowley to the effect that Crowley did not perform his work satisfactorily. That former supervisor, Lonnie Roberts, is not presently employed by Respondent. Crowley, in his testimony, contended that he was a competent employee.

Work review evaluations in the record show that Jack Crowley was rated "marginal" on maintenance skills in March and April 1979. No other work review evaluations were received in evidence. Columns for good, satisfactory, marginal, and unsatisfactory appear on the evaluation form.

The General Counsel offered "change notices" for Jack Crowley from Quaker Oats business records. Those notices which were dated in 1972, 1973, and 1974 list Crowley as a trainee and list his "quality of service" as good. Ratings of excellent, good, fair, and poor were included on those forms.

Change forms submitted also include three dates, January 6, 1975, and August 24 and 31, 1981. The 1975 form lists Crowley's "new job class" as "maintenance man" and the "good block" under quality of service is checked. Both the 1981 forms appear to represent increases in pay and list, as "reason," "operation of seniority." On those two 1981 change forms, no rating is given under "quality of service."

Despite the confusion over the quality of Crowley's performance, Crowley did admit that he was not skilled at electrical work or at reading blueprints. He admitted that he performed no troubleshooting work and that he was not a certified welder. Crowley admitted that he was once asked by Supervisor McKnight to waive seniority in order to permit Eddie Mims[6] to return to the maintenance department. Crowley admitted that he has taken only 2 of over 18 training courses offered for maintenance employees.

In addition to the above, Respondent offered testimony through Manager of Engineering and Maintenance Richard Bishop to the effect that all the needed skills in maintenance were covered by hiring employees, many of whom having more than one of the skills required, who appeared before Jack Crowley on the seniority list. No evidence in the record rebutted that testimony.

In view of the above, I am unable to find that Respondent treated Jack Crowley with disparity. The record does not support a finding that but for his union and other protected activities, Jack Crowley would have been selected for employment. The record does show, as alleged by Respondent, that in consideration of seniority and work performance, a full employee complement was hired from those employees senior to Crowley. The record failed to show that any of the employees hired lacked competence or that their prior work performance was unsatisfactory.

The General Counsel correctly questioned Respondent's contention that its supervisors did not consult work records before making the decision on selection of the work force. However, that fact does not establish a violation. If the record had developed discrepancies between work records and testimony from supervisors, I may have questioned that testimony and, perhaps, credited documentary evidence on the issue of work performance. However, in the case of Jack Crowley, the records failed to show such a discrepancy. Therefore, I find that discrimination was not proven as to Crowley.

b. Henry Davis

Davis worked for Quaker from 1973 until the plant closed on June 25, 1982. His last job was "Depalletizer Operator" under the direct supervision of Fred McKnight. Lee Dodge was head of the canning department over Fred McKnight. Dodge selected employees from canning for employment with Respondent.

[6] Mims is also an alleged discriminatee in these proceedings.

(1) Union activities

Davis joined the Union around 1974. About 2-1/2 or 3 years before the plant closed in 1982, Jack Crowley appointed Henry Davis to the position of shop steward. Davis estimated that he filed 20 or 25 grievances for other employees.

Davis testified that while he was shop steward, first Jack Crowley was president, then John Tucker. Eugene Sipp was recording secretary and treasurer, Dave Sewell was vice president, and Curtis Sanderson was one of the shop stewards.

(2) Seniority

Henry Davis was 16th on the canning department June 25, 1982 seniority list. The list included a total of 27 employees. Of those 15 employees with more seniority than Henry Davis, 11 were hired by Respondent. Of the four not hired, one, Fannie Mae Williams, a depalletizer operator, did not apply and another, Robert G. Heston, was disabled. The two others with more seniority than Henry Davis that were not hired were Dorothy Mae Williams who, like Davis, was a depalletizer operator, and Jack S. Schmiers, a "clean-up leaderman."

Of the 11 employees with less seniority, four were hired. One did not apply, one was disabled, and five were not hired. No one formerly employed as a "depalletizer operator" was hired. The only Quaker "depalletizer operators" were Fannie Mae Williams, Dorothy Mae Williams, and Henry Davis. The four employees junior to Henry Davis that were hired by Respondent, included two "cereal unloaders," a "blender operator," and a "closer attendant."

(3) Job performance

Davis admitted that when he was assigned to the "closer attendant" job, he could not keep up and was disqualified from working that position. When operating a forklift, Davis backed into a post on one occasion and lifted into and bent one of the production lines on another occasion. He also admitted spilling a pallet of 10,000 cans. Davis was removed from the job of greasing machines because he was "putting too much grease in the machines." Davis was unable to hold an unloading job because the ladder he had to climb to measure syrup was "too high for [him] to climb up."

Davis received a written warning on October 7, 1980, for urinating in one of the cans at his work station on the depalletizer. Davis admitted that he had done that on other occasions and that female employees complained that the cans he used to relieve himself got mixed in with the other cans on the sanitary line and the workers got urine all over their hands.

I sympathize with Davis. He impressed me as an honest man. However, the record did not reveal the existence of any jobs at Respondent for which Davis was qualified. As shown above, no depalletizer operators were hired by Respondent and, by his own admissions, Davis had shown an inability to handle other positions.

Although Davis' union activities may have been a source of concern, the record demonstrates that Henry

Davis would have been denied employment by Respondent in the absence of protected activities.

c. Mary Long

Mary Long was hired by Quaker on June 25, 1955. She served as janitor from 1969 until the plant closed on June 25, 1982. Her last immediate supervisor was J. B. George. George worked under the supervision of Mark Chamberlain who was directly under John Christensen. When the plant closed, Long was the only janitor at the plant.

(1) Union activity

Before 1977, Long was a shop steward once in the late '60s. She had been a member of the Local since 1955. After the Union became more aggressive under Jack Crowley, Long became financial secretary for Local 540 around 1977. She was on the Local's negotiating committee for its last three contracts with Quaker, and she was on the Local's negotiating committee for a special agreement for an experimental project with sardines.

(2) Seniority

Mary Long was at the top of the maintenance employees June 25, 1982 seniority list. Twenty-two employees were listed as junior to her. Ten of those twenty-two were hired by Respondent. Long was replaced by an employee from the casing department, Swetlena Goff.

Goff was not employed as janitor when Quaker closed, and there is no evidence showing that she had janitorial experience. Goff was employed by Quaker in 1976—some 21 years after Mary Long.

Additionally, Goff was not a member of Local 540. She testified that she notified Quaker that she had dropped out of the Union in 1978. As shown below, Goff circulated a petition to decertify Local 540 in September 1982.

(3) Job performance

Long credibly testified that she never received writeups or criticism of her work during the 27 years she worked for Quaker. She testified without rebuttal that shortly before the plant closed in June 1982, Mark Chamberlain complimented her work:

> Yes, used to before the plant closed, he'd come by the garbage can and helped me with the garbage can, and told me that he knew it had been hard, but—it was a lot of work, but I had kept the plant real clean, and he appreciated the way I had kept the front up in there trying to sell the plant, and he felt like what I had done had helped to sell the plant, and he just wanted me to know that he appreciated it.

Long testified without rebuttal that John Christensen and Supervisor J. B. George complimented her work:

> Q. I see. How about Mr. Christensen, did he ever talk to you about your job?
>
> A. Well, once he—maybe more than once, several times when he would see me, he told us that myself and Margaret Boyd, another employee there, that our names were all over Chicago for keeping the office like a hospital.
> Q. I see. And how about your supervisor, J. B. George, did he ever talk to you about your job?
> A. Yeah, each time I come in contact with Mr. George, he would tell me "looking good, looking, keep up the good work."

Neither Chamberlain nor George was called to dispute Long's testimony. Christensen first testified that after cutting janitors from two down to one, Mary Long complained that she could not do all the work. Christensen testified that he understood that was why she was not rehired. Later, Christensen testified that he observed that Long was not cleaning the offices up to standard.

Richard Bishop testified that restrooms were not cleaned while Mary Long was the lone janitor. Zelma McKnight testified there were several areas that needed attention when Long was janitor. Both Bishop and McKnight testified that Mary Long frequently complained about her health.

Discussion

Unlike the situation with employees mentioned above, there is no documentary evidence demonstrating that Mary Long performed her work poorly. Long's testimony that she was complimented by all her supervisors, George, Chamberlain, and Christensen, is unrebutted. I was impressed by Long's demeanor. She testified comfortably with apparent candor. I shall credit her testimony.

Neither Bishop nor Zelma McKnight, who testified against Long, supervised her work.

No one testified that Long was ever written up, or spoken to, as to poor quality work. Long testified that she was never spoken to or disciplined.

Therefore, I am unable to credit testimony that Long's work was inferior. It was Quaker's policy to discipline employees when necessary, as shown regarding other alleged discriminatees. Long testified without contradiction that she was never disciplined in her 27 years with Quaker Oats.

In view of the above, I find that Respondent refused to employ Mary Long in violation of its asserted guidelines. Mary Long should have been selected for employment on the basis of being the most senior employee in the maintenance department and having an unblemished work record.

Mary Long was deeply and visibly involved in the affairs of Local 540 after 1977.

Respondent's hostility to the activities of the Union from 1977 is shown above. I find that Respondent's asserted bases for the discharge of Mary Long were pretextual and the true reason was her involvement in union affairs after 1977.

In view of my findings above, and especially in consideration of the fact that Mary Long was the only janitor employed by Quaker Oats on June 25, 1982, I find that the record evidence does not show that Mary Long would have been denied employment absent her protected activities.

d. Eddie Mims

Eddie Mims was hired by Quaker on October 4, 1972. Mims worked in the maintenance department. He worked in the boiler room for the 3-1/2 to 4 months before the plant closed on June 25, 1982. Like all the other alleged discriminatees, Mims applied for work with Respondent but was not hired.

(1) Seniority

Mims was one of the most junior maintenance department employees. He ranked 19th out of 22. None of the employees below him were hired by Respondent. Neither of the two employees immediately above him in seniority, Jack Crowley and Arnold Martino, were hired. However, Martino was listed as disabled. Of the 18 maintenance employees with more seniority than Mims, only 10 were hired by Respondent.

(2) Work performance

Respondent contends that its major problem with Mims' job performance involved his temper. Former Supervisor Lonnie Roberts testified to a series of incidents during 1977, 1978, and 1979 when Mims lost his temper and became abusive. Roberts testified that Mims threatened him physically on numerous occasions during that period of time. Mims admitted that he and Roberts had arguments. However, Mims attributed those occurrences to Roberts having "racial problems." Roberts is white. Mims is black. Mims denied that he ever threatened Lonnie Roberts.

On April 14, 1982, Mims had a run in with his supervisor at that time, Harry Winnett. Subsequently, a meeting was held with Andy Hammond, Harry Winnett, Grant Murry, Union Steward David Sewell, and Mims. Hammond pointed out that Mims had been loud, insulting, threatening, and insubordinate. Mims, in turn, accused his supervisors of being prejudiced. Mims stated that he was "not going to tolerate it."

Findings

Obviously, employees are protected under the Act from discipline because they vigorously prosecute grievances under their collective-bargaining agreement. In the case of Eddie Mims, some of Respondent's evidence regarding his intemperate behavior occurred in the context of grievance proceedings. On other occasions, Mims may have been protesting what he viewed as racial discrimination by supervisory personnel. However, the record shows that, on several other occasions, Mims had run-ins with supervisors, including Lonnie Roberts and Harry Winnett, which did not involve protected activity. The record shows that on numerous occasions, Eddie Mims appeared to become irrational in his anger over what should have been nothing more than a minor incident. One such incident which was noted by former Supervisor Roberts in his personal records[7] (quoted in part) follows:

> I stopped & touched Eddie on the left shoulder, as he turned around I told him to get off the phone & back to work, the reason I told him in this manner was that I saw a football sheet in front of him, I then told him to put that thing up as I have told you before you are not to bring them to work.
> Eddie got verry upset at this time & said he was talking to his wife. I told him I didn't care who he was talking to, to hang up the phone, at this time Eddie became verry upset he started cursing & yelling at me about no M.F. was going to interupt him while he was talking to his wife. He then hit the phone receiver against the bottom of the phone booth. I told him to stay there, I went to the processing door to see if Eddie Furby was inside, I wanted a witness, Furby was not (no one was). At this time Eddie said something else on the phone and hung it up. I then followed him to the shop where I told him to come over to the lathe where Jack was. I told Jack I wanted him to know what had happened. Eddie yelled out, you dam richt, I will tell you what happen, I started telling Jack but didn't ged far. Eddie was yelling in my face, about no bonch of M.F.s was going to interupt him while he was talking to his wife not even John C, & he would tell him the same thing, I told him he would probably get the chance. I told Jack he was talking on the phone with a football card in front of him, he said (Eddie) you are a dam lyer. I ask him to show Jack what he had & he said what he had in his pocket was his business & no M.F. was going to see in it. At this time he was about 12 inches from my face & beating his fist on the belt guard on the lathe. [Sic.]

Mims admitted the above incident. However, he denied that he was upset or that he cursed Roberts. Unfortunately, from Mims' standpoint, the record demonstrates the occurrence of several instances similar to that above.

In view of the substantial evidence, including Mims' admissions, and the testimony of Lonnie Roberts and Andy Hammond, I am convinced and find that Eddie Mims had a number of serious disputes with supervisors during which he became loud and insubordinate. In making that finding, I note that one of the witnesses for the General Counsel, alleged discriminatee David Sewell, was not asked and did not testify in corroboration of Mims regarding the April 14, 1982 meeting with Andy Hammond, Winnett, and Murry. I must presume that Sewell would not have corroborated Mims if he had been asked about that incident.

I find that Mims' behavior was a justifiable basis on which to downgrade Mims' job performance. Additionally, as shown above, Mims lacked the necessary seniority to qualify for one of the jobs offered by Respondent.

[7] Roberts recorded in his personal record several other incidents involving Mims.

Therefore, I find that Eddie Mims was not treated discriminatorily. Mims would not have been employed by Respondent in the absence of his protected activity.

e. Curtis Sanderson

Curtis Sanderson started working for Quaker Oats on January 19, 1970. He worked until the facility closed on June 25, 1982. At that time his job was forklift operator. Ronald Landrum was Sanderson's immediate supervisor. The department head over Landrum was Production Manager Lee Dodge. Sanderson applied for work with Respondent in early July 1982.

Sanderson was a member of the Union from shortly after his original hire date. Sanderson testified that, during the first 6 years of his employment, the Local had a reputation of being close to management and not pursuing employee grievances. Sanderson served as shop steward in 1979 and 1980 and processed some 15, 20, or 25 grievances.[8] In processing those grievances, Sanderson worked with Supervisors Furby and Ronald "Slim Landrum."

Evidence showed that Landrum was particularly hostile to the Union and to the filing of grievances. Former employee Corinthian Smith, who was a leaderman (manufacturing specialist) when the plant closed, testified as follows regarding a conversation with Landrum about 3 weeks before the plant closed:

> I said, "Well," I said, "I'm going to do the best I can long as I'm here." He said, "These other people," he says, " I feel sorry for them in a way," he said, "There's a lot of them going to be standing around with their mouth open, and it'll be too bad, because when Quaker Oats sell out," he says, "A lot of them won't be able to come back here, and we won't have to be bothered with them any more. It's hard to get along with them, and we just won't have to be bothered with them any more." And he says, "Nothing can help them then, because they'll be on the outside looking in." He says, "Because as far as the union's concerned, and all of that," he says, "It'll be done away with. Because I'm really tired of these grievance being filed against me, anyway," he said, "it's just getting a nuisance. Every time you turn around it's just grievance, grievance."
> He says, "But it won't be long, and it'll all be over." He said, "No union, and grievance—filing grievance will help then, because another company will have it, "take it over." That's the conversation we had that day.

Smith testified to another conversation with Landrum about a week later. Employee James Shannon was also present:

> Okay, so he—he say, "Smitty, you've never ever refused to do what I tell you to do," says, "But, I'm going to tell you," he says, "It's a job around here to supervise some of these people today. They're slow about doing it, they don't want to—act like they don't want to do it," he says, "and if you try to push them too hard, they're going to have grievances up against you," he says, "it's just pretty rough on you. Like I told you back there," says, "It's all winding down, it's just winding down to where I won't have to be going through this stuff." He said, "Of course, you take these grievances they're having written up on me and filing against me, and all that," he says, "then I got to put up with it," he says, "it's just getting to be a nuisance with it." He said, "But it won't be long before all this will be over," he says, "and most of them's going to be standing on the outside looking on the inside, it just be something else to do." He says, "I feel sorry for them," he says, "But I don't think the company going to hire them back," he says, "they won't have no help if we get them back, going in the grievances or what not, won't accept every," says, "I don't believe they'll accept them back here any more."

James Shannon testified that he recalled a conversation with Corinthian Smith and other employees present with Ronald Landrum where Landrum told them that the plant would close down, and he would hire some of them back but Landrum guaranteed there would be no union.

Ronald Landrum denied discussing the Union with Smith or Shannon. He denied telling them what could occur to the Union if the plant reopened. I was not impressed with Landrum's demeanor. Both Corinthian Smith and James Shannon demonstrated good demeanor. Neither is alleged as an alleged discriminatee herein and neither has anything to gain through this proceeding. Their testimony appeared logical, and I credit their testimony.

In view of Sanderson's involvement in the grievance procedures with Ronald Landrum, it is apparent that Landrum's remarks to Smith constitute threats to not rehire Sanderson after the plant reopened.

The testimony of Lee Dodge demonstrated that Ronald Landrum was instrumental in selecting which employees under his supervision at Quaker would be rehired by Respondent. Landrum rejected Sanderson as an employee for Respondent. On the basis of the above facts, I find that Ronald Landrum was motivated to reject Sanderson because of his activities on behalf of Local 540.

I shall now consider whether Respondent discriminated against Sanderson by applying the guidelines set forth in Respondent's statements of position to the Board.

(1) Seniority

Curtis Sanderson ranked fourth on the Quaker manufacturing department seniority list for June 25, 1982. Two of the three employees senior to Sanderson, Corin-

[8] Ronald Landrum testified that he was unaware that Sanderson was an officer in the Union. Landrum did not deny that Sanderson was shop steward or that Landrum was involved in the processing of grievances with Sanderson.

thian Smith and James Shannon, did not apply for employment with Respondent. The other employee senior to Curtis Sanderson was David Sewell, another alleged discriminatee that was denied employment.

There were 14 employees on the seniority list for the manufacturing department. Only two were hired by Respondent. Those two, Howard L. Walters classified as meat handler and Willie L. Tanksley classified as laborer, ranked 11th and 12th on the seniority list.

Curtis Sanderson was classified as manufacturing specialist on June 25, 1982. Manufacturing specialist was the most skilled, highest nonsupervisory ranking position in the department.[9]

(2) Work performance

Ronald Landrum testified that Curtis Sanderson was not a "willing worker." Landrum and Lee Dodge said that Sanderson took excessive breaks and talked too much. Landrum characterized Sanderson as not being cooperative. He said Sanderson "would be disagreeable" sometimes after receiving a work order. However, Landrum admitted that he never wrote up Sanderson for poor work or other work performance infractions. He admitted that Sanderson had a fair "amount of ability."

According to Sanderson's testimony, he received a number of writeups before his marriage in 1975. However, since his marriage, Sanderson has received only one other writeup.[10] The testimony of Dodge and Landrum failed to show that they were aware of those pre-1976 disciplinary writeups on Sanderson. Dodge and Landrum did not include the writeups in their alleged basis for refusing to hire Sanderson.

Sanderson testified in dispute with Dodge and Landrum, that he was never cautioned about taking excessive breaktime, or wandering away from his work station, and he was never late for work.

I credit Sanderson's account of his work performance.[11] Sanderson was open about his writeups and he demonstrated excellent demeanor. Although Respondent contended his work performance was poor, that evaluation was not documented even though it was the practice at Quaker to write up employees in similar instances. I find that the assertions of Landrum and Dodge as to Sanderson's work performance were untrue and were advanced as a pretext in order to avoid hiring Curtis Sanderson.

The record demonstrates, and I find, that Curtis Sanderson was denied employment by Respondent because of his union related activities while he worked at Quaker Oats. In consideration of the objective factors of seniority and work performance, Sanderson should have been hired.

f. David Sewell

David Sewell was hired by Quaker on January 12, 1970. At the June 25, 1982 plant closing, Sewell, like Sanderson, was classified as manufacturing specialist under the supervision of Ronald Landrum. Sewell applied for work with Respondent but was told by Lee Dodge that he "didn't make the list."

Sewell was shop steward, then chief shop steward during the presidency of Jack Crowley. Subsequently, Sewell was elected vice president under John Tucker. After Tucker's presidency, Sewell became president of Local 540. He was Local president when the plant closed on June 25, 1982. During his time as chief steward, vice president, and president, Sewell served on some 15 to 20 grievance committees. He testified that some of the grievance discussions became "heated."

(1) Seniority

David Sewell was the most senior of those manufacturing department employees that applied for work with Respondent. No one senior to him in that department was hired by Respondent.

(2) Work performance

David Sewell was categorized similarly to Curtis Sanderson by both Lee Dodge and Ronald Landrum. According to Dodge, Sewell did not work well on his own, lacked initiative, and took excessive breaks. Landrum testified that Sewell took excessive breaks and was not a willing worker.

On the other hand, David Sewell testified that he was never criticized for his work.

I credit Sewell. It is unbelievable that an employee as incompetent as Dodge and Landrum would have us believe they had in, David Sewell would be promoted to and maintained in a leaderman position. Despite Dodge and Landrum's testimony to the contrary, the collective-bargaining agreement at section 5.10(b) provides that Sewell could not hold the leaderman position unless he had the ability. Moreover, despite Dodge's indication that Sewell was always an unsatisfactory employee, there was no documentation to that effect.

As in the case of Sanderson, I find that Respondent's assertions as to the reasons Sewell was not hired were pretextual. Sewell would have been employed, but for his union activities, under an objective application of the seniority and work performance guidelines which Respondent claimed it applied.

g. Eugene Sipp

Eugene Sipp was employed by Quaker from August 28, 1972, until the June 25, 1982 closing. He was classified as a meat handler under Ronald Landrum.

Sipp became active in the Union in 1977 when he became shop steward. He filed four or five grievances. After about a year as steward, Sipp became recording secretary for the Local. He held that job until the plant

[9] Although Respondent contended that employees reached the position of manufacturing specialist solely through seniority, the collective-bargaining agreement at sec. 5.10(b) indicates that although preference is given the senior applicant for a position, "[N]o employee shall be selected unless he has the ability to perform the job within 30 working days."

[10] Sanderson had a dispute with another employee in the break room. Sanderson told the other employee to stop cursing in the presence of an employee's wife and child. Sanderson received a 3-day suspension for threatening to harm the other employee.

[11] Additionally, Sanderson was supported by the testimony of David Sewell. Sewell worked as leaderman over Sanderson and Eugene Sipp (see below) and testified that Sanderson and Sipp "did excellent work."

closed. As recording secretary, he served on the grievance committee which consisted of the Local president, vice president, and recording secretary. On the management side during the grievance meetings, those present would include the particular supervisor involved in the grievance, along with Andy Hammond, Bob Chamberlain, and sometimes John Christensen.

Sipp was also on the negotiating committee after 1977.[12] Sipp served on the grievance committee regarding the sardines experiment.[13]

(1) Seniority

Sipp ranked eighth on the June 25, 1982 seniority list from the manufacturing department. However, none of the seven more senior employees were hired by Respondent. Those seven included David Sewell and Curtis Sanderson. The only manufacturing employees hired by Respondent were Howard L. Walters and Willie L. Tanksley. Both were junior to Sipp.

(2) Work performance

Ronald Landrum admitted that Eugene Sipp performed his job well. According to Landrum, "[w]hen [Sipp] performed [his work], he performed it good." However, according to Landrum, Sipp, like Sanderson and Sewell, was not a willing worker and he took excessive breaks.

Lee Dodge described Eugene Sipp as "a person with a lot of ability. Natural ability but again wouldn't perform, wouldn't use his ability, excessive breaks, and absent from his work area."

Again, as in the case of Sanderson and Sewell, Respondent produced no documentation[14] in support of its assertion that Sipp took excessive breaks and was not a willing worker.

Sipp candidly testified that after 1977, he received no oral or written criticism of his work from his supervisors. Sipp testified that he was continuously complimented on his work and that he and another employee were frequently selected to do the inventory because of their ability. I was impressed with Sipp's demeanor, and I credit his testimony in full.

As in the case of Sanderson and Sewell, I find that Respondent refused to hire Sipp for pretextual and spurious reasons. If Respondent had applied its objective guidelines of seniority and work performance in a nondiscriminatory fashion, Sipp would have been hired in July 1982. I find that he was unlawfully denied employment because of his union activities after 1977.

[12] As part of its defense, Respondent claimed that it hired several employees who were deeply involved with the Union at Quaker. Sipp corroborated other evidence by testifying that those employees who are listed below did not play an active role in union affairs after the signing of the 1979–1980 collective-bargaining contract: D. L. Davis, Cumbest, Colin Brown, Bert Rea, Tanner, Willie Tanksley, and Ralph Bethany

[13] According to Sipp, during one of the meetings over the sardine experiment in 1981, John Christensen remarked that "the Company was used to getting what they wanted from the Union."

[14] Sipp testified that he did receive one writeup in 1977 when he and two other employees went home without authorization.

D. The Alleged 8(a)(5) Violation

On June 25, 1982, when Quaker Oats closed its Pascagoula, Mississippi canning plant, it was party to a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 540 which was to be effective from January 24, 1980, until January 24, 1983. The contract applied to maintenance and production employees at Quaker's Pascagoula facility. Local 540 had exclusively represented the employees in the Pascagoula bargaining unit for a number of years before 1980.

Following its close on June 25, the Pascagoula facility was sold to Sun Coast Foods, Inc. (Respondent). On July 19, 1982, Sun Coast opened and resumed the operation formerly conducted by Quaker Oats using the same facility. Sun Coast employed 51 hourly employees. All 51 formerly worked for Quaker Oats at the same facility. Quaker Oats' payroll at the time the facility was closed included some 70 hourly employees.

Additionally, Sun Coast employed several supervisors that were employed by Quaker Oats including General Manager Christensen, Meat and Processing Manager Lee Dodge, Engineering and Maintenance Manager Richard Bishop, Purchasing and Planning Manager Andy Hammond, and several lower level supervisors.

According to the testimony of International Chemical Workers Union Representative Hubert Mills,[15] after Quaker Oats announced on April 29, 1982, that the plant would close, he met with John Christensen and Andy Hammond on May 6, to discuss the effects of the closing. During that meeting, Mills stated to Christensen:

> Well, if you find a buyer will you agree to get him to—inform them that there's a union here and get them to accept our contract?

Christensen then replied:

> Well, you're getting the cart before the horse. We've got to find a buyer first.

Mills met again with Hammond on June 24, 1982, to discuss the closing. Mills asked if a buyer had been found. Hammond replied, "[N]o, they had some lookers."

At a June 29, 1982 meeting Hammond again told Mills they had no buyer. At a June 30, 1982 meeting Mills was again told by Hammond they had no buyer. Mills then asked Hammond why the local newspaper had a story that Sun Coast Foods was buying the plant. Hammond replied:

> "Well, I don't know," says, "I understand that some people got some options on it, but we didn't have a buyer."

Mills then replied:

> Well, we want to negotiate with you on the sale of this, and taking these people back and all, and when you find out who's buying the plant, will you let me know?

[15] Mills demonstrated excellent demeanor. In large measure, his testimony was not contested. I credit his testimony.

Nevertheless, Mills was never advised about the sale of the plant. Mills had the Union's legal department check on Sun Coast Foods. He was advised that Karl Wiesenburg, Pascagoula, Mississippi, was the registered agent for Sun Coast Foods, Inc.

On July 7, 1982, Mills sent a bargaining demand letter to Wiesenburg. Approximately a week after July 7, Karl Wiesenburg left a message for Mills stating that he did not have authority to bargain on behalf of Respondent.

On August 5, 1982, Mills again wrote Wiesenburg. He informed Wiesenburg that he had learned that the sale of the Quaker Oats plant to Sun Coast was finalized on July 15, 1982. Mills again advised Wiesenburg that the Union represented the plant's employees. He requested to meet concerning those employees and, if Wiesenburg lacked authority to bargain, that Wiesenburg advise him of the name and address of the person who had authority.

On August 16, Wiesenburg wrote Mills advising that he is Sun Coast's registered agent. Wiesenburg also stated that he had forwarded Mills' letter to John Christensen.

Having heard nothing further, Mills sent a bargaining demand letter to John Christensen on September 8, 1982. Mills stated that he would file charges with the Labor Board unless he heard something by September 14, 1982.

On September 13, 1982, Andy Hammond called and agreed to meet with Mills on September 22, 1982. Those arrangements were confirmed by Hammond in a September 14 letter wherein he also stated that Respondent does not intend to "assume the labor agreement between" Quaker Oats and the Union.

On September 16, Hammond wrote Mills canceling the September 22 meeting. Hammond stated that 35 of their 51 employees had presented Sun Coast with a petition stating they did not wish the Union to represent them.

Since September 16, Respondent has not agreed to recognize and meet with the Union.

Finding

There is no doubt that Respondent is the successor to Quaker Oats at Pascagoula. Although there was a brief hiatus [16] in operation from June 25 to July 19, 1982, there was continuity of the same business operations; Respondent used substantially the same work force as Quaker; Respondent employed substantially the same supervisory hierarchy; and Respondent manufactured the same product. (NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972).)

Although The General Counsel does not contend that Respondent had an obligation to bargain before setting initial terms and conditions of employment, it is clear, and I find, that Respondent's bargaining obligation attached no later than the start of operations on July 19, 1982. At that time it had employed a full complement of 51 hourly employees and all those employees were former Quaker Oats bargaining unit employees. (Ranch-Way, Inc., 203 NLRB 911 (1973); Turnbull Enterprises, 259 NLRB 934 (1982).) Therefore, whether the critical date on which the bargaining obligation attached is determined by the bargaining demand (Pre-Engineered Building Products, 228 NLRB 841 (1977)), or the date when a full complement was employed (Pacific Hide & Fur Depot, 223 NLRB 1029 (1976), enf. denied 553 F.2d 609 (9th Cir. 1977)), it is clear that Respondent was obligated to recognize and bargain with the Union on July 19, 1982.

Before July 19, 1982, the Union had demanded recognition. On July 7, 1982, the Union made its demand on Respondent's registered agent Karl Wiesenburg. Even before that date, the Union made its demand for recognition on May 6 and June 24, 29, and 30, 1982, through John Christensen and Andy Hammond. Despite the status of Christensen and Hammond on those dates, it is clear that they both became agents of Respondent on or before July 19, 1982 and, at that time, they were fully aware of the Union's desire to be recognized by Respondent and to meet with Respondent and negotiate.

From before July 19, 1982, Respondent was dilatory in treating the Union's demand for recognition. Neither Hammond nor Christensen advised the Union that Sun Coast had purchased the Quaker Oats plant even though they agreed to do so on June 30, 1982. After its demands on Christensen and Hammond and its July 7 and August 5, 1982 demands on Agent Karl Wiesenburg, the Union received no response from Respondent until September 13, 1982.

During that delay, Respondent was engaged in activity violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) as shown above.

The general rules in successor situations is that the majority status of the predecessor's union is presumed absent a showing that the successor employer had a good-faith doubt as to the majority status of the union which must be based on objective considerations (Celanese Corp. of America, 95 NLRB 664 (1954); Saks Fifth Avenue, 247 NLRB 1047 (1980)). Moreover, the employer must show that the objective considerations were known to it at the time of withdrawal and were raised in a context free of employer unfair labor practices (Computer Sciences Corp. 236 NLRB 266, 281 (1978); Dayton Motels, 212 NLRB 553 (1974); Orion Corp. v. NLRB, 515 F.2d 81 (7th Cir. 1975)).

The circumstances here demonstrate that the above conditions were not satisfied and Respondent did not demonstrate that it acted in good faith when it withdrew recognition.

As shown above at the time of Respondent's withdrawal, the alleged objective considerations were raised in the context of unfair labor practice violations. Moreover, it appears obvious that Respondent was already in violation of Section 8(a)(5) when it withdrew recognition on September 16, 1983.

On July 19, 1982, when Respondent started production, it was faced with prior demands to bargain from the Union. Those demands had been made to Respondent's general manager John Christensen, to its purchasing and planning manager Andy Hammond, and to its registered agent Karl Wiesenburg. Additional demands were made by the Union on August 5 and September 8, 1982. By not recognizing the Union on July 19, 1982, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[16] See Grico Corp., 265 NLRB 1344 (1982), where a hiatus was found not to affect the finding of a successorship relationship.

Respondent, of course, contends that it recognized and agreed to meet with the Union during a September 13, 1982 phone conversation between Andy Hammond and Hubert Mills. Those arrangements were confirmed in Hammond's September 14 letter to Mills.

According to Purchasing and Planning Manager Andy Hammond, Respondent's supervisor for casing in the warehousing department Frank Murry, was asked by employee Swetlena Goff to supply the wording for an employee petition.[17] Goff told Hammond that "she didn't want the Union to carry the plant and wanted to let Mr. Christian[sen] know how the employees felt." The employees' petition contains the following heading:

> We the following employees, do not wish for the International Chemical Workers Union to represent us. The following employees names are listed below.

Subsequently, according to Swetlena Goff, she showed the petition to Supervisor Zelma McKnight and asked McKnight to permit her to circulate the petition during her working time. McKnight told her he did not care. Goff circulated the petition during her working time.[18] The petition contains 35 signatures. Each signature is dated. The dates are September 14, 15, and 16, 1982.

According to Hammond, Swetlena Goff gave the completed petition to Supervisor Zelma McKnight. McKnight gave the petition to Manager of Engineering Richard Bishop who passed it on to John Christensen. Christensen gave the petition to Hammond. On September 16, Hammond wrote the withdrawal of recognition letter to the Union.

Under the above circumstances, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union from July 19, 1982. Respondent unreasonably delayed responding to the Union's numerous demands for recognition during a time when it, as successor to Quaker Oats, had an obligation to recognize the Union. During that unreasonable delay, Respondent engaged in activity violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3). Moreover, immediately after its delayed recognition, upon being presented with a petition prepared with the assistance of two of its supervisors, Respondent withdrew recognition and canceled its scheduled meeting with the Union.

Where, as here, the predecessor employer was party to a collective-bargaining contract with the Union, the successor must give the Union a reasonable period in which to negotiate in the absence of employer unfair labor practices. Here, the Union was deprived of any opportunity to negotiate.

II. RESPONDENT'S ADDITIONAL 8(A)(1) DEFENSE

Respondent correctly contends that several of the alleged 8(a)(1) violations occurred before its creation. The record demonstrates that Respondent was incorporated on June 29, 1982, and that it started operation on July 19, 1982.

The complaint did not allege, and the General Counsel did not show, that Respondent's predecessor committed 8(a)(1) violations, and that Respondent was aware of those violations at the time of its purchase. The General Counsel did show that supervisors of both the Respondent and its predecessor engaged in certain 8(a)(1) conduct before the predecessor sold the facility but at a time when the closing and sale of the facility was anticipated.

Obviously, such conduct demonstrates animus and motive on the part of those supervisors. However, as to the technical 8(a)(1) violations, I agree with Respondent. An employer cannot be found guilty of 8(a)(1) violations when those violations occurred before its creation.

The General Counsel does allege that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) during the John Christensen phone conversation with Mary Long. As shown above, Mary Long credibly testified that she called Christensen about a week after July 19, 1982, to inquire why she had not been called back to work. Christensen told her that he had directed his supervisors to carefully screen applicants and to select employees so as to avoid the same predicament they had before. In isolation, Christensen's above comments may appear innocuous. However, at that time, the employees had been advised by several supervisors, including Christensen, Bishop, Zelma McKnight, and Ronald Landrum, that the new employees would not have the Union, and that troublemakers would be eliminated. When Long called, Christensen was responding to her inquiry as to why she had not been called to work. Christensen's reference to thorough screening of applicants and avoidance of the former "predicament" was obviously designed to tell Long that Sun Coast was not going to get into the predicament of dealing with the Union and grievances. I find that Christensen's comments evidence violations of Section 8(a)(1).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Sun Coast Foods, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Chemical Workers Union, Local 540, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening employees that it would carefully screen applicants and avoid its former predicament, Respondent threatened that it would select job applicants so as to avoid having to deal with the Union and the filing of grievances, and thereby engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. All maintenance and production employees of the Company's canning plant at Pascagoula, Mississippi, excluding all office and clerical employees, laboratory em-

[17] Frank Murry did not testify. Swetlena Goff testified at the hearing that employee Mary Bell wrote the heading on the petition and that Frank Murry supplied her and Bell with the Union's name. However, in October 1982, Goff told Andy Hammond that she asked Supervisor Murry to supply the words for the petition.

ployees, watchmen, guards, and all supervisory employees as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

5. At all times material herein, and especially since July 19, 1982, International Chemical Workers Union, Local 540, has been, and is, the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-mentioned appropriate unit.

6. By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union since July 19, 1982, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

7. By refusing to employ Mary Long, Curtis Sanderson, David Sewell, and Eugene Sipp, since on or about July 19, 1982, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

8. Respondent has not otherwise engaged in violation of unfair labor practices as alleged in the complaint

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. As I have found that Respondent unlawfully refused to employ Mary Long, Curtis Sanderson, David Sewell, and Eugene Sipp, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer those employees immediate and full reinstatement to the jobs they formerly held with Quaker Oats or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges. I shall further recommend that Respondent be ordered to make whole Mary Long, Curtis Sanderson, David Sewell, and Eugene Sipp for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them. Backpay may be computed with interest as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[19]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 18 January 1983 Administrative Law Judge Harold B. Lawrence issued the attached decision. Respondents Dextra Industries, Inc.[1] and Dextra Industries of Deer Park, Inc.,[2] the Charging Party,[3] and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and Respondent G & G Fabrication Inc. filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[4] and conclusions as modified and set forth in full below.[5]

The judge concluded, and we agree, that Respondent Dextra violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by refusing to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and thereafter terminating its shop employees in order to avoid its bargaining obligation with the Union. However, the judge further found that Respondent Dextra violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by failing to bargain with the Union over its decision and the effects of its decision to subcontract the work performed by the shop employees. We reverse this latter finding of unlawful conduct because the General Counsel did not allege in the complaint that Respondent Dextra failed to bargain with the Union over its decision and the effects of its decision to subcontract the work. Accordingly, we find the judge's remedy to be inappropriate, and we shall, therefore, alter it to remedy only the violations properly alleged and found.

Since we agree with the judge's finding that Respondent Dextra Deer Park is an alter ego of Respondent Dextra, we agree with his conclusion that both of these entities are liable for remedying the violation found. In fashioning a remedy, however, we will not require Respondent to resume operations with its own employees because to do so would be unduly burdensome and is unnecessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. Rather than force the resumption of this operation, we find that the policies of the Act will be sufficiently fulfilled by our full make-whole order covering the terminated employees. Cf. Great Chinese American Sewing Co., 227 NLRB 1670 (1977).

AMENDED REMEDY

We shall require that Respondent Dextra and Dextra Deer Park bargain collectively with the Union with respect to the terms and conditions of employment in the event that Respondent resumes employing employees to perform unit work.

We shall also order Respondent Dextra and Dextra Deer Park to make whole all employees who were discriminatorily terminated on 30 June 1979, for any loss of pay suffered by reason of the discrimination, by paying to each of them a sum of money equal to the amount he or she would normally have earned as wages from the date of their discharge until such time as each secures, or did secure, substantially equivalent employment with other employers or until Respondent reinstates them. Backpay and interest are to be computed in accord with the Board's usual formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

In the event that Respondent Dextra and/or Dextra Deer Park decide to resume employing employees to perform unit work, we shall order that Respondent offer to as many of the discriminatorily discharged employees as business volume permits reinstatement to his or her former position or, if such position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his or her seniority or other rights and privileges.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Dextra Industries, Inc. and Dextra Industries of Deer Park, Inc., Deer Park, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall jointly and severally

1. Cease and desist from

[1] Hereafter referred to as Dextra.

[2] Hereafter referred to as Dextra Deer Park.

[3] Hereafter referred to as the Union.

[4] In sec. II,A,1 of his decision, the judge stated that Dextra is a wholly owned subsidiary of Dextra Deer Park, whereas Sidney Ochs, president of both entities, testified that his wife, Ruth Ochs, was the sole shareholder of Dextra. This inadvertent error is insufficient to affect the results of our decision.

[5] Member Dennis finds merit in the General Counsel's exception to the judge's failure to find that Respondent Dextra violated the Act when its president told employees that, if they "would go non-union," he would make them foremen; that he would like to "work something out with the men" after the collective-bargaining agreement expired; and that he had found a pension fund and hospitalization plan better than those of the Union. In context, the statements constituted inducements to the employees to reject the Union in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and direct dealing with the employees rather than the Union in violation of Sec. 8(a)(5).

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO over the terms and conditions of employment of employees in the following contractual bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees including plant clericals, employees of the company engaged in the fabrication and/or manufacture of all ferrous and non-ferrous metals, iron, steel and other metal products, including plastic products, all maintenance employees of the company engaged in maintaining machinery and equipment and in other maintenance work in or about the company's shop or shops, and excluding office clerical employees, superintendents or employees who are represented by any other union affiliated with the AFL–CIO with whom the company has signed a collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) Discharging employees for the purpose of avoiding the obligation to bargain collectively with the above-named or any other labor organization representing their employees.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of any rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) On request, if the Respondent resumes employing employees in the unit, bargain collectively with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the aforesaid bargaining unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

(b) Offer Hank Martin, Kevin Duffy, Michael Frenna, Thomas J. Greean, Sal Sfalanga, and Melvin Davis immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs to the extent that business volume permits in the event that the Respondent decides to employ employees for unit work or, if their jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges and make them whole for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "Amended Remedy."

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Mail to the last known addresses of the employees above named copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be mailed immediately to the employees and posted at a location in the Respondent's office at 135 East Industry Court, Deer Park, New York, where notices to employees are customarily posted, and shall be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places where notices to employees are customarily posted. The Respondent shall take reasonable steps to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the allegations not specifically found herein are dismissed.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
>
> To form, join, or assist any union
>
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the appropriate unit. The appropriate unit is:

All production and maintenance employees including plant clericals, employees of the company engaged in the fabrication and/or manufacture of all ferrous and non-ferrous metals, iron, steel and other metal products, including plastic products, all maintenance employees of the company engaged in maintaining machinery and equipment and in other maintenance work in or about the company's shop or shops, and excluding office clerical employees, superintendents or employees who are represented by any other union affiliated with the AFL–CIO with whom the company has signed a collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees for the purpose of avoiding our obligation to bargain with the above-named or any other labor organization representing our employees.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, if we resume employing employees in the appropriate unit, bargain in good faith with the Union with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL offer Hank Martin, Kevin Duffy, Michael Frenna, Thomas J. Greean, Sal Sfalanga, and Melvin Davis immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs to the extent that business volume permits in the event that we decide to employ employees to perform unit work and WE WILL make them whole, with interest, for any losses suffered by reason of our discriminatory discharge of them. Backpay will run from the date of discharge until such time as they secure substantially equivalent employment with other employers or until we reinstate them.

WE WILL mail a copy of this notice to the last known addresses of the above-named employees.

DEXTRA INDUSTRIES, INC.; DEXTRA INDUSTRIES OF DEER PARK, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD B. LAWRENCE, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated case was heard before me at Brooklyn, New York, on August 9 and September 7, 8, and 9, 1982. Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) filed the charge in Case 29–CA–7277 on June 22, 1979; in Case 29–CA–7395 on August 7, 1979; in Case 29–CA–7610 on November 19, 1979; and in Case 29–CA–7786 on February 14, 1980. The hearings were held on the basis of the allegations set forth in a second order consolidating cases, amended consolidated complaint and notice of hearing, dated February 29, 1980, and a notice of motion to amend complaint, which was granted, and on amendments to the complaint made at the hearing.

The substance of the allegations is that Dextra Industries, Inc. (Dextra), a metal fabricator, violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union respecting a collective-bargaining agreement to replace an existing agreement scheduled to expire June 30, 1979; bargaining directly with the employees; promising the employees unspecified improvements in working conditions in order to induce the men to abandon their support of the Union; and discharging six employees in order to undermine the Union. Dextra and a corporation known as Dextra Industries of Deer Park, Inc. (Dextra Deer Park) are alleged to have been joint employers during the period from September 1, 1980, to October 1, 1981, and to have been alter egos and a single employer from and after that date. Dextra, Dextra Deer Park, and a company known as G & G Fabrication, Inc. (G & G) are alleged to have been joint employers since October 1, 1981, "formulating and administering a common labor policy." Accordingly, it is contended that Dextra Deer Park and G & G were obligated to offer reinstatement to the employees who had been discharged by Dextra on June 30, 1979, and to negotiate with the Union on a new collective-bargaining agreement.

The answers interposed by Respondents[1] deny all allegations of wrongdoing and deny that any violation of the Act has been committed. G & G, besides denying that it had any alter ego or joint employer status with either Dextra or Dextra Deer Park, interposed an affirmative defense of nonjoinder of a necessary party, namely, Local 424 of the United Brotherhood of Industrial Workers, which is the certified representative of its own metal-working employees.

The parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Posthearing briefs have been filed on behalf of the General Counsel, and on behalf of Respondents Dextra, Dextra Deer Park, and G & G.

On the entire record and based on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and the manner in which they gave their testimony, and after consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

There is no issue as to jurisdiction, the jurisdictional allegations of the complaints, as amended, having been admitted in the answers and clarified at the hearing. Dextra was a Kentucky corporation engaged in the business of metal fabrication, which at the times pertinent to the complaint annually shipped from its place of business

[1] Dextra was formally dissolved effective October 31, 1981. It has appeared in this proceeding by counsel who interposed answers to the complaint and to all amended complaints, including the last one issued on March 19, 1982. However, at the hearing, it was represented by its president Sidney Ochs with the concurrence of the General Counsel.

Deer Park, Long Island, New York, directly to points ide the State of New York products valued in excess 50,000. Dextra Deer Park, incorporated in the Dis- of Columbia, was also alleged to have been continu- y engaged in the steel fabrication business and to e shipped products in excess of $50,000 on an annual s since October 1, 1982, from Deer Park to points ide of New York State. As appears below, despite Respondents' denial, I find that the allegation that tra Deer Park and Dextra were alter egos correctly s the fact of the matter and that Dextra Deer Park inued the business of Dextra after that corporation formally dissolved.

ccordingly, I find that Respondents are and have at all times material herein engaged in commerce in the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the also find that the Union is now and has been at all s material herein a labor organization within the ning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

. The Refusal to Negotiate a New Contract and the Discharge of the Shop Employees

1. The General Counsel's case

extra, a wholly owned subsidiary of Dextra Deer , was engaged in the metal fabrication business. It essed machinery not elsewhere available on Long d which had the capability of cutting, pressing, ing, and otherwise shaping sheets of iron and steel. equently, a great deal of this type of work was sub- racted to Dextra by other contractors. Dextra ed to Deer Park from Syosset, Long Island, when principal of Dextra, Sidney Ochs, constructed a ing there. He held title in the name of a corporation vn as Anchor Engineering Corporation; the name later changed to Dextra Industries of Deer Park, This corporation owned the building and the equip- located in it, and leased it all to Dextra.

ost of Dextra's employees had been with it in Syos- At that time, it was not a union shop, but Ochs did nave any aversion to a union. When the Company ed to Deer Park, it became a union shop without opposition from him. He first entered into a collec- bargaining agreement with the Union, effective July 73. The bargaining unit was as follows:

All production and maintenance employees includ- ing plant clericals, employees of the company en- gaged in the fabrication and/or manufacture of all ferrous and non-ferrous metals, iron, steel and other metal products, including plastic products, all main- tenance employees of the company engaged in maintaining machinery and equipment and in other maintenance work in or about the company's shop or shops, and excluding office clerical employees, superintendents or employees, who are represented by any other union affiliated with the AFL–CIO with whom the company has signed a collective- bargaining agreement.

The expiration date of the last collective-bargaining agreement was July 1, 1979, pursuant to an extension agreement dated January 12, 1978. Early in the year, the Union requested that Ochs negotiate a new contract. However, from March through June, Ochs steadfastly maintained that he was not in a position to negotiate because he was undecided as to whether or not he would remain in business. The Union pointedly reminded him, in writing, that he was legally required to discuss closure and its effects upon the employees with the Union. Ochs never did.

William Colavito, the union president, testified that he had meetings with Ochs on March 20, in late April or early May, at the end of May, on June 11 and 25, on July 2, and later in July, and that Ochs had not, during any of these meetings, expressed an intention to go out of business or to subcontract work. According to Colavito, Ochs maintained that he was going to sell or lease the building and go into the consulting business; he would stop fabricating. As early as the March 20 meeting, Ochs was complaining that he had lost $4000 the previous year and that he intended to let the collective-bargaining agreement expire.

Ochs undoubtedly made such statements to Colavito. Colavito is a credible witness and Ochs is a man who tends to think aloud. The exchange of letters between the Company and the Union reflects Ochs' determination to change matters without announcing any specific decision if, in fact, one had been reached. On March 20, the Union sent Dextra a letter asking what its intentions were. Having received no response it notified Dextra on April 12 of its intention to make changes in the contract due to expire on June 30. Dextra responded to that letter on April 18, notifying the Union that it was going to discontinue the operations of the shop. Notwithstanding this exchange of letters, Colavito testified that, when he conferred with Ochs in late April or early May, and asked for a response to the Union's March 20 letter, Ochs said he could not give the Union an answer at that point because he did not know what he was going to do. Ochs gave Colavito the same answer the next time they met, stating that he would need time and that he had been too busy to think things out. At the June 11 meeting, Ochs announced that he would not sign another contract with the Union; that he had not yet made up his mind what he would do; and that he would use the period from and after July 1 to make up his mind. In response to Colavito's suggestion that they sign a contract and work out some means of cutting costs and taking advantage of the Company's skilled work force, Ochs' response was that he preferred to have the plant remain idle and borrow money from the bank to keep it that way, and liquidate after 6 months.

On June 25, Colavito raised the question of the provision to be made for the employees. He testified that Ochs professed that he still had not made up his mind, but reported that he had had no bids from any purchaser or potential lessee; however, he had been too busy and would wait until after July 1. At that point, Colavito asked him about his intentions, insofar as the men were concerned, because the contract was about to expire.

Ochs stated he would give the men their sick leave and a layoff notice. At the meeting on July 2, when Colavito commented that sale or lease potential would be greater with the business running, Ochs' response was that he needed "flexibility."

Ochs' lawyer was present at their last meeting. He asserted that Dextra would not sign another agreement with the Union as long as a particular clause was in it. Colavito offered to discuss the matter, whereupon the lawyer stated that Dextra would not sign another agreement anyway.

On August 30, the Union sent Dextra another letter inquiring in detail about its intentions, which began: "You have indicated that you plan to terminate operations at your plant and go out of business."

It is apparent that, in these meetings, the Union maintained a position of readiness to bargain at all times. At their meeting, in late April or early May, Colavito and Ochs reviewed in a general fashion the question of the quantity of work, operating cost, and similar matters. At their next meeting, Colavito offered to look into the actualities of the nonunion competition if Ochs would give him specific details. However, he was unable to investigate because Ochs never provided the information despite his promise to do so. Ochs declined to sign any contract. Ochs did not dispute Colavito's expressed opinion that there was adequate work to keep the men employed; his contention was that the work was not profitable and that the Company was losing money on it.

At the meetings on June 11 and July 2, Colavito again urged Ochs to sign a contract, cut overhead costs, and keep the men working. All such suggestions were rebuffed.

According to Colavito, contributions to the union fund, not wages, were the big problem. Over the years, Ochs had been delinquent in making the requisite contributions and the Union had been lenient in its collection attempts. At the last meeting prior to the expiration of the contract, Colavito indicated to Ochs that the Union would be willing to work out different contractual rates of contribution for some of the production items and for new employees, but Ochs' position remained unchanged.

2. Dextra's defense

Dextra's defense is that it went out of business. Ochs testified that he did not recall the exact language of his conversations with Colavito during their many meetings, but he told Colavito many times that Dextra had lost money continuously since he put up the building at 135 East Industry Court in Deer Park and showed a profit from time to time only because Ochs drew a very small salary. Ochs was even losing money on his investment in the building because Dextra was unable to pay its rent to Dextra Deer Park. When he bid successfully on jobs, he lost money because his labor costs were two to three times those of the competition, which consisted of a number of cost-cutting enterprises scattered throughout the United States.

Ochs testified that his financial advisors, on the basis of their examination of his books and records, advised him in 1979 to go out of business immediately because he was losing money every day and had exhausted his ability to arrange financial assistance. Without financial assistance, he could not continue operations and pay the union benefits for which the business was obligated. His options were either to dispose of his inventory and pay off his debts, or to go into bankruptcy and lose his building and his home.

Ochs asserted that none of this seemed to make any impression on Colavito, whose only response, according to Ochs, was that Ochs should sign a contract with the Union and be successful.

All of the shop employees were discharged at the end of June 1979. The business was shut down for the first 2 weeks of July, but Dextra's customers were told only that the business was shutting down for 2 weeks. For several months thereafter, Ochs attempted to complete all of the work in the shop single-handedly. He kept only his office staff on payroll. This included the draftsman. After a while, he decided to rent the first floor of the premises, retaining the upper floor as an office and shop for Dextra Deer Park. G & G Fabricators, Inc. rented the lower floor under a 3-year lease. Ochs had subcontracted work to them since 1975, and he continued to do so after they entered into possession of the downstairs portion of the Deer Park building, the only difference being that now he subcontracted to them the type of work which they had formerly subcontracted to him, because the lease included rental of the equipment contained in the premises. G & G's employees were represented by another union. None of Dextra's employees applied for jobs with G & G and G & G did not offer them employment.

Formal dissolution of Dextra was effective as of October 31, 1981, on an application for dissolution filed on May 31, 1981. Its only undistributed assets are a bankruptcy claim against a former customer and a supply of steel.

There is no question but that operations were curtailed, but the testimony of Colavito and the men who worked in the shop during the spring of 1979, however, raises serious doubts that Dextra was actually discontinuing its operations. On the occasions when Colavito had meetings scheduled with Ochs, he made it a practice to confer with the men in the shop, and received reports of events and conduct which negated the idea of a termination of operations. While Ochs' responses and other statements to Colavito throughout the spring of 1979 indicated indecision with regard to the Company's intentions, Colavito was hearing from the men that Ochs had consulted a pension expert about the possibility of setting up a nonunion plan which would be better than the Union's; that Ochs had suggested the possibility of running a nonunion shop, with the men as foremen, over a new crew of nonunion employees hired off the street; that quantities of material and parts were being ordered which were inconsistent with a cessation of operations; that the Company had work, with orders coming in from several customers on a sustained, continuous basis; that the shop had embarked upon construction of an entirely new item, bagel ovens for Bagel Nosh, with a dozen ovens on order and new parts for them being delivered and stored on the premises.

Four of the six men who worked in the shop at that time testified. A stipulation was entered into between counsel respecting the testimony of a fifth employee who was not present at the hearing. Their testimony was that, during the period in question, Ochs attempted to persuade them to work with him on completion of an extension to the building, for which the foundation had been poured and unfabricated steel delivered. Ochs underwent the expense of sending the enormous brake machine off the premises for repair and repaired a damaged dye. They were building a bagel oven as a trial and there was talk of going into production with them. The amount of steel being brought into the shop was markedly increased, 30 tons of steel having been put on the shop floor in the very last week of June for use in filling an order from the Oliver Stove Company, a manufacturer of coal-burning stoves. Each stove required approximately 200 pounds of metal plate and Dextra conformed to its usual practice of ordering 30 tons of plate at a time. They also testified that at the time of the layoffs, the shop was extremely busy, with five bagel ovens waiting to be completed for the Bagel Nosh Company; work being done on all of the distribution buckets for the Hempstead Town recycling plant; work coming in from steady customers, such as Long Island Lighting Company; and work in the shop continuing on numerous short jobs and for customers who were not regulars, such as a company for whom they were working on an exhaust system.

An employee who stood on a picket line outside the premises throughout the second half of 1979 testified that work continued to be done at the premises during that period for former customers of Dextra and that Ochs was personally involved in it. He observed the customers' trucks and personnel coming and going, delivering, and picking up work. He observed that, on occasion, Dextra's draftsman assisted in loading their vehicles. He observed Ochs and the draftsman working on a piece of plate. He observed what he was sure, from his own past experience, was a conversation (which he could not, of course, hear) between Ochs and an unidentified person in which Ochs seemed to be instructing that person in use of the burning machine.

3. Analysis

The history of Dextra and Dextra Deer Park since 1979 fails to disclose actual liquidation and termination of the business operation which had been the core of Dextra's raison d'etre. It is understandable that someone discontinuing a business may sell off inventory and finish pending jobs at a carefully paced schedule so as to minimize the financial loss attendant upon termination of operations and personal liability on guarantees of business obligations. The methods pursued by Ochs present no such situation. He told the Union and the men in the shop that he would decide after June 30, 1979, whether he would stay in business or what he would do, asserting that the high cost of running a union shop was forcing him out of business. Yet he made no decision at the time he shut down Dextra and discharged the shop employees. He conceded in his testimony that to this very day he is undecided what he will do about the business, which has been conducted in the name of Dextra Deer Park since October 31, 1981. He rejected the Union's offer of a winddown agreement. He continued to accept new business, repair equipment, build inventory, instead of selling it off, and in other ways so conducted himself as to convince me that he attempted to circumvent the obligation to bargain with the Union on a new contract.

The testimony of the former employees finds confirmation in much of Ochs' own testimony, which clearly establishes that at the times pertinent to this case, no firm decision to go out of business had been made but rather that its continuation was contemplated. Significant factors were Ochs' concession that he intended to liquidate slowly; the fact that there was no corporate dissolution of Dextra until October 1981; the fact that the windup is still not complete; the fake announcement to the customers in July 1979 that the firm was closing for a 2 weeks' vacation; and the manifest desire not to sever business ties. Throughout the summer of 1979, from July 1 to September 30, Ochs single-handedly continued the operation; he testified that he worked 7 days a week until 2 a.m. each day to complete the work in the shop, performing all functions himself (shearing, bending, punching, forming, assembling, welding, and painting). However, this was manifestly not a matter of finishing off the pending jobs to avoid or minimize loss for he put a great deal of his time into the prototype oven for Bagel Nosh, obviously in anticipation of completing the orders he already had and getting further orders. Though the shop employees were discharged, Dextra continued to maintain a payroll of nonunit employees throughout the balance of 1979 and 1980. Four persons were on this payroll: Mrs. Ochs, a secretary, a cleanup or floor boy, and the draftsman, Galleta. Ochs kept Galleta on the payroll ostensibly for the purpose of running the office while Ochs got out the work. According to Ochs, Galleta "took the calls and handled the customers." However, there is evidence that Galleta wrote up the work orders of the work subcontracted to G & G, bringing it downstairs and dropping it on a desk in the G & G office and also helped load customers' trucks. Ochs gave an extremely interesting reason for subcontracting some of Dextra's work to G & G after that company moved into the Deer Park building: it was "because I was unable to move it from the building during the period when I was being picketed." Not only did Ochs refuse a winddown agreement with the Union, but he never responded to union inquiries about the termination except to tell Colavito at literally the last possible moment that he was discharging the men and paying them their sick leave.

While I find that Ochs did not promise a pension plan to the employees to induce them to abandon the Union or otherwise to affect their rights under Section 7 of the Act, I am nevertheless convinced by the evidence that he did investigate the feasibility of substituting another pension plan for that of the Union or, at the very least, that he looked into the relative merits of the available private plans and compared them with the union plan. This suggests an intention on his part to continue in business. Despite ample opportunity to do so, he offered no explanation in the course of his testimony. His remarks to the men about potential nonunion operation, in the alternate forms of operation of a nonunion shop or by their going to work for a nonunion subcontractor, may be viewed in the same light, showing a state of mind which contemplated the continuation of business in one form or another for the indefinite future.[2]

Not to be overlooked are: the continued high volume of business activity in the spring of 1979, for a firm supposedly terminating operations, with work continuing to come in and inventory being maintained at consistent levels during April, May, and June 1979; Ochs' testimony that Dextra continued to purchase supplies, such as steel, after September 1979; and his assertions at the time of the hearing that he had yet to make a decision. In fact, his testimony about his current intentions with respect to Dextra Deer Park is strangely similar to what he had said in 1979.

At that time, he said he would close for a couple of weeks' vacation and make a decision. At the hearing, he said that he was going to do precisely the same thing to settle the fate of Dextra Deer Park. Ochs testified that Dextra Deer Park was not taking any orders "in order to find out what we're going to do, I again took a two weeks vacation period, so we're not taking any orders." He is telling people he is not filling orders at this time, but he nevertheless took orders, which he says are "in limbo." He admits to two or three outstanding orders. He offered no explanation of how he was keeping the customers whose orders are in limbo quiescent. (He says they have been notified, which makes it more remarkable.) He makes the statement, "At this time I'm not sure what my program is going to be." Ochs says he has orders pending with other subcontractors, which he refers to as necessary "to finish these few pieces, give them out." However, this is what he was supposed to be doing 3 years ago. Patently, his intention 3 years ago was not to achieve a speedy liquidation: he said as much, but with the implication that he was going to liquidate slowly. How slowly is something the Union and the employees could not have imagined at the time. At the risk of repeating the obvious, I must note that this liquidation was patently not the usual type, in the sense that a decision to terminate operations has been followed by steps taken to liquidate assets and liabilities as expeditiously as possible. In the case of Dextra, the process evolved in precisely the opposite manner.

The disparity between Ochs' words and deeds is wide with respect to every indicator of his true intentions. For example, with regard to inventory, Ochs testified that one reason the business had been so successful was that the maintenance of a very large inventory enabled him to provide the quick delivery the customers wanted, and the first step in liquidating the business was therefore to liquidate the inventory. He testified that "my only hope then was to cease operation as a fabricator and to subcontract my work so that I could clear up the large inventory. I think our statement at that time showed an inventory of $160,000. I wanted to take that inventory, finish work at hand, get additional work, produce that work, purchase nothing, if possible, after that, and then liquidate my debt. At that time, when my debt was officially liquidated, I wanted to cease operations." This makes it sound like the problem was the amount of money tied up in the steel inventory. Yet inventory was not only not liquidated, additional purchases were made. A stockpile of unfabricated steel remains in the building at Deer Park to this day.

The manner in which bank loans were handled is another indication of Ochs' true intentions. A businessman terminating a business cannot be criticized for desiring to extricate himself from sources of personal liability, but how indebtedness is handled is one way of determining if he is liquidating or attempting to continue operation of the enterprise, even if only until obligations are paid off. Three years after discharging the shop crew, Ochs testified that obligations of Dextra have been reduced "to a manageable amount." He owes a trade creditor about $18,000 and owes the Bank of Babylon between $30,000 and $35,000. The intent to pay these off is implicit. If the amounts are manageable and Ochs intends to do the necessary managing, it is hard to understand his asserted intention to go out of business in the near future.

Mention has already been made of the fact that the volume of business retained in house after June 30, 1979, is inordinately high for a business supposedly going into liquidation. Ochs testified that his financial advisers told him in 1979 that on the basis of their examination of his books and records they believed he should go out of business immediately because he was losing money every day and no longer had the capacity to arrange for financial assistance. The financial statements confirm the impression of the shop employees that Ochs' program was the reverse of the advice he claimed he was receiving. The 1978 volume was $800,000. The 1979 volume, even though Dextra was supposedly out of business for the last 3 months, amounted to $700,000. Ochs' explanation for this was that they had had a very busy spring and, when G & G moved into the building, Dextra was able to subcontract the work in the house and made shipments of approximately $130,000 in September and $110,000 in October, which substantially completed the work on the floor. The 1980 volume was $400,000 and the 1981 volume was $150,000.

Year	Closing Inventory	Labor	Drafting	Subcontractor
1978	$165,500	$149,563	$12,179	$ 15,261
1979	162,278	68,333	16,760	77,274
1980	51,278	3,225	18,190	110,120

Since, according to Ochs, Dextra had substantially completed the work on the floor by the end of October 1979, the foregoing figures strongly suggest that Ochs was taking in new business.[3] As a result, skepticism

[2] I do not credit Ochs' denial that he made any statement in this vein to any employee of Dextra.

[3] This observation is corroborated by the consolidated financial statements of Dextra Deer Park, which show that in the pertinent period inventory remained substantial and drafting expense and subcontracting markedly increased. The cost-of-sales figures for the fiscal years ending October 31, 1978, 1979, and 1980 show continued substantial operation about his testimony regarding his intentions must be added to my skepticism respecting his contentions that his small salary and his health were major considerations in determining his course of action. His low salary, by itself, proves nothing—the acceptance of only a small annual salary taxable at normal income tax rates is a not unusual feature of current business investment practice, which often prefers deferred earnings or realization of the potential value of an investment on ultimate liquidation. As to the health argument, it suffices to note that, though Ochs mentioned to Colavito in May 1979 that he was ill and had high blood pressure, it was not a major point of discussion between them. Furthermore, there is no evidence in the record regarding his actual health and Ochs testified that, after discharging all the men in the shop, he personally continued working on the pending jobs, 7 days a week, until 2 a.m. every day.

The evidence which is credible thus establishes that Ochs was simply evading his obligation to negotiate with the Union on a new contract to replace the one that was about to expire. He had determined, not that he would go out of the metal fabricating business, but that he would operate without the Union. His actions show that plainly enough, but the statements which he made to the shop employees, quoted below in the next section, make it impossible to come to any other conclusion regarding his motivation.

B. Direct Bargaining with the Employees and Promises of Improvements in Working Conditions

Two refrains run through Ochs' conversations with his employees during the spring and summer of 1979. One is the argument that the Union undermined his ability to compete. The other is his skepticism with regard to the reliability of the union pension fund. Ochs felt strongly that the expenses involved in doing business as a union shop made his operation a losing proposition. At one time or another he expressed to each of the men his very strong desire to rid himself of the Union. For example, in an outburst to Michael Frenna, the shop steward, when the Union put a lien on his bank account in March 1979, Ochs said that he believed Colavito was trying to close him up as he had closed up other shops. During this conversation, Ochs repeated statements he had made on prior occasions to the effect that the Company was losing money. He showed Frenna figures in a book reflecting his contributions to the union funds. Frenna also quotes him as having made the following statement: "You know, if you six guys would go nonunion, we could put the new building up in the back. . . . You six guys would be kings—six foremen. We'll hire a bunch of guys off the street for minimum wage." The following week, Frenna was asked by Ochs for everybody's name, age, and date of birth, and subsequently Frenna saw Ochs in his office in the presence of someone who, from Frenna's description of the scene, appears to have been an insurance agent.

Thomas Greean, a union member for 28 years, testified that Ochs predicted that Greean would be unable to collect his pension because there would be no money in the union pension fund when he retired. Ochs told Greean that he was looking for a pension fund for the men and had found one better than the Union's. He also claimed to have found a better hospitalization plan than the one offered by the Union.

Kevin Duffy, another union member, quoted Ochs as saying that the Union was not doing its job because it was not organizing his nonunion competition; he wanted them to operate under the same disadvantages he did. Ochs said he wanted to work out something with the men but could not talk until after July 1, which, of course, was the day after the collective-bargaining agreement expired.

Ochs complained to Greean that the Union was bankrupting him: He was putting a lot of money into the union funds, he was losing jobs because he could not compete with nonunion shops, and he could not make money on the jobs he had because the Union was making his operating costs too expensive. On June 30, after the layoffs, Ochs telephoned Greean at home, apparently calling from the office. Ochs told Greean that he intended to lease his building to two companies, one of which had its own unionized work force. The other company, which was nonunion and lacked the skills of the Dextra work force, would be able to hire the Dextra shop people. It would have to be a nonunion shop. The order for 10 bagel ovens would ensure plenty of work and the prototype was still in the shop. Ochs said he had another order for five more ovens.

At the hearing, Ochs explained that the statements which he made to the men in the shop were not a matter of circumventing the Union, but rather of discussing a problem common to him and the others who had created the business. Such remarks were characteristic of the close relationship he enjoyed with these men. Telephone calls to them at home were not at all unusual. It went back to the beginning of the Company's history. Anchor Engineering Corporation had been engaged in a marina design. It was not a fabricating shop for heavy metal. The expertise in that area was brought in by Greean. When Greean and some of the others came in around 1968 or 1969, they gave the Company the capability for the bending and forming of heavy metal plate. A separate division of the Company was set up and the corporate name was changed to Dextra Industries, Inc. In the light of that background, he felt free to telephone men like Greean to let them know that he was no longer able financially or physically to continue with the operation of Dextra. As Ochs put it, "I told him I was seeking alternative methods of continuing this operation because I could no longer raise any more money. I have no houses to mortgage and no more bank loans to get."

To Henry Martin, Ochs put it as follows:

> Again,I discussed the Union in the sense that I could not, because of the Union benefits involved, continue the operations since I had no other source for money. In other words, my choice was to find a solution to dispose of my inventory, pay off my debts or go into bankruptcy, lose my building and lose my house.

The contradiction between these statements is apparent and I have noted that all of Ochs' statements, considered together, amply support the conclusion that it was his intention to continue the business as a nonunion enterprise and thus evade the necessity of entering into a new collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. However, it is equally apparent that nothing contained in these statements supports the allegations that Ochs attempted to negotiate directly with the men or promised them benefits if they would abandon the Union.

Greean testified that Ochs never promised him anything in order to induce him to leave the Union, never interfered with his union activities, and never even suggested to him that he leave the Union. As a matter of fact, Ochs' experience with Greean had to have educated him to the fact that the men would not forfeit their union benefits and would only work in union shops. When Greean started with Dextra, he was already a member of the Union. Dextra was a nonunion shop. After Greean worked for Ochs for about a year, he decided to quit and switch to a union shop in order to keep his union benefits (hospitalization, pension). Ochs at that time promised him that when the Company moved from Syosset to the building he was putting up in Deer Park, the men could bring the Union in without opposition from him. That is what happened and Ochs could not have forgotten it.

The testimony of the employees establishes that

(a) Ochs made remarks to the employees about hiring nonunion labor and continuing operation with the six shopmen then employed acting as the foremen.

(b) He stated to some of the employees that he could obtain better health and pension insurance than that provided by the Union.

(c) He made inquiry respecting their birth dates and apparently consulted with an insurance or pension expert in his office.

These remarks by themselves do not establish a violation of the Act. There is no evidence that Ochs made them as part of an effort to induce the employees to sever their connection with the Union or otherwise abandon the Union. None of the employees testified that he asked them to leave the Union; there is explicit testimony that he never made such a suggestion to anybody at any time. Furthermore, Frenna testified that Ochs told him he needed the data regarding the men's birth dates to respond to an Internal Revenue Service inquiry. Frenna saw the list in the attache case of the visitor to Ochs' office, but Ochs did not introduce him to the visitor and said nothing about the nature of the business he was transacting with the visitor. There is no evidence in the record respecting the visitor's identity. Whatever Ochs was doing, he was keeping it a secret, which is patently not the way to persuade employees to follow any particular course.

Ochs' assertion that he could find a better pension system than the Union's sounds more argumentative than assertive of a known fact, and is linked to his general skepticism regarding the solvency of the union fund. It is certainly not linked to any promise made by him to any of the men.

I cannot believe that Ochs' suggestion about hiring a nonunion crew and making the shop employees supervisors was made or perceived as a serious proposal for several reasons. It seems to have been made in connection with the problem of constructing the annex to the building, rather than in the course of any discussion of the work of the bargaining unit. Such a proposal, of course, entails a substantial increase in payroll, both because of the larger work force and because, presumably, the men would earn more as foremen. The bottom line, however, is that Ochs knew his men: They were union men with a stake in the union benefit funds.

There is an additional consideration which brings me to the conclusion that Ochs did not commit these violations of the Act, and that is the basic inconsistency between the accusation and my findings with respect to the discharge of the employees. He is here charged with attempting unlawfully to interfere with the employees' rights under Section 7 of the Act by attempting to influence their conduct toward the Union. There was absolutely no need for him to do so. I have found that he pursued an altogether different plan, intentionally circumventing the Union by discharging the employees and, subsequently, subcontracting the work.

C. Failure to Rehire the Employees: Dextra Deer Park

It has already been noted that Dextra was a wholly owned subsidiary of Dextra Deer Park. The General Counsel contended that Dextra Deer Park and G & G were alter egos, and joint employers of the Dextra employees who had been discharged, and thus had an obligation to offer them reinstatement. The General Counsel's case rests on the basically undisputed proposition that Dextra Deer Park, in the period from June 30, 1979, to October 1, 1981, became something more than a real estate corporation, evolving into a "viable working corporation" (the General Counsel's description) or a "viable corporation" (Ochs' description) which took on the same kind of business as that which Dextra had handled, from the same customers, and subcontracted much of it out to G & G, which was operating in the premises and using the equipment owned by Dextra Deer Park which that corporation had formerly leased to Dextra.[4]

Ochs' testimony substantiated the General Counsel's position in many important respects. He testified that Dextra and Dextra Deer Park were owned and controlled by his wife and himself. Dextra Deer Park held the title to the property in Deer Park. Employees of Dextra and Dextra Deer Park were covered under one workmen's compensation insurance policy. Consolidated financial statements were prepared for the two corporations from 1971 through 1980. After the formal dissolution of Dextra, Ochs continued work on pending orders and took in new orders in the name of Dextra Deer Park, and occasionally mistakenly invoiced work in the name of Dextra. (He used the old Dextra printed invoice forms, typing in the words, "of Deer Park, Inc.") The number of Dextra customers whom he continued servicing through Dextra Deer Park was sufficiently large for him to have trouble remembering all their names without recourse to the corporate records. Ochs initially insisted that most of the customers who were serviced through Dextra Deer Park were new customers, apparently not cognizant of the fact that in his anxiety to avoid alter ego liability he was destroying the credibility of his contention that he was winding up the business. In any event, he conceded that there were some substantial accounts among the former Dextra customers which were taken over by Dextra Deer Park, such as the Long Island Lighting Company. Reviewing the accounts receivable ledger of Dextra Deer Park, Ochs testified that of those listed, 2 had never been customers of Dextra, 24 had been Dextra customers for whom Dextra Deer Park had done no work as of the time of the hearing, and 41 had been customers of both corporations. All jobs which were pending at the time of Dextra's dissolution were completed by Dextra Deer Park and Ochs allocated the proceeds between the two corporations.

[4] The General Counsel originally contended that Dextra had transferred its assets and business to Dextra Deer Park, but the evidence showed that Dextra Deer Park had, in fact, owned the building and equipment and had leased it to Dextra.

Ruth Ochs, his wife, had acted as bookkeeper for both corporations. Examination of the Dextra Deer Park accounts receivable ledger revealed that pages from the Dextra ledger had been transferred to it. Ochs explained that this questionable procedure had been followed to preserve the credit information recorded on them.

The stationery of Dextra was used until the corporation was formally dissolved, and Dextra Deer Park work was on several occasions billed on those forms.

Ochs explained the consolidated balance sheets as a device to enhance the credit of Dextra, thus enabling it to obtain bank loans for its operations. While this unquestionably was their purpose, the evidence that his stratagem was used does not undermine, but rather reinforces, the inference that the operations were also consolidated.

The overwhelming evidence which is present in this case of interrelated operations, common management, common ownership and financial control, and centralized control of labor relations leads inexorably to the necessity to treat the two corporations as one employer.[5]

Accordingly, I find that Dextra Deer Park was an alter ego of Dextra and was obligated to rehire the employees whom Dextra had unlawfully discharged.

D. Failure to Rehire the Employees: G & G Fabrication, Inc.

The case against G & G as an alter ego or joint employer with Dextra and Dextra Deer Park is based on the showing which the General Counsel made that work was subcontracted to G & G, that G & G moved into the premises formerly occupied by Dextra and utilized the equipment located in the building, that it performed work for customers who had been serviced by Dextra and Dextra Deer Park and that it drew upon Dextra's inventory of unfabricated steel sheets in the course of performing some work subcontracted to it by Dextra or Dextra Deer Park.[6]

It appeared form the testimony of Elmer Gangloff that G & G started in the metal fabrication business in 1975, as a partnership of Elmer Gangloff and Harvey Gallagher. They are still the sole principals of the business. Gangloff testified in great detail respecting the manner in which, and the reasons why, G & G came to occupy the Deer Park building. As its business expanded, G & G's space requirements increased until by 1979 it needed 15,000 square feet for its operations. In that year, it acquired a customer which operated a fleet of extremely large vehicles, such as moving vans and 40-foot oil tank trucks, for which G & G was to do all painting and major repairs. G & G also anticipated building massive tank trucks and hydraulically operated car carriers. A large brake and a large shear are essential for such production. G & G thus needed premises with sufficient space to accommodate large vehicles and space suitable for its type of production, as well as a landlord tolerant of messy work in the building and of potential fire hazard.

Dextra Deer Park's property is a large building on one and 1-1/2 acres of land, with a very large shear and the largest brake on Long Island situated in it.[7] G & G and Dextra Deer Park were brought together for this transaction by one of several brokers whom G & G had consulted and the lease was negotiated for it by its own attorney.

Gangloff testified that 80 percent of the business of G & G is done on a subcontract basis, which is common in the metal fabrication industry. G & G had been doing work on a subcontract basis for Dextra and had subcontracted work to Dextra, since 1975. It was inevitable that it would continue to do work for Dextra after it occupied the building, since it had possession of the brake and shear. For the same reason, it acquired many of Dextra's former customers.

Ochs testified that during the period from 1970 to 1979, Dextra subcontracted work to between five and seven subcontractors and never gave all of its subcontracted work to G & G. However, there was a substantial ongoing relationship with G & G and a large volume of business was given to them. After September 1979, Dextra subcontracted at 75 to 80 percent of all the orders that came into it to G & G. He testified, nevertheless, that G & G was a completely independent operation. He asserted that he never consulted Gallagher or Gangloff or sought their opinion regarding financial matters, customers, or business; never sold them any interest in either Dextra or Dextra Deer Park or assigned any portion of the business of either corporation to them; that from 1975 through the end of August 1979, his only relationship with G & G was as a referrer of work to it; and that from September 1979 to August 1982, besides referring work to it, the only relationship with G & G

[5] NLRB v. Transcontinental Theaters, 568 F.2d 125 (9th Cir. 1978), denying enf. of 216 NLRB 1110 (1975).

[6] The General Counsel also contended that an unfavorable inference should be drawn from the fact that Dextra Deer Park and G & G offset each other's liabilities for work done and for rent and settled the balances. I cannot draw such an inference, however, as the practice appears to be nothing more than an expedient adopted by two companies doing a lot of business with each other which were hardpressed for cash (a circumstance which both Gangloff and Ochs readily admitted).

[7] This piece of equipment was described as a 400-ton press brake weighing 60,000 pounds.

was that of Dextra Deer Park's status as landlord. Initially, Ochs subcontracted work through Dextra while Dextra Deer Park was simply G & G's landlord; later, work was subcontracted through Dextra Deer Park as well. G & G was never consulted regarding the dissolution of Dextra and, in fact, Gangloff testified that he was unaware of it until the hearing in the present case. Conversely, Ochs never participated in business decisions of G & G.

The portions of the premises respectively occupied by G & G and the corporations controlled by Ochs were strictly separate. G & G had its own office space in the shop area which it leased on the first floor. The respective portions of the premises had separate entrances and egresses with separate locks, and no one from G & G had keys to the Dextra premises except the keys retained by Dextra Deer Park in its capacity as landlord.

The entire inventory of steel of Dextra Industries, Inc. was kept inside the premises in the southeast corner area of the building on the first floor. This was a portion of the premises leased to G & G and that violation of the lease was the subject of a lawsuit which was pending between G & G and Dextra Deer Park at the time of the hearing. It was not necessary for Dextra people to enter the premises to get at the inventory since it was being consumed in work done by G & G for Dextra. G & G Fabrication thus had possession of Dextra's inventory. According to Ochs, he "relied on their honesty and good will to report to me any and all materials used, and they used to give me a record of the plates that they used." I attach no great significance to the manner in which the inventory was handled, insofar as the corporate interrelationships are concerned, nor do I believe that the fact that G & G occupied the Dextra premises and did work for Dextra and Dextra Deer Park shows anything more than an arm's length relationship between G & G and the corporations controlled by Ochs. All of the facts which ignited and fueled the General Counsel's suspicions appear to have been satisfactorily explained. I discern no basis upon which any legal, financial, or other interrelationship can be found to have existed. There is no evidence that there was any consultation between Ochs and Gangloff and Gallagher respecting joint labor policy. The fact that G & G operates a union shop makes it difficult to believe that they would have refused to take on any of the former Dextra employees because they were union men. Operating with a full complement of employees of its own, and not rehiring the former Dextra personnel, it would have no occasion to negotiate with the Union representing the Dextra employees.

To read anything into the relationship between G & G and Dextra and Dextra Deer Park, beyond what the evidence so clearly indicated, is to indulge in speculation. Accordingly, I find that G & G and Dextra and Dextra Deer Park were not alter egos or joint employers of the men discharged by Dextra and that G & G was not obligated to offer them reinstatement or to negotiate with their Union.

As my factual determination requires dismissal of the complaint against G & G, its unmeritorious affirmative defense requires little discussion. The Union representing its employees was not a necessary party to these proceedings, which could be adjudicated in its absence. Nothing decided herein would have affected its rights unless I found that G & G was a joint employer, but even then, conflicting claims for representation could have been resolved under the auspices of the Board.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The violations of the Act herein found to have been committed by the Respondent have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent Dextra Industries, Inc. violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing and refusing to negotiate with the Union regarding the terms and conditions of a collective-bargaining agreement to replace the one that expired on June 30, 1979.
4. Respondent Dextra Industries, Inc. violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by (a) discharging the following named employees: Hank Martin, Kevin Duffy, Michael Frenna, Thomas J. Greean, Sal Sfalanga, and Melvin Davis in order to avoid negotiating a new collective-bargaining agreement with the Union; (b) failing and refusing to reinstate or offer to reinstate the above-named employees to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment, for the same reason; and (c) unilaterally subcontracting the work formerly performed by the employees and terminating their employment without bargaining with the Union about the decision to subcontract the work or about the impact of such subcontracting upon the employees.
5. Respondent Dextra Industries of Deer Park , Inc. violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by failing and refusing, after October 31, 1981, to reinstate or offer to reinstate the employees, Hank Martin, Kevin Duffy, Michael Frenna, Thomas J. Greean, Sal Sfalanga, and Melvin Davis, to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment.
6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
7. Respondent Dextra Industries, Inc. and Dextra Industries of Deer Park, Inc. did not engage in any unfair labor practices other than those found herein.
8. Respondent G & G Fabrication, Inc. has not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged against it in the complaint herein.

THE REMEDY

I have found that Respondent Dextra never really suspended its operations, but continued them until its formal dissolution in October 1981, after which Respondent Dextra Deer Park, its alter ego, continued the operations, and that it continues to do so to the present day, though on a curtailed basis. Ochs testified that he is still undecided as to the future of the business, which is what he has been saying for 3 years. I shall therefore recommend that Dextra Deer Park reinstate the discharged employees to the extent that that is feasible, if necessary establishing a preferential hiring list, and that it be directed to negotiate with the Union in an effort to reach a collective-bargaining agreement and with respect to the impact upon the employees of the subcontracting of the work of the unit, attempting to reach such agreement as reflects the realities of the current situation, and that Dextra and Dextra Deer Park pay backpay.

Dextra was, and Dextra Deer Park remains, liable for reinstatement of the discharged employees and both are responsible to them for such losses of earnings as they may have incurred.[8] The corporations must be held liable for the monetary damages from the time they were incurred. The status of Dextra Deer Park as an alter ego of Dextra antedates the formal dissolution of the latter corporation and there is absolutely no question that both were controlled by Sidney Ochs. If liability of Dextra Deer Park were limited only to the period commencing from the time it openly avowed its role, a license would be given to employers to circumvent the Act by the simple device of substituting different alter egos from time to time.

Though Dextra is in dissolution, it has assets consisting of a bankruptcy claim against a former customer and a supply of unfabricated steel plate. The value of neither is established, but their existence is sufficient reason to make the order herein binding on Dextra as well as Dextra Deer Park. Therefore, I will recommend that Respondents Dextra and Dextra Deer Park, jointly and severally, be required to pay backpay from June 30, 1979, the date of the layoffs, until such time as any of the following four conditions may be satisfied: (a) Respondents, or whichever entity Sidney Ochs has last utilized for his business operations, and the Union reach an agreement with respect to the termination of operations;[9] (b) they bargain to a bona fide impasse; (c) the Union fails to commence negotiations within 5 days after receipt of Respondents' notice of their desire to bargain; or (d) the subsequent failure of the Union to bargain in good faith.

The backpay which I shall recommend to be paid to each employee shall be equal to the amount he normally would have earned as wages and other benefits from the date of discharge, June 30, 1979, to the date on which any of the foregoing contingencies occur, less net earnings during that period. The amount of backpay and interest thereon shall be computed in accordance with the decisions of the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Of course, if the business of Dextra Deer Park permits the reinstatement of any or all of the employees, then the parties shall be directed to bargain collectively with respect to the terms and conditions of employment so as to arrive at an agreement to replace the collective-bargaining agreement which has expired.

The picture respecting the present condition of the business is murky. Ochs testified that operations have been sharply curtailed and that he has several orders on hand which, with the knowledge of his customers, are being kept "in limbo." He thus simultaneously concedes that he has not yet terminated operations completely and suggests that reinstatement is not feasible, for there is nothing left to bring the employees back to. The information available to the former employees and to the Union is, of course, limited to conditions as they existed several years ago.

In the face of such a paucity of reliable information, there can be no complaint if remedies are adopted which are sufficiently pliable to cover the situations embraced both in my findings of fact and in Ochs' own contentions, developed pragmatically on the basis of his own description of his present circumstances.

Respondents contend that they have suspended metal fabrication operations completely, but the gravamen of the complaint is that Dextra and Dextra Deer Park were alter egos which never went out of business completely, and I have found that to be the case. Nevertheless, the most appropriate remedies would appear to be those which have frequently been employed in situations in which employers have terminated business operations without negotiating with the unions concerning the impact upon their employees. I shall therefore recommend that Respondents, in addition to making the employees whole by payment of backpay, prepare a preferential hiring list from which the employees can be recalled and reinstated as business conditions permit, and that Respondents bargain collectively with the Union with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment in an effort to arrive at an agreement to replace the collective-bargaining agreement which has expired, or, in the alternative, with respect to the effects on the employees of the subcontracting of the work of the bargaining unit. I shall further recommend that Respondent Dextra Deer Park be directed to offer the employees, from such preferential hiring list, reinstatement to their former or equivalent positions.

The business of Respondents having been essentially a sole proprietorship, a direction that operations be resumed in the manner in which they had formerly been conducted would appear to be impractical, if Ochs is regarded as insincere, and unduly burdensome, if he is

[8] In many cases where backpay has been directed pending bargaining with respect to the effect of closing, the employer had given the employees no advance notice of the shutdown. See Van's Packing Plant, 211 NLRB 692 (1974). That basically is what happened in the present case, for Ochs was ambiguous with regard to his intentions until he actually laid the men off. For example, on April 18, 1979, he responded to the Union's request for a meeting to negotiate a new contract, dated April 12, by means of a letter which began with the following statement:

> Please be advised that it is our plan to discontinue operating a fabricating shop upon termination of this contract due to physical and financial reasons.

After asking the Union to advise the employees and stating that he would be happy to meet with the Union, Ochs concluded:

> As of this writing we have made no final decision as to the future of the company and the facilities it now uses for the conduct of its business. As soon as any pertinent information is available we will be happy to advise you.

[9] Backpay liability is not terminated merely by commencing bargaining. National Family Opinion, 246 NLRB 521 (1979).

credited with good faith and believed with respect to his assertion regarding his intentions.

Having found that Respondents have committed unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be directed to cease and desist from further infringements of employees' rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act. As the situation with respect to the business of Respondents is highly uncertain, I shall recommend that Respondents be required both to post the attached notice at the plant and office at 135 East Industry Court, Deer Park, New York, and to mail copies of it to the discharged employees.

United Parcel Service, Inc. and Lodge 804, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 9–CA–14987

30 January 1985

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 23 September 1981 Administrative Law Judge Karl H. Buschmann issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party each filed exceptions with a supporting brief. The Respondent filed a cross-exception and a brief in support of that cross-exception and in response to the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] In adopting the judge's recommendation to dismiss the complaint we rely specifically on the evidence that stewards Tharp, Bryant, and DeZarn provided leadership to rank-and-file employees during an unprotected work stoppage. The Respondent may discipline stewards who instigate or provide leadership for a work stoppage in violation of a no-strike clause in the parties' applicable collective-bargaining agreement. See Midwest Precision Castings Co., 244 NLRB 597 (1979); Chrysler Corp., 232 NLRB 466 (1977).

DECISION

KARL H. BUSCHMANN, Administrative Law Judge. This case arose upon the filing of a charge by Lodge 804, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO and a resulting complaint issued by the General Counsel charging United Parcel Service, Inc. with violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). More specifically, the complaint, as amended, charges that United Parcel Service, Inc., the Respondent, suspended its employee Cam Cantrell for 20 days without pay and discharged three employees, Gary Tharp, William Bryant, and Daniel DeZarn, because of their union activities, i.e., their participation as union stewards in an unauthorized strike.

Respondent's answer admits the jurisdictional elements of the complaint, as well as the suspension and discharges of the four individuals. However, it denies the commission of any unfair labor practices, and further states that the union stewards were discharged "for instigating, leading, prolonging and engaging in a strike in breach of contract which is unprotected activity under the Act."

A hearing was held on January 13 and 14, 1981, in Cincinnati, Ohio. The General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs on March 3 and 2, 1981, respectively. On consideration of the entire record[1] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

The Respondent, United Parcel Service, Inc., is an Ohio corporation engaged in the transportation and delivery of goods by truck from various terminals located throughout the United States, including its Cincinnati, Ohio terminals. It is admittedly an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Union, Lodge 804, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO is admittedly a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The Union has represented certain employees at Respondent's terminals pursuant to a collective-bargaining agreement effective November 7, 1979. It provides, inter alia:

> The Union, or its members, agree that during the term of this Agreement, it will not engage in or encourage any strike, picketing, work stoppage or impeding of work. The Company agrees that during the term of this Agreement, it will not lock out its employees. In the event of a violation of this article, the Union agrees that upon notification by the Company it will take immediate affirmative action with the employees involved to bring about an immediate resumption of normal work. [R. Exh. 2.]

Contrary to this provision, several employees of the Respondent engaged in a strike on March 5 and 6, 1980. The events leading up to this strike are not in dispute. During the morning of March 5, 1980, the Union and the Respondent held a grievance meeting at the Company's Third Street location. The Company's spokesmen were Robert Mulvaney, acting south-Ohio district automotive manager, Larry Thomas, south-Ohio district automotive manager and Robert Sions, south-Ohio district automotive fleet supervisor. The Union was represented by Business Agent Dave Patterson, Don Helcher, the grievant, and Union Stewards Gary Tharp and William Bryant. During the discussion, dealing with the lawfulness of Helcher's discharge and the right to be represented by the Union, Mulvaney admonished Patterson who had raised his voice that unless he modified his tone of voice "he would shut the meeting down." Patterson countered by stating that he would have the men out on an unfair labor practice strike, to which Mulvaney replied, "[W]hatever turns you on buster." Patterson promptly announced, "We're going to strike." He left the meeting, followed by Helcher, Tharp, and Bryant.

Patterson went through the shop telling employees to lock their boxes and "hit the street." All employees at the Third Street location who were members of the [1] Respondent's unopposed motion to correct transcript is granted.

Union walked out. Within a half an hour, Patterson had distributed picket signs to the striking employees; among these were Tharp and Bryant.

Patterson then told Tharp to call Daniel DeZarn, the union steward at Respondent's Gest Street facility, to explain the events that had just occurred. Tharp called DeZarn about 10:30 a.m. A few minutes later, Patterson, Tharp, Bryant, and employee John Guth drove to the Gest Street facility and began to picket there. Within a few minutes, Ed Siebbenberg, Respondent's controller, approached the pickets and wanted to know what was printed on the signs. He spoke briefly to the pickets and left. Patterson returned to Third Street, leaving Tharp, Guth, and Bryant on the picket line at the Gest Street area.

In the meantime, DeZarn, the steward at the Gest Street area, who had known of the problem at Third Street only through the earlier telephone call from Tharp, did not know of the picketing activity in front of his building. At around 11 a.m. he clocked out, intending to go to the Third Street facility to obtain more details, at which time he saw the pickets. He obtained the necessary facts from them, and returned to his building to keep his coworkers, Mike Lickliter and James Wise, informed. Once inside, a confrontation occurred when DeZarn was confronted by his supervisor, Thomas Cade, who was accompanied by Myrna Ethridge, a supervisor in the maintenance department.

The record is unclear as to the exact sequence of events during this brief encounter. But it is evident that a brief scuffle ensued between Cade and DeZarn, primarily because Cade wanted to stop DeZarn who had clocked out from reentering the building. Nevertheless, DeZarn, warning his supervisor to keep out his way, walked to the work area of Lickliter, and told him that the Third Street shop was on strike. At Cade's persistent orders, DeZarn left the building and joined the pickets, followed about 15 minutes later by employees Lickliter and Wise.

Patterson, who had returned from the Gest Street shop to the Third Street facility, contacted Cam Cantrell, the union steward at Respondent's Dayton plant, and informed him of the breakdown in the Helcher grievance hearing and the resulting strikes in Cincinnati. Patterson told Cantrell that he would contact him again later. Patterson called Cantrell shortly after 12 noon to tell him that he was negotiating with the Company to reopen the Helcher hearing and that he would "pull Dayton and Columbus shops out" if he had not reached an agreement by 1 p.m. At 12:30 p.m., Chuck Stephens, Cantrell's supervisor, sent him to a repair shop on an errand. When Cantrell returned shortly after 2 p.m., he found all the employees in front of the shop office ready to walk out. He was told by the employees that Patterson had called and told them to leave the building. At that point, Stephens approached the group with the union contract and read the "no strike" clause to them. Nevertheless, the employees left the building. Two of them obtained picket signs and the five employees, including Cantrell, picketed the Dayton facility.

During the afternoon, Patterson officially notified the Company of the strike activity and the reasons for the walkout. Subsequently television news reporters interviewed the pickets at the Third and Gest Street facilities in an attempt to obtain the details about the strike. Tharp, DeZarn, and Bryant gave short interviews reflecting their belief that the strike had been authorized by the International. That evening the news on television actually contained excerpts of the interviews with Tharp and DeZarn. However, the International Union had not sanctioned the strike and had so informed Patterson. Accordingly, Patterson then attempted to end the strike. He initially called Cantrell in Dayton and told him that the strike was over and that he should "pull down the pickets." Cantrell followed Patterson's orders and told the striking employees to return to work. He also informed Stephens, his supervisor, what Patterson had told him. The Dayton strike ended the same day.

Patterson also attempted to end the strike at the Gest and Third Street facilities. He met repeatedly with Michael Vercheak, Respondent's labor relations manager, during the evening of March 5, 1980, in an effort to resolve the situation. Vercheak, aware that the strike was not sanctioned and that Patterson was then in a bad bargaining position, insisted on the following proposal (Tr. 314): "[P]ickets down, people report to work immediately, we'll talk, and the five named individuals—Tharp, DeZarn, Bryant, Cantrell, and Pete Martin—would be suspended pending investigation."

Although Patterson urged the strikers at the Gest and Third Street plants to return to their jobs, they refused unless the stewards also went back to work. While Patterson had agreed to the proposal, the strikers refused to return to work without their stewards.

Patterson sent Vercheak a telegram in which he notified the Company that he had instructed the striking employees to end their strike. Vercheak read that telegram to them and still they refused.

On the morning of March 6 the employees at Gest and Third Streets were still picketing and other employees were now refusing to cross the picket line. In an effort to have the pickets return to their jobs, Vercheak attempted to resolve the dispute with Bryant, DeZarn, and Tharp as well as with Patterson. But the employees were reluctant to return to their jobs without the stewards. Finally, when Vercheak agreed orally and in writing that no reprisals would be taken against the employees for their picketing, they were persuaded by Patterson and the stewards to end the strike at 11:30 on March 6.

The five stewards, Bryant, Cantrell, DeZarn, Tharp, and Martin, were suspended pending an investigation by the Respondent as to their conduct during the strike.

On March 11, the Company decided to discharge Tharp, Bryant, and DeZarn and officially notified them by letters of March 17 of their discharge "because of [their] active leadership role in commencing prolonging and participating in the work stoppage on March 5-6, 1980, in violation" of the no-strike clause of the contract. Grievances were filed but were not pursued to arbitration. The Company decided to suspend Cantrell for 30 days with loss of benefits for his role in the strike. After negotiations, the Union was able to reduce the 30 days to a 20-day suspension without pay and restoration of all benefits (except the retirement benefits). The document was signed by the parties as evidence of the settlement.

Analysis

The discharges of the three union stewards, as well as the 20-day suspension of the fourth steward, were, according to the General Counsel, the result of the Company's discriminatory treatment of these employees solely because of their status as union stewards. While a company may lawfully discipline employees for their participation in a unlawful strike, an employer may not single out employees on the basis of their union office. Since a number of employees who participated in the walkout were employees who did not hold a union office, it can be inferred, argues the General Counsel, that the Company unlawfully discriminated against union officials when it selected only union stewards for disciplinary action. Moreover, it is the position of the General Counsel that the individuals concerned did not assume a leading role in the strike activity as asserted by the Respondent.

Respondent's argument is twofold. First, Respondent "had the right, as a matter of law, to discipline the four stewards for their participation in the strike and failure to exercise higher duty and responsibility as union officials to prevent the strike from occurring or continuing." Second, the actions of these four stewards in commencing, prolonging, and participating in the illegal strike exceeded those of other strikers and distinguished them. Accordingly, Respondent's position is that their union office notwithstanding, the stewards assumed a leading role which justified the disciplinary action.

The record is clear, the four individuals participated in the walkout at Respondent's several facilities in violation of the "no strike" provision in the contract. There is also no dispute that the strike did not amount to an unfair labor practice strike or otherwise constitute protected activity. Accordingly, any or all of the strikers could lawfully have been disciplined by the Respondent. And at first blush, it would seem that as a result of the contractual language requiring the Union to "take immediate affirmative action with the employees involved to bring about an immediate resumption of normal work" union stewards could be held to a higher duty as agents of the Union.

However, this issue was squarely decided in Precision Castings Co., 233 NLRB 183 (1977). There, the Board rejected the notion of a higher duty of union stewards and held that "discrimination directed against an employee on the basis of his or her holding union office is contrary to the plain meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and would frustrate the policies of the Act if allowed to stand" (233 NLRB at 184). In subsequent decisions, the Board has adhered to that standard. See Babcock & Wilcox Co., 249 NLRB 739 (1980); Metropolitan Edison Co., 252 NLRB 1030 (1980).[2]

With respect to Respondent's second argument, the record shows that the three stewards who were discharged did more than participate in the strike or fail to take positive steps in stopping it. Among the 10 or 15 employees involved in the strike, Bryant, Tharp, and DeZarn were the most prominent. Although Patterson was the real instigator and the stewards were the "pawns" caught in the middle, they nevertheless played the role of union stewards when they relayed Patterson's messages, spoke as strikers' representatives to the press, picketed at another location in addition to their own duty station, and participated in the strike negotiations with management. More particularly, the record shows that Tharp, at Patterson's orders, called DeZarn over the telephone with instructions and details concerning the strike. Further, while he was among the striking employees at Third Street, he went with Patterson[3] to the Company's Gest Street facility and engaged in picketing "back and forth between Third Street and Gest Street all day, on and off." He also spoke to a television news reporter at Gest Street and subsequently appeared on television explaining the reasons for the strike stating that it was not a wildcat strike but a sanctioned strike. In addition, Tharp assumed a leading role during the picketing to guard against problems; for example, he told employees to keep walking while in the picket line. He was also among the three stewards (in addition to DeZarn and Bryant) who first discussed and then agreed to Vercheak's ultimatum that the men return to work and that the stewards be suspended.

With respect to DeZarn, the record shows that as soon as he left his building after clocking out, he talked to the union pickets and immediately returned to notify the two employees at the Gest Street plant who [illegible] ly joined the strike; he was also inter[illegible] by a television news reporter about the strike and subsequently appeared on two television news programs in which he expressed his hope that the teamsters would honor the picket line, and where he inaccurately explained the reason for the strike as follows: "We had a man was [sic] fired and they aren't willing to sit down and talk about it." DeZarn, with the other two stewards, discussed, considered, and finally accepted Vercheak's conditions for settling the strike.

Bryant was one of the stewards who also engaged in picketing both the Third Street and the Gest Street facilities. He participated in the negotiations affecting the strike; for example, at one point, he told Siebbenberg who wanted to read the message on the picket signs that they "wanted to talk with someone to try to get the problem resolved." He also told Vercheak, in response to his offer to settle the strike, that "they went out together, they'll go back together." Bryant also admitted giving the television news reporter an interview. Apparently none of his remarks were broadcast.

From the foregoing, it is apparent that the participation of the three stewards in the strike went beyond simple participation and refusal to urge the men to return to work. Their role, though substantially performed at Patterson's behest, certainly assisted and affected the strike activity of the employees. They acted as union

[2] Courts have disagreed with this position. Gould Corp., 237 NLRB 981 (1978), enf. denied 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979); Indiana & Michigan Electric, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979).

[3] The only employee who picketed at both locations and who was not disciplined was John Guth. However, that was the extent of his participation in the strike.

representatives during the strike and failed to act as union representatives in conformity with their union contract. Accordingly, I find that Respondent did not unlawfully discriminate against the three stewards in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1), and that Respondent's conduct was not coercive of the employees' rights under Section 7 of the Act.

With respect to the suspension of Cam Cantrell, the record contains a settlement of the dispute. The settlement is indicative of Respondent's effort to gauge the severity of the discipline to the extent of the particular employee's participation in the strike. It is substantially undisputed that Cantrell's "leading" role in the walkout amounted to no more than relaying Patterson's strike instructions to employees and the display of a homemade picket sign in his car immediately in front of Respondent's property. He did not engage in picketing at sites other than his work station, and he did not grant a television interview on behalf of the Union.

In any case, dispositive of this issue is the settlement signed by Cantrell, as well as management and union representatives. It is a short statement in handwriting which clearly states: "All legal action or grievance machinery action by C. Cantrel [sic] is dropped as a part to the above agreement." Even though the signatories failed specifically to articulate in this waiver the right to file charges with the Board, it can be inferred, considering the brevity of the statement as a whole and its basic informality. The parties obviously intended that this settlement would bar any further dispute or procedural consequences. As already stated, there is no further evidence that the settlement was unfair or arbitrary in the light of the surrounding circumstances. I would therefore defer to the settlement.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. United Parcel Service, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Lodge 804, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent did not commit any unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

It is ordered that the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

---

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Chicago Metallic Corporation and Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL-CIO. Cases 21-CA-20824 and 21-RC-16865

30 January 1985

DECISION, ORDER, AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 26 September 1984 Administrative Law Judge Jesse Kleiman issued the attached decision. The Respondent, Chicago Metallic Corporation, filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Respondent excepts to the judge's findings that employee Ralph Picazzo was not a supervisor, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by threatening Picazzo with discharge, and that the Respondent's objections to the election should be overruled. The Respondent does not except to the judge's finding that Picazzo was not an agent of the Union. Additionally, no exception was filed to the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's discharge of Picazzo did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[1]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Chicago Metallic Corporation, Vernon, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the actions set forth in the Order.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL-CIO, and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees and shipping and receiving employees, including leadpersons, employed by Chicago Metallic Corporation at its facility at 5501 Downey Road, Vernon, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, managerial employees, confidential employees, professional employees and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed in Case 21-CA-20824 on November 16, 1981, by Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union 170, AFL-CIO (the Union) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Regional 21, Los Angeles, California, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on December 22, 1981, against Chicago Metallic Corporation (the Respondent) alleging that the Respondent had engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. On December 29, 1981, the Respondent, by counsel, filed its answer denying the material allegations in the complaint.[1]

Previously, on September 16, 1981, the Union had filed a petition for certification of representative with the Board in Case 21-RC-16865 seeking an election among all the Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election executed by the Respondent and the Union on October 1, 1981, and approved by the Regional Director for Region 21 on October 2, 1981, a secret-ballot election was conducted on November 5, 1981, among all the Respondent's "production and maintenance employees and shipping and receiving employees, including leadpersons, employed by the Respondent at its facility located at 5501 Downey Road, Vernon, California, excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, managerial employees, confidential employees, professional employees, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act."[2]

Jack Jimenez, the Union's assistant business manager, testified that immediately preceding the Board election on November 5, 1981, a Board agent conducted a preelection conference on company premises. Present at the conference were Donald Moore, the Respondent's plant manager, and Kenneth E. Ristou, Jr., the Respondent's legal counsel, representing the Respondent, and Jimenez

[1] We have not considered, and express no views concerning, the judge's findings and conclusions as to which no party filed exceptions. See Sec. 102.46(b) and (h) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, 29 CFR Sec. 102.46(b) and (h).

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[1] In its answer the Respondent raised the following "Separate and Additional Defenses": That the allegations of the complaint failed to state a cause of action or proper charge against the Respondent; that at all times relevant herein, Ralph Picazzo was a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act; and that Picazzo's discharge was for good cause.

[2] Uncontroverted testimony herein shows that "leadpersons" were included in the bargaining unit at the insistence of the Respondent and with the Union's acceptance thereof.

and Bill Moyer, president of the Union, representing the Union. Jimenez related that the Union chose Ralph Picazzo and Jerry Colvard as its election observers,[3] and the Respondent selected Mario Gonzales Diaz and Edith Stewart as the Employer's election observers.[4] Jimenez continued that, after the observers were selected by the respective parties, the Board agent asked the representatives of the Respondent and the Union if any of the persons chosen as election observers were supervisors. Jimenez added that he replied, "Not as far as I know," and that the Respondent's representatives, including its legal counsel, failed to reply to this question at all.[5] Moreover, on October 8, 1981, prior to the election, the Respondent submitted a voter eligibility list (Excelsior list) to the Board which included the following employees' names: George Kreuger (production leadman), Ralph Picazzo (assistant production leadman and maintenance leadman), Jerry Colvard (shipping and receiving warehouse leadman), Robert Gangle (toolroom leadman), and Pat Patterson (production leadman-night shift).

The official tally of ballots showed that 19 votes were cast of favor in the Union, 10 votes against the Union, and 1 ballot was challenged.[6] On November 12, 1981, the Respondent filed timely objections to the election. Upon investigation the Regional Director concluded that the Respondent's Objections 1, 2, 4, 6, and 10 should be overruled. With regard to Objections 3, 5, 7, 8, and 9 the Regional Director found:

> These objections relate to threats and other coercive conduct allegedly engaged in by Ralph Picazzo, whom the Employer asserts to be a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Investigation of these objections revealed substantial and material issues of fact which the undersigned concludes may best be resolved in a hearing. On December 22, 1981, the undersigned issued a Complaint and Notice of Hearing in Case 21–CA–20824, alleging inter alia, that the Employer discharged Picazzo on or about November 10, 1981, because he engaged in union or protected concerted activities. Inasmuch as the issues raised by Objections 3, 5, 7, 8, and 9 are closely related to the issues involved in Case 21–CA–20824, the undersigned concludes that these objections can best be resolved in a hearing with the related issues of the complaint.[7]

On January 19, 1982, the Regional Director duly issued an order consolidating Cases 21–CA–20824 and 21–RC–16865 "for the purposes of hearing, ruling and decision by an Administrative Law Judge and that, thereafter, Case 21–CA–16865 be transferred to and continued before the Board in Washington, D.C." No exceptions to the Regional Director's report or any request for special permission to appeal from his order having been filed by either party within the time provided therefor, the Board by Order dated February 8, 1982, adopted the Regional Director's recommendations as contained in his report as set forth above.[8]

A hearing in the consolidated cases was held before me in Los Angeles, California, on July 13, 1982. At the close of the General Counsel's case the Respondent moved to dismiss the complaint for failure of proof. I denied this motion. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. Thereafter, the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Charging Party filed briefs. The Respondent in its brief renewed its request for dismissal of the complaint in its entirety and, additionally, requested that "the election results in Case No. 21–RC–16865 be voided." For the reasons hereinafter set forth I grant the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint only in part and recommend that the election results in Case 21–RC–16865 be certified.

On the entire record and the briefs of the parties, and on my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, at all times material herein, has been a corporation engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of ceiling systems[9] and operates a plant facility located at 5501 Downey Road, Vernon, California, for this purpose.[10] In the course and conduct of the Respondent's business operations during the preceding 12 months, these operations being representative of its operations at all times material herein, the Respondent sold and shipped goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint further alleges that, at all times material herein, the Respondent's plant manager, Donald Moore, and its plant superintendent, Ron Williams, have been and are now supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2(2) and (13) of the Act. The Respondent admits these allegations. I therefore find that the above-named persons are supervisors and agents of the Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11), and 2(2) and 2(13) of the Act, respectively.

[3] Ralph Picazzo was assistant leadman in the production department and Jerry Colvard was the warehouse leadman. Jimenez testified that Colvard had at first declined to be an observer because he was against union representation and had campaigned against the Union, but Jimenez prevailed upon him to act as a union observer in the interest of fairness.

[4] Mario Gonzalez Diaz was a production employee, and Edith Stewart a secretary, both employed by the Respondent at the time.

[5] Picazzo testified similarly about this.

[6] At the election the Respondent challenged only the ballot of Ralph Picazzo for the reason that Picazzo was alleged to be a supervisory employee. However, this challenged ballot was insufficient in number to affect the results of the election.

[7] See G.C. Exh. 1(g).

[8] See G.C. Exh. 1(i).

[9] The Respondent manufactures "cross-T's and main runners" for acoustic ceilings.

[10] The Respondent's corporate "national headquarters" are in Chicago, Illinois.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local 170, AFL–CIO, is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by threatening its employees with discharge if they continued to campaign on behalf of the Union, and by discharging employee Ralph Picazzo and failing and refusing to reinstate him because he engaged in union or other protected concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. The Respondent denies these allegations.

A. The Evidence

1. The alleged supervisory status of Ralph Picazzo

Picazzo commenced his employment with the Respondent in June 1977 and was discharged by the Respondent on November 10, 1981. For approximately the last year of his employment with the Respondent, Picazzo held the position of day-shift assistant leadman in the production department[11] and leadman in the maintenance department,[12] having been transferred to this job from his previous position of leadman on the night shift.[13] As assistant leadman, Picazzo received an hourly wage rate of $10.80, higher than the other production employees except for those employees with substantially greater seniority than he,[14] the same "fringe benefits" including medical care coverage as did the other production employees, and he "punched a time clock" as was required of all production and maintenance employees with the exception of the plant manager, Donald Moore, and the plant superintendent, Ron Williams.

Picazzo continued that his duties as assistant leadman were "to assist George Kreuger [leadman] in his basic duties,[15] and also to head the maintenance department." He stated that "Kreuger's duties were to maintain production, which is to maintain a schedule showing the type of bar and which machine is going to run it, and also who was going to operate the machine." Picazzo related that the work schedules were prepared weekly and solely by Krueger, and that he played no part in their preparation. Picazzo continued that Kreuger also distributed the paychecks to employees, that he and Kreuger usually ate lunch together with other production employees in the lunch area, that neither he nor Kreuger had their own office, desk, or telephone as did Moore and Williams,[16] and that Williams maintained and kept the timecards. Picazzo added that he worked mostly, "Near the quality control area," from where he could observe the entire production floor area, the employees who were or were not working, and any "roll forming machines" which experienced any problems or had broken down during operation.[17]

Picazzo testified,

> My main duties were to assist George Kreuger in maintaining the production of the machines. In other words, if there was a problem with the rolls fluctuating . . . or the face of the width being too wide or too narrow, I would proceed to the machine and adjust the rolls to bring them to specifications . . . . Keep the metal inventory up. In other words, what I did was just check to make sure that there was enough metal available. And of course, the evaluations, the weekly evaluations I used to have.[18]

Concerning these evaluations,[19] Picazzo testified that he reviewed the work performance of the machine oper-

[11] Besides George Kreuger, the day-shift leadman, and Picazzo, the assistant leadman, there are 18 employees in the production department. The day-shift hours are from 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.

[12] The maintenance department consists of three employees besides Picazzo, including an electrician, a hydraulic pump repairman, and a welder. Their duties are to maintain and repair the "roll forming machines used to manufacture" the Respondent's products. With regard to his duties concerning the maintenance department employees, Picazzo testified that although he "headed" the maintenance department, he only worked with the maintenance employees when they needed assistance, when the work required to be done "necessitated more than one person," this occurring once or twice weekly with each of these workmen.

[13] The Respondent in its brief states that Picazzo, as the night-shift leadman, "was the 'highest individual in the plant.' Picazzo had four employees working under him on this shift, and had the responsibility for security of the plant, work problems, and any emergency that might occur during this time. When a disciplinary problem would arise, it was Picazzo who acted as 'the eyes and ears of management' by bringing it to the attention of Williams or Moore. Thus, when Picazzo caught [four] of the night-shift employees drinking, he immediately reported the situation to Williams." The evidence herein shows that after Picazzo reported the drinking incident to Williams, no disciplinary action was taken by Picazzo against these employees but instead Williams appeared at the plant later that evening and suspended these employees and sent them home. While Picazzo testified that upon his transfer from night-shift leadman to day-shift assistant leadman, his duties remained "roughly the same," he also testified that when he became the assistant leadman he assumed the new duties of evaluating employees, maintaining the upkeep of the metal inventory, and the training and evaluation of newly hired employees.

[14] The Respondent's starting hourly salaries at the time were: Operator I—$7.50 to $10; Maintenance I—$7 to $10; Helper—$6.

[15] While Picazzo testified that he worked "under Kreuger," he also testified that Plant Superintendent Williams was his immediate supervisor and the person to whom he reported.

[16] Picazzo testified that the warehouse leadman, Jerry Colvard, also had his own office.

[17] Picazzo testified that he would "look over the schedule. Fill out my evaluation forms and wait to see if any machine were going to go down."

[18] The Respondent uses "roll forming machines" in the manufacture of the cross-Ts and main runners for acoustic ceilings which are its main production items. These machines are operated by a machine operator and a helper both of whose work Picazzo evaluates. Picazzo related that he would check the finished bars produced on a machine as to specified tolerances with calipers and a micrometer as part of his duties as assistant leadman. In the event Picazzo discovered that the bars produced did not meet specifications, he would report this to Williams who would then decide whether or not the work had to be done over. Picazzo added that on occasion he, himself, worked on the roll forming machines as an operator, but that this happened infrequently.

[19] Picazzo testified that Kreuger had prepared the employee evaluations prior to his becoming assistant leadman and thereafter Picazzo did this "to take some of the work load from George Kreuger." Picazzo added that he did not evaluate the maintenance employees, only the production employees.

ators and helpers on each of the different machines weekly evaluating them as to quality and quantity of their work by observing them at their jobs, after which he would grade them on a work evaluation form. Picazzo stated that copies of these evaluation forms were kept in the employees' personal files, by Plant Manager Moore in a separate file, and by himself in a personal notebook which Williams told him to keep and maintain.[20] Picazzo related that while he was unaware of the use to which his employee work evaluations were being put to by the Respondent, he confessed that he had not prepared these evaluations "conscientiously," but instead had just put down "anything that came to mind."[21] Picazzo added that Williams also evaluated the production employees' work performances for the purposes of "a three-month wage review."[22]

Picazzo testified that he had no authority to hire, fire, lay off, discipline, or promote employees, nor any authority to effectively recommend the same, such authority being vested in Plant Manager Moore and Plant Superintendent Williams. Picazzo recounted that while he also had no independent authority to suspend or discipline employees, nor had he ever done so, yet he did prepare and issue written disciplinary warnings and notices to employees, including suspension notices, but only upon the occasions when he was directed to do so by Moore, Williams, and at times Kreuger. According to Picazzo, Williams would instruct him to issue a warning or disciplinary notice to an employee including recommendations as to the discipline to be imposed, whereupon Picazzo would prepare a "write-up form" with the employee's name, the reason for the warning or discipline, the actual discipline to be imposed, and the date. Picazzo would then obtain Williams' approval as to the wording and acceptability thereof, after which both he and Williams would sign the form, with Picazzo's signature appearing thereon, "in the spot where it said 'company supervisor.'"[23] Picazzo would then issue the writeup form to the employee, and obtain the employee's signature on the form. Whenever an employee disputed the merits of the disciplinary notice or action signified, Picazzo would refer them to Williams or Moore for any further consideration of the matter.[24]

Picazzo continued that he did, on occasion, transfer employees from one work assignment to another, but again only when instructed to do so by Williams. Picazzo stated that he also distributed work assignments to the production employees based on the work schedules prepared by Kreuger,[25] and explained to these employees, if necessary, just what was required of them in the performance of their work. He testified that Williams made the decision as to the need for overtime work and the number of employees required to accomplish this. While Williams also made the decision as to which employees were not to receive such overtime work Picazzo, apparently at his discretion, made the actual overtime work assignments from among the remaining eligible employees. However, according to Picazzo, overtime work is voluntary and he merely asked employees if they wanted to work overtime and assigned those who said they did to such work unless Williams told him not to do so. The evidence additionally shows that Picazzo also trained new employees in the operation of the "roll forming machines," during which time he also evaluated their work performances,[26] functioned as an interpreter on occasion for Moore or Williams when they spoke to any of the Spanish-speaking employees, and served as the Respondent's permanent representative on the "plant safety committee."[27] Picazzo also attended management meetings during which production matters at the plant and plant expansion problems were discussed.[28]

Donald Moore, the Respondent's plant manager, testified that the position of "Leadman (Assistant)" was originated in November 1979 and approved in August 1980 at a time when the Respondent was expanding its Vernon, California facility, and was created to "[assist] the current leadman in his job activities." Moore stated that he prepared a job description for this position, setting forth duties thereof, and that he perceived this position as "basically equal" to the leadman but "assisting" him, with their respective duties being "a joint function [20] Picazzo also kept copies of disciplinary notices he issued in this notebook, and he recorded overtime work assignments therein, as well.

[21] However, Picazzo admitted that on one occasion when he had failed to evaluate the work performances of employees for a period of time, he was told that Moore had become "upset" because he had discontinued such evaluations. Moreover, while Picazzo consistently and continuously maintained, throughout his testimony, that he was always told by either Moore or Williams as to what duties he had to perform and how to accomplish these duties, he also admitted that as to these work evaluations, he prepared them by himself, in his own way, using his own phraseology. Picazzo added that as far as he knew his evaluations had nothing to do with the "well-being of employees," and that, on one occasion, Kreuger had jokingly said that he had seen the evaluations in a trashcan.

[22] Moore also testified that Williams evaluates the production and maintenance employees for purposes of wage increases and merit increases, with such increases then being subject to Moore's approval.

[23] Picazzo testified that Williams instructed him to sign the form as "company supervisor." He also explained that on occasion Moore, Williams, or Kreuger would not be available to sign the form at which time only his signature appeared thereon along with the employee involved.

[24] Picazzo testified that, as assistant leadman, he issued "many" warning and disciplinary notices to employees. See R. Exhs. 1–20. Concerning these exhibits the evidence shows that Picazzo prepared and accomplished most of the writing on these forms except for the signatures other than his own.

[25] In an affidavit given to a Board agent during the investigative stage of these proceedings, Picazzo stated,

> Regarding assignments of employees to work in the production area, Ron Williams, George Kreuger and I would get together in the morning and decide what work had to be done and who was going to operate which machine.

[26] Picazzo denied that he discussed with Moore or Williams whether or not these new employees were "good employees."

[27] Picazzo testified that when he was assigned by Moore to the safety committee he was never specifically told what his duties were, but only to "sit in." He stated that Moore told him that these meetings were for the purpose of "cutting down accidents and maintenance safety on the job." He added that, at the safety meetings, employees made suggestions about safety to Bob Gangel, who "headed" the committee and the meetings, and who determined which repairs were to be made. According to Picazzo, his function was merely to be seen at these meetings.

[28] Picazzo testified that at the management meetings he attended, while there where discussions about production and plant expansion problems, he was never asked for his opinion or to provide any input into these discussions.

due to the expansion of our facility." Moore continued that he reviewed the job description and the duties set forth therein with Ralph Picazzo shortly after Picazzo became the assistant leadman,[29] and again went over the various aspects of it approximately 3 months later, when Picazzo requested "clarification in some areas, and we reviewed it again."

Moore related that subsequently he held a meeting with Ron Williams, George Kreuger, and Picazzo regarding the assistant leadman's position, "to redefine the direction, so that there wasn't such a drastic overlap" in the duties of Kreuger and Picazzo. Moore stated that the areas of responsibility worked out at this meeting were: George Kreuger — production coordination, machine assignments, quality control, setup control, and machine tooling directions; Ralph Picazzo —machine maintenance, routine maintenance, safety committee, emergency procedures, emergency operations. According to Moore, both Kreuger and Picazzo were to be jointly involved in training employees, proper housekeeping, plant and employee security, employee discipline, and an improvement committee to recommend "procedural changes, training personnel, discipline, cleanliness, housekeeping, all of the things that make a plant a nice place to work."[30] Moore added that he considered Kreuger, Pat Patterson, Bob Gangel, and Picazzo all supervisors.

Picazzo denied ever seeing a copy of the final job description although he acknowledged that, shortly after he became the assistant leadman, he met with Moore who "went over roughly just more or less what he wanted me to do as assistant leadman under George Kreuger, which was mainly to assist with George, and to head over the maintenance department." According to Picazzo, Moore also told him to "maintain the operation of the machinery." Picazzo also denied that Moore had ever discussed an "improvement committee" with him.

In support of the Respondent's contention that Picazzo is a statutory supervisor, Moore testified that, approximately 4 months before the election, while Ron Williams was on vacation, Kreuger and Picazzo had come to his office and Kreuger told Moore that "It's Mr. O'Shaughnessey again." Moore related that he asked them what the problem was and Picazzo responded that O'Shaughnessey "had left his machine unattended." Moore stated that since O'Shaughnessey had violated "a plant rule of some significance," Kreuger and Picazzo "both felt that it was time to make a move on O'Shaughnessey . . . time that we did something about this." Moore continued that after he checked O'Shaughnessey's "record" and found that "he was on the verge of firing anyway, basically because of his history," he told Kreuger and Picazzo, "I see no reason not to fire him at this point. I think he has been given every opportunity," O'Shaughnessey was subsequently discharged.[31] Moore maintained that leadmen had the discretion to decide disciplinary action against employees.

Picazzo's version of this incident differed from Moore's. Picazzo testified that Kreuger had spoken to him in Williams' office informing him that, earlier that morning, Moore had told Kreuger that he "wanted Tom O'Shaughnessey out today." Picazzo stated that after he advised Kreuger that O'Shaughnessey had "just left his machine," Kreuger directed Picazzo to "get him for that." Picazzo continued that he then prepared and issued a warning notice to O'Shaughnessey recommending "termination" as Kreuger had directed. He related that when O'Shaughnessey received the notice he tore it up and wanted to see Moore about this. Picazzo denied that he had ever met with Moore to discuss O'Shaughnessey's discharge or that he was present when the discharge took place. Picazzo added that his only involvement in the decision to terminate O'Shaughnessey was that, "I was told to write him up."

Steve Kosiek, employed by the Respondent as a machine "helper," testified that he had observed Picazzo in the performance of his job and that Picazzo's duties were "writing up evaluations for employees' warning slips, and just generally standing there combing the area making sure that people were doing what they were supposed to be doing."[32] According to Kosiek, the procedure for the issuance of "warning slips" was that Ron Williams would tell Picazzo "exactly what the person had done," whereupon Picazzo would prepare the written notice, give it to the employee involved, explain the reason for its issuance and the rule infraction, obtain the employee's signature on the notice, sign the form himself, and take the notice back to Williams for approval, and the notice was then taken to the office. Kosiek related that he had actually received "warning slips" from Picazzo as an employee which were initiated by Williams and prepared and issued by Picazzo as described above. He stated that Picazzo would also tell employees, upon giving them the warning notice, that "If they didn't want to get another of these they better not do it again." Kosiek added that Picazzo also spent "a lot of time" talking to Williams and Kreuger "out there, right out on the floor." Kosiek reiterated that Picazzo's work entailed "writing up" employee work evaluations, "writing up" disciplinary notices and "handing them to people and explaining the rules" and "standing around on the floor making sure the men were working properly."

[29] Picazzo was the first person to hold the position of assistant leadman.

[30] While Moore testified that the job description for assistant leadman encompassed the duties which he wanted Picazzo to perform in that position, and while he offered his belief that to the best of his knowledge these were the duties being performed by Picazzo, he also admitted uncertainty as to whether the job description accurately reflected those duties actually performed by Picazzo when Picazzo assumed this position.

[31] Moore's testimony as to who actually recommended O'Shaughnessey's discharge was somewhat equivocal and guarded. At first Moore testified that both Kreuger and Picazzo had said that something ought to be done about O'Shaughnessey, with Moore's testimony strongly inferring, that he himself had made the determination to fire O'Shaughnessey. However, after what appeared to be an attempt by counsel for the Respondent, through leading questions and remarks, to rebut this inference, Moore now denied having made this decision, remembered that the word "termination" had been used although he could not remember by whom, and maintained that he had "just supported their decision." Moreover, Moore's testimony concerning the circumstances under which an employee can be terminated appeared guarded and at times evasive.

[32] At this time Kosiek was employed by the Respondent "in quality control," checking the work produced by the machine operators and helpers. He testified as a witness for the General Counsel.

Mark Freeland, formerly employed by the Respondent as a warehouseman, testified[33] that Picazzo had issued several written warning notices to him during his employment with the Respondent[34] and that it was "more than likely" that Picazzo had cleared the language on such notices with Williams before he gave it to the employee. He related that Picazzo had no authority to change any of the language in the warning notice without Williams' approval. Freeland continued that Picazzo would give him the warning notice to read, ask him to sign it, and then if Freeland had any question about the warning notice or "disagreed with the writeup," he assumed that he could take it up with Williams or Kreuger, "or someone else, like a step above him, so to speak." While Freeland stated that Picazzo had told him on one occasion that if he received another "write-up" for absenteeism, he would be fired,[35] he also testified that both Williams and Kreuger had told him the same thing on several occasions.[36] Freeland added that Picazzo did not hire, fire, promote, suspend, lay off, recall, reward, or transfer employees, "it wasn't his job."

2. The discharge of Ralph Picazzo

Picazzo testified that soon after the Union had filed its petition with the Board, he was informed by other employees at the plant that the Union was attempting to organize the Respondent's employees for purposes of collective bargaining. Picazzo stated that, thereafter, he discussed "the issue of the union with other employees, attended union meetings, and actively campaigned" for the Union among the plant employees "on an individual basis."[37] Picazzo related that on October 29, 1981,

> Don Moore was entering the production area to pass around anti-union propaganda. He then approached me and told me that if I continued to campaign for the Union, that he would have me fired, and if I did not believe that, just to continue and he would see me in court.[38]

Picazzo continued that later that day,

> I was behind machine number seven, and [Moore] was coming out of the maintenance department. And he approached me again smiling and said that he really didn't mean it quite that way. But that if, in fact, I was campaigning for the Union, that he could have me fired.[39]

Picazzo recounted that on Friday after the Board election held on November 5, 1981, he was in the production area with Moore, Williams, and Kreuger, when Jerry Colvard, the warehouse leadman, came over and told Picazzo "to keep away from his men, that to stay away from them, and he didn't want to see me around them anymore." Picazzo stated that later that day he had a conversation with Moore in Moore's office as follows:

> I asked Don Moore what the commotion was all about. He told me it was none of my business. I told him I was not referring to the conversation he had just had with Colvard, I was referring to what went on in the production area. He says, "you know very well what that's all about." And I said, "No, I don't. I wish you would explain!" He told me then, he says, "Come on Ralph, you understand. You know what is going on." He says, "You never really were on my side." I told him, "Yes, I was." He says, "No. I don't believe you!" I says, "Well, if that is the way you feel, then I am sorry," and I left.

Picazzo testified that on November 10, 1981, he was called into Moore's office. Ron Williams was also present in the office. Picazzo continued, > [Moore] then told me that he was sorry that it had to end this way, but he could not condone intimidating or threatening employees.

> I then asked him who was it I supposedly intimidated.
>
> He said that was best left unknown.
> I asked him what was it that I supposedly said.
>
> He said that was best left unknown.
> And I asked him also when did this take place.
> He said that was best left unknown. He then told me that for his satisfaction, what was it that he had supposedly done wrong.
> I told him there was nothing he had done wrong. But also I had done nothing wrong. But evidently someone had told him something, and he chose to take their word over mine.
